Knowing this then, that the remembrance of hard eſtate before, will ſtir the heart up to him in love, that hath made it happy; and that ſight of ugly ſinne lodging ſtill in me, and cleaving to my ſoule and fleſh, will make me praiſe his holy name, who yet in mercy imputeth not the ſame unto me: Uſe indeed often with your ſelfe, and eſpecially when you feele your heart moſt prone and fit thereunto, to view your ſinnes againſt every Commandement: how many and monſtrous they are, in thought, word, and deed.

Sit, and thinke with your ſelfe what is commanded, ſometimes in one, ſometimes in another, what wonderfull perfection is required in every one, what branches and members every one hath, what terrible judgements are due to the breakers thereof, how farre from the full and abſolute performance of any tittle of any one of them you your ſelfe are; and therefore in what caſe you ſtand for the ſame; even ſure of eternall deſtruction both of body and ſoule, in hell fire: Yet notwithſtanding, how you are releaſed of mercy, not of merit, and that with the precioueſt ranſome that ever was, the heart blood of Jeſus Chriſt, the Son of God, both God and Man: ſo that Heaven and Earth may periſh, but you cannot periſh.

The examination of the Conſcience touching this Commandement.

FOr example, I ſit and view this Commandement whereof now we have ſpoken, Thou ſhalt have none other gods but me; conſidering what things are bidden or forbidden unto me in the ſame: and as already now hath beene proved, firſt, I ſee I am commanded herein to worſhip the Lord my God, and him only to ſerve, not joyning any fellowes to him at all; of which worſhip many points there bee, but they may be reduced into a few.

Firſt, I ſee I am bound to love him above all; that is, with heart and ſoule to make more account of him, than of all the world, or any creature in heaven or earth; to cleave faſter unto him and his will, than to any thing; to eſteeme him, and preferre him, yea, even above mine owne ſalvation, if they could come in
Mat. 10. 28. compariſon together: for, He that loveth Father or Mother, ſiſter or brother, wife or child, or any thing more than me, is not worthy of me. Secondly, I am commanded to feare him above all; that is, with a godly reverence to ſtand more in awe of him and his word, than of any thing elſe whatſoever; to bee more loath, not for feare onely, but even for love, to diſpleaſe him, greive him, and offend him, than any or all the creatures in heaven or earth beſide; in reſpect of that which he is able to lay upon me, if I forſake him; to account nothing of any thing that any man can doe
Mat. 10. unto me, mindfull ever of this ſaying, Feare not them that can kill the body, and are not able to kill the ſoule: but feare him that can caſt both body and ſoule into hell fire. Thirdly, I ſee that in this Commandement I am charged to make my praiers to none but to God onely, for thoſe ſame reaſons above in their place alledged. Fourthly, I ſee I am commanded not to thinke that things goe by fortune and chance, or that any thing is done which GOD knoweth not of, or could not let, but that I acknowledge him to bee the guider and governor of all things, and that what good ſoever I receive, I have it from him, and therefore that I truſt and ſtay upon him alone at all times, and in all my matters whatſoever. And for ſo much as neither I nor any can either love him, or feare him, pray to him, or truſt in him, unleſſe we know him: therefore I ſee alſo that I am in this Commandement ſtraitly bound ſo long as I live, to labour and travell by all meanes appointed to know the Lord, and his truth, out of his word: and looke how much I want of knowing any thing that is revealed in his word, ſo farre I am guilty of the breach of this Law. And if it pleaſe the Lord to bleſſe mee with knowledge of his truth, or any thing elſe whatſoever, I ſee that in this Commandement I am charged to give thankes to him for it, in ſuch full manner and meaſure of feeling, as any way is due to that benefit. For if I forget to bee thankfull, I forget that the Lord in that thing is my good God. And if I aſcribe the praiſe and thankes to any thing elſe whatſoever, otherwiſe than as the inſtrument of GOD, I make my ſelfe an other god beſides the Lord, even that thing whereunto I give the thankes, and I breake this Commandement. Theſe, and many ſuch other things I ſee are laid upon me and all men and women in this firſt Commandement, and then I thinke or ſay with my ſelfe unto the Lord, O my good God and gracious Father, O my ſweet Lord and guide moſt righteous, what, doe I ſee even in this but one law of thine, againſt my ſelfe, my ſoule and body, why I ſhould never come in thy Kingdome, nor lift up mine eyes to heaven in hope of any comfort? It is but one law often, and containeth but a few duties in reſpect of all that I owe, to thee and my brethren, yet oh Lord, with wailing woe I ſpeake it, ſo guilty I ſee my ſelfe, ſo foule and ugly before thy face, and ſo full of breaches every way, even of this Commandement, that I am aſhamed and confounded to lift up mine eyes unto thee my God. For mine iniquities are increaſed over mine head, and my treſpaſſes are growne up to heaven, to mee belongeth nothing but ſhame and confuſion, it is thy mercy that I am not utterly deſtroyed, yea even thy mercy marvellous, that the earth as weary of ſo wicked a burden, ſhrinketh not under my feet, and the helliſh pit the gulfe of endleſſe woe receiveth me not into it; For what pleaſure is there in that ſervant, that being bid of his Maſter doe divers things, yet not in any one obeyeth or performeth his maſters will? Can he like him? Will he love him? No, no, full ſoone even I my ſelfe would loath and caſt off ſuch a one. Ah Lord then for my ſelfe what ſhould I ſay? Is there any ſervant ſo bound unto his Maſter, as I am bound to thee? Is there any Maſter that can and will ſo quit his Servants paines, as thou in mercy my obedience? Or can any mortall man ſo juſtly challenge the obedience of his hireling, as thou my God maiſt challenge the ſervice of me thy creature, firſt made of nothing by thy hand, and then moſt dearly bought againe with precious price? No, no, my body, my life, my heart, my ſoule, and whatſoever I am, within, or without, of thee I had all, and to thee my gracious God, I owe them all againe.

Yet ſee, ah wretch and wofull wight, although thy goodneſſe to me far paſſeth all Maſters to their Servants, and my duty to thee more due ten thouſand times than any mans unto his maſter, yet is my diſobedience greater, the ſin of my ſoule more grievous, and the whole courſe of my wicked life, more oppoſed to thy will, than ever was any earthly ſervants to any hard and evill Maſter. For he will doe ſomething that he is bidden, but I have done nothing, as I plainly ſee by viewing of my life, and as my conſcience telleth me being privy to my pathes. For have I loved thee as I ought? Namely, even with all my heart, with all my ſoul, with all my ſtrength, which is the firſt thing that is commanded mee in this Commandement? If I have done it, then have I loved thy word, and every way made that account of it that I ought. For David that deare ſervant loved thee, and behold what he ſaith, Thy word unto me was ſweeter than the honey, and the honey combe. Ieremy thy Prophet loved thee, and ſee what followed, Thy words were found by him, and he did eate them, and they were unto him the joy and the rejoycing of his heart.

And a number moe ſuch examples have we, whereby we learne that there is no true love of thee in us, unleſſe there be joyned thereunto a ſincere and fervent liking of the word. Now foraſmuch as I am guilty to my ſelfe, that I have not had that care of thy word, that I ought, to reade it, to heare it, to learne and ſeeke it, and every way to ſhew my love toward it, therefore O deare Father, to ſay I have loved thee as I ought, with all my ſoule and power, alas I dare not, alas I cannot.

For much more occupied might I have beene in the meditation of thy Law, than ever I have been. I confeſſe it O Lord, I confeſſe it even with griefe of heart. And therefore if thou wert not a God moſt mercifull, I even for this one thing were a wretch moſt miſerable. The like might I ſay of that light and little account that I have made of thy Miniſters, which being another branch of the love of thee, bewrayeth my want unto me. But ſee yet further, greatly my heart hath failed in loving of thee. For looking unto my ſelfe a little deeper, behold even ſuch things as flatly and directly are contrary to the love of thee, alas I ſee them to have beene, and to be at times in me moſt horrible. To murmure and grudge, to repine and to be offended with any croſſe or griefe whatſoever laid upon me by thee, or not even willingly to accept it as a meſſenger of a gracious friend, to ſeek any wicked means to be eaſed of it, is contrary to that love that we ow to thee. And how frail my ſelf have been herein, thou ſearcher of hearts knoweſt it well, and I wretch moſt weak, with ruing heart beſeech thy pardon. Againe, to ſuffer the world, or any gliſtring glory thereof, further to creep into our hearts, and to tickle us with delight and liking, than it ought, is a thing flat contrary to the love of thee. For ſo we reade:

To draw back alſo my helping hand from thoſe that are in need, and not with ready heart and willing minde to comfort their poore eſtate, with whom thou haſt dealt more hardly than with me, I know it bewrayeth a want of love to thee. For ſo I learne,

1 Iohn 3.17. Whoſoever hath this worlds good, and ſeeth his brothers need, and ſhutteth his compaſſion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? But theſe O Lord, have tainted ſometimes this heart of mine, and therefore I have not loved thee as I ought. But what ſhould I ſay when I view in my ſelf, how my fleſh and my heart runneth back as it were to hide it ſelfe, when I looke upon any perſecution to bee abidden for thee and thy truth, and ſpecially when I looke upon thoſe horrible torments, that ſome of thy Martyrs have ſuffered, oh what want of love bewrayeth it to me? My houſhold and family, my children and charge, my life and preſent eſtate ſtep in unto me, as

Mat. 16.22. Peter did once to his Maſter, draw me aſide, and whiſper in mine eare to ſave my ſelfe, if that day come, and my power faileth, with courage to anſwer, as then my Saviour did, come after me Satans, your counſell is not good, neither ſavour you the things that are of God: ſo that every way I ſee I love thee not my God as I ſhould. Looke at my behaviour, when I ſee or heare thy name diſhonoured any way, and I ſmoother it up, I hold my peace, I make as though I heard it not, yea, and ſometimes I approve wickedneſſe with laughter, and I breake not out in zeale of rebuke. No, I that hearing as much by any worldly friend, would readily challenge the wrong, and hotly ſeeke revenge thereof, in thy cauſe and for thy ſake I have no heate nor courage, but either perſons, place, danger, or ſome circumſtance or other, quencheth my heart, tyeth up my tongue, and maketh me like a Traytor to my Lord and Maſter.

What might I ſay of that ſecret miſliking that ſometimes will creepe ſo cloſely into my minde, of the poore eſtate of Chriſt in his members on earth? Chriſt liketh me not ſo well, when he lyeth in the ſtable, in the manger, when hee flyeth into

Luke 2. Ægypt for his life, when hee hath not an hole to lay his head in, except it bee in a cold priſon, as he doth when he rideth to the City, and the people cutting downe boughes of Palmes, ſtrow them in the way, ſpread their garments, and cry,

Mat. 21.9. Mat. 21.8. Hoſanna, Bleſſed be he that commeth in the name of the Lord; as when they ſeeke to make him a King, and the world doth ſeeme his friend. No, my heart will even ſlip ſometimes privily into this wiſh: O that the Goſpell and the World might alwayes be friends, and goe hand in hand. So that liking not every way ſo well in truth of Chriſt in poverty, as in plenty, and in feeling not my heart ſo well contented to beg and ſuffer with him, as to rule and raigne with him, there is not that love in me towards him that ought to be. Againe, marke how I faile in publike aſſemblies to heare the word, to pray, and ſuch like, when I might be preſent if I would. Marke how negligent I am in publiſhing the praiſes of my God, and labouring thereby to draw others to a greater liking of him; with a number ſuch like wants; and O love of God, in me no love in deed, but dead, blotted out, and quite extinguiſhed. See now how guilty I am even of the firſt thing that is commanded me in this Commandement. The ſecond thing is, that I ſhould feare thee above all. The third is, that I ſhould pray to none but to thee. The fourth, to acknowledge thee the guider and governour of all things, of whom I receive all the benefits that I have, and therefore that I truſt and ſtay upon thee alone. Fifthly, that I ſhould labour to know thee out of thy word, ſo fully and perfectly as thou haſt revealed thy ſelfe therein: becauſe of knowledge all theſe other follow.

Feare of God.

And

And laſtly, that I ſhould for all benefits give thankes only to thee, and in ſuch full manner and meaſure of feeling as any way is due to that bleſſing which I receive. In which points, as in other moe, which might yet be named, O mercifull father, I here before thee confeſſe I am no better than in the firſt. I dare not cleare my ſelfe, I cannot, I ought not. O Lord give me eyes to ſee my wants, for I have feared men and their threats more than I ought; I have feared the loſſe of their favour more than I ought; I have feared the loſſe of worldly commodities more than I ought; and have not as thy bleſſed Apoſtle taught me by his example, accounted thoſe things that were vantage unto me, loſſe and very dung, for the excellent knowledge ſake of Ieſus Chriſt my Lord. Philip. 3.

Sometimes Satan hath rocked this ſoule of mine in the chayre of ſecurity, that I have even ſlept as it were a dead ſleep, and not conſidered of thy judgements againſt ſin, as I ought, neither taken the profit by thy extraordinary workes in the ayre, in the earth, in the bodies of men, and beaſts, that I ſhould; but paſſed them over with a little wonder or motion for a ſhort time. When my ſinnes have beene touched, or appeared unto mee, I have flattered mine owne ſoule, and put unto them honeſt names, as cloakes to hide them withall. The plaine pride of my heart, and meere vanity, I have judged cleanlineſſe or neceſſary for my eſtate. Miſerable covetouſneſſe have I judged lawfull care for things neceſſary, and ſo forth: a manifeſt token of a dead heart within, and void of taſting any horror in ſinne.

By all which, and many more things that my minde may eaſily ſee, it is apparent to me, that I have even broke this point alſo of thy law, in not fearing thee ſo as I ought.

Alas, Lord, what ſhall I ſay of the reſt of the branches of this Commandement named even now? Am I perfecter in them than in theſe? No, no, I have ſinned againſt thee in them all, and that moſt grievouſly: ſo that if there were no moe of thy Commandements, but even this one, the firſt of all, yet doth my conſcience tell me, I am before thee guilty, and good Lord moſt mercifull, to bee touched. But there are nine moe, ſpreading out their branches to all ſincerity and holineſſe, both in body and minde, toward God and man, with threatned curſes to all fleſh that doe contrary.

And therefore when I view my courſe, even at the firſt to bee ſo crooked, O deare Father, what ſhall I thinke it will appeare, when I ſhall bee judged in them all? Shall I boaſt of merits, and keep no tittle of thy Commandements? Shall I challenge ſalvation for my workes, and every branch of thy Law doth call mee curſed, becauſe I have ſo foully, and often broken the ſame? No, good Father, no; this little view of my obedience to thy heſts doth plainly tell mee, I have no merits or good workes to come before thee withall, much leſſe am I able to doe workes of ſupererogation; that is, more than I need to doe, but of ſins and evill workes, alas I ſee a number.

With David may I cry, They are more than the haires of my head, and my heart faileth me. Pſal. 8. 34. I may truly ſay with the prodigall Sonne, I have ſinned againſt heaven, and againſt thee, and I am not worthy to be called thy childe. I may ſay with the Publican, God bee mercifull to mee a ſinner: And adde thereunto, a great and grievous ſinner. I may ſay with Ieremy, O Lord, although mine iniquities teſtifie againſt mee, yet deale thou with mee according to thy name, for my rebellions are many. Iob 7. And with Iob, I have ſinned, what ſhall I doe to thee, O thou preſerver of men? Yea, well may I ſay, I lye downe in my confuſion, and my ſhame covereth me: For I have ſinned againſt the Lord my God, from my youth up till this day, and have not obeyed his voyce.

To conclude, I may looke about mee, and from a wounded ſoule cry unto thoſe that can give me counſell; In reſpect of my ſinnes, Men and Brethren, what ſhall I doe? And ſee, how never the Lord forſaketh thoſe that want his help and ayde.

Doe I not even now remember what he adviſeth me and all Sinners in my caſe to doe? He that hideth his ſinnes (ſaith the Lord by Solomon) ſhall not proſper: but he that confeſſeth his ſinne, and forſaketh it, ſhall have mercy. And ſee in David the proofe and triall of it: For when I held my tongue (ſaith he) my heart conſumed, or when I roared all the day. For thy hand is heavy upon me day and night, and my moiſture is turned into the drought of Summer. Then I acknowledged my ſinne unto thee, neither hid I mine iniquity: For I ſaid I will confeſſe againſt my ſelf, and thou forgaveſt me the puniſhment of my ſin. Therefore I hearken to thy counſell, and though I have ſinned above the number of the ſands of the ſea, as plainly I ſee I have, if I be charged with every branch of thy Commandements, how I have kept them, though my tranſgreſſions be multiplyed, and are exceeding many; So that I am not worthy to behold the height of heaven, for the multitude of my unrighteouſneſſe: yea (I ſay) though I have provoked thy wrath, and done evill before thee, and not kept any jot of thy Commandements, ſo fully as I ought, yet knowing thou deſireſt the death of no ſinner, but rather that he ſhould repent and be ſaved, and haſt ſhewed the truth thereof in forgiving David, and many moe confeſſing their ſins before thee: Therefore O good Lord and ſweet refuge, full of mercy, pitty, and compaſſion, I bow the knees of my heart with King Manaſſes, and all ſorrowfull ſinners, and beg thy mercy. I have ſinned, O Lord, I acknowledge my tranſgreſſions, but I humbly beſeech thee forgive me; O Lord forgive me, and deſtroy me not, as I have deſerved. Be not angry with me for ever, by reſerving to me evill, neither condemne me into the lower parts of the earth. For thou art the God, even the God of all them that repent, and on me thou wilt ſhew mercy.

Pſal. 32.

My ſorrow, good Lord, alas I know it is not great enough, neither anſwereth it the greatneſſe of my ſin, but thou canſt give greater, if it pleaſe thee.

O deare Father, rend my heart, and give me feeling, cleave it aſunder, by thy piercing Spirit, that from it may flow the teares of true repentance. Strike good Lord this hard rock of mine, that it may guſh out ſorrowfulll water, for ſo foule offence, and what wanteth in me any wayes, ſupply in mercy with my Saviour, in whom thou art perfectly pleaſed. Grant O God unto me thy gracious Spirit, to kill in me continually more and more the ſtrength and power of ſinne, and to raiſe me up in body and ſoule, to more obedience towards thee. Let not my wants ſtand ever, ſweet Lord, betwixt thy mercy and mee, but give mee will to wiſh it, give me power to doe it, give me love to like it, and ever ſtrength to continue in it, that thou haſt appointed for me to walke in before thee in this world.

Heare me, O Lord, O God, O ſweet and endleſſe comfort of my ſinfull ſoule, for Jeſus Chriſt his ſake, that living here I may ever ſerve thee: and doing ſo, I may never loſe thee. Amen, Amen.

The ſecond Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not make to thy ſelfe any graven Image, nor the likeneſſe of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, &c.

FIrſt, for the order of this Commandement, either we may anſwer that this firſt Table containeth the honour and duty of men to the Lord, as the ſecond doth their duty to Man: and the worſhip of God, being partly inward, partly outward, having in the former Commandement laid downe the former kinde, (to wit) of inward worſhip, fitly now in this, and the two next follow the outward duties, which to the ſame our gracious God we juſtly owe. Or elſe thus: that the Lord in the firſt Commandement having ſeparated himſelfe from all other gods, deviſed and made by men, and commanded all mortall men and women his creatures ſubject to his Law, to worſhip him only, and none but him; here now in this ſecond Precept (as order required) he ſetteth downe modum & rationem juxta quam coli velit: the way and manner how he will be ſerved: For as much as in vaine he ſhould have done the firſt, except except he had done the ſecond alſo. The way and manner is this, even according to his will and nature. Which albeit it may ſeeme to fleſh and blood not ſo fitly done by a negative law, as by an affirmative it might, yet beſides that we are not to teach the Lord, even in ſpeciall wiſdome hath he thus done it. For, firſt our natures are very prone to the breach hereof, which by a negative is ſtronglier beat downe than by an affirmative: And then againe, the Gentiles, next neighbours to the Jewes, were very much given to idols and images, and therefore by name forbidden to the Jewes, leſt by the Gentiles in that point they ſhould bee defiled. And yet doth not the Lord here ſo ſet downe a negative, but that hee includeth an affirmative in it. For as he ſaith, Thou ſhalt not make to thy ſelfe any graven Image, and meaneth thereby, Thou ſhalt not worſhip me with any device of thine owne, contrary to my will and nature: ſo implieth he herein the affirmative; namely, thou ſhalt in every reſpect worſhip me according to my will and nature. Moreover, remember here againe, which hath been touched before, that both in this Commandement, as in all other, the Lord ſetteth downe by name that thing, the doing whereof, or not doing, is moſt decent or horrible. And therefore in this place forbidding all falſe and fond worſhip of his Majeſty, he ſetteth downe in name that which is moſt unſeemly and vile, to wit, Idolatry. For of all wrong worſhip, to make him like a man or woman, or other worſe creature, to proſtrate our ſelves thereunto, and to thinke wee worſhip him in ſo doing, is moſt horrible.

What expoſitions your booke giveth, you may looke and marke, adding for plainneſſe thereunto thus much, that the very meaning of this Commandement in effect is thus much: as if the Lord ſhould have ſaid; Although the corrupt nature of man be ſuch, as naturally he defireth my preſence in ſome viſible forme and ſhape, fooliſhly thinking that he is moſt neare unto me, when he hath before his eyes ſome viſible picture of me: yet foraſmuch as this, and the worſhip hereby done unto me, is neither agreeable to my will nor nature, I therefore command thee that thou make thy ſelf no graven Image, &c. That is, that thou goe not about to preſent mee by any likeneſs of any creature whatſoever, neither to worſhip me in or under any ſuch ſhows, or after any way, than out of my word thou learneſt to be agreeable both to my will and nature. Eaſily then may we ſee that we are occaſioned here in this Commandement to conſider of, namely

1. The making of Images.
2. The worſhipping of them.
3. The reaſons God uſeth here.

Touching the firſt, then uſually upon this occaſion is moved this queſtion, whether ſimply it be unlawfull, and miſliked of the Lord, to make any kinde of Image, by painting, carving, ingraving, &c. And it ſeemeth yea, becauſe the words are ſo flat without exception: Thou ſhalt not make any graven Image, &c.

For anſwer whereunto, three ſeverall judgements are found amongſt men. Some thinke indeed all Pictures and Images to be unlawfull, as well in civill uſe, as in religious; and ſuch are the Turkes by name, if it be truly written of them; whoſe money (they ſay) hath never any Image upon it, but certaine Arabique Letters: their other workes, as Carpets, Coverings, Cuſhions, &c. utterly alſo without any Image of man, or any living creature upon them, and all becauſe they thinke it unlawfull.

Others thinke it lawfull to make any Picture at all, yea, even of God himſelfe; ſo that the ſame be not worſhipped, as a bare Picture and Image. And they underſtand this Commandement of Images made to be adored. Theſe are our Papiſts.

The third judgement and beſt, is of them that thinke it lawfull to make Pictures of things which we have ſeen, to a civill uſe, but not to uſe them in the Church, and for Religion.

Now for the firſt opinion, it is out of all queſtion falſe, and too ſuperſtitious. For howſoever the Turkes receive not ſuch proofe, yet wee that embrace and cleave to the authority of Gods word, know that the Lord hath not left this Commandement, neither any other without large and plaine expoſition in other places of the Scripture, and therefore we are to confer place with place, practice with precept, and ſo to ſee whether indeed all Images be forbidden to bee made, or no?

Firſt then, marke the words in Leviticus, Ye ſhall make you no Idols, nor graven Image, neither reare you up any Pillars, &c. Out of which place thus I reaſon: Look how the Lord forbiddeth the rearing up of a Pillar, and ſo doth he forbid the making of Images, for hee joyneth them here in one prohibition: but he doth not ſimply forbid, and in all reſpects, the rearing up of a Pillar, therefore neither the other. Levit. 26. 1.

The ſecond propoſition is proved thus; Iacob pitched the ſtone on end, that had lyen under his head all night, powred Oyle on it, and calleth it Beth-el, the houſe of God. Ioſuah, commanded by the commandement of God, twelve ſtones to bee pitched up. Samuel Gen. 28. 13. Ioſuah 2.

2 Sam. 7. 12. pitched up a ſtone alſo, betwixt Miſpeh and Shen, and called the name thereof Ebenezer.

Therefore not the rearing up of a pillar, but the rearing up of it to be worſhipped Idolatrouſly was forbidden. Even ſo of Images. For, as I ſaid, they are joyned of God in that place of Leviticus, as things alike equally forbidden.

Ioſuah 21. A moſt notable place alſo for the proofe hereof is that in Ioſuah, where the Iſraelites would have warred upon their brethren, if they had erected that Altar for Religion, which indeed they ſet up for a civill uſe, as there you may ſee.

Exod. 25. Beſides all this, doe we not ſee that God himſelfe commanded the Cherubims, Lillies, Pomegranets, Oxen, Lions, and ſuch like pictures to be made, and ſaith he had given his Spirit to Bezaleel, whereby he might have underſtanding to worke all theſe workes.

Now thinke with your ſelfe, would God either have commanded Images to bee made, or aſcribed the ability to doe ſuch workes to the grace of his Spirit, if in this Commandement given and publiſhed before that time, he had ſimply forbidden the ſame in all reſpects? It cannot be, unleſſe God ſhould be contrary to himſelfe: and therefore the Turkes, or whoſoever elſe ſo thinke, are deceived.

The ſame might yet further be proved by the commandement of God to make the Brazen Serpent, and by Chriſts not finding fault with Cæſars image upon the money that was ſhewed him, and many proofes moe if need were. For the ſecond opinion of them that thinke it lawfull to make any picture, yea of God himſelfe, and to ſet them up in Churches, ſo long as no worſhip is done to them as they are bare Images, there is great cauſe why they ſhould bee gainſaid and reſiſted even in both. But ſpecially in the firſt, for they oppoſe themſelves to the true ſenſe of this Commandement, to divers other plaine Scriptures, to the nature of God, to reaſon, and to the judgements and practice of godly men, as by particular view of every one appeareth.

The ſenſe of the Commandement againſt it.

For touching the true and direct end of this Commandement, it hath beene ſaid before, and is moſt true, that it is chiefly to forbid all Pictures of God, as the moſt groſſe blindneſſe and impiety of all other, becauſe he may not be imagined to be like either man or woman, or any other creature. He never was ſeene, and therefore cannot be painted or pictured like any creature, but with a breach of this Commandement.

Other Scriptures. Deut. 4. 16. Eſay 40. 18. Acts 17. 29.

For other places of the Scripture plainly forbidding the ſame I have quoted them before, and nothing can be more expreſſe.

Nature againſt it.

Thirdly, they oppoſe themſelves to his nature, which is ſuch as no heavenly creature can reſemble, much leſſe any earthly: no naturall thing, much leſſe any artificiall. And to ſet up a picture of God not like him, whether it be to offend him, and to diſhonour him, if otherwiſe we cannot conceive it, let us judge by our ſelves, who quickly would take it in great ſnuffe, if one picturing us, ſhould make either the eyes too great, the noſe too long or high, the eares, mouth, armes, hands, or any thing wrong. Yea, we ſhould burſt it in pieces, bid away with it, and not abide the ſight of it. Yet dare we abuſe the God of heaven, our Creator, and maker, and ſet up twenty thouſand pictures of him in ſeverall places, never a whit like him, for it is unpoſſible they ſhould be, neither one like another. O Chriſt open our eyes that wee may ſee this vanity, and the ſinne of that Church that maintaineth this as good. For truly it is fearefull thus to play with the Lord, whom never eyes ſaw, nor can ſee as he is in nature and being.

Fourthly, they doe againſt all reaſon; for God is a Spirit, and therefore cannot be pictured: God is infinite, and therefore cannot be pictured. God, as often hath been ſaid, was never yet ſeene of any, and then how is it poſſible to picture him? Youth and age, length, breadth, thickneſſe, white or black, this member or that, theſe are not things incident to the Godhead, and therefore impoſſible in very reaſon to picture God.

All practice of the godly againſt it.

Laſt of all, they oppoſe themſelves both to the judgement and practice of the godly in thus doing: for to omit the judgements of the Prophets and Apoſtles ſo lately quoted, crying againſt this impiety; It is very worthy noting, that the ancient Father Damaſcene, a defender of other Images and pictures greatly, yet ſaith: Deum conari velle effingere, rem ſtultam eſſe & impiam: non enim imagines Deus admittit: To goe about (ſaith he) to picture God, is both a very fooliſh thing, and a wicked: for God may not be pictured. And if you marke the practice of the godly, I pray you of all thoſe notable viſions and manifeſtations made unto them, which of them ever went about to make a picture?

Lib. 4. cap. 8.

Surely if they would not ever preſume to picture God in that manner that they ſaw him, and talked with him, becauſe they well knew theſe were but ſparkles, as it were, of his glory and Majeſty that they ſaw, and hee in nature a farre other thing than ever hee appeared unto them, or they able to behold, if hee had done it; how ſhould wee bee ſo bold? Nay, O Lord, what blindneſſe is it in us, to ſet him out as wee liſt our ſelves, and even as every ſinfull man and every rude Painter pleaſeth? Therefore I truſt wee doe ſee this to bee a fault, and even to bee forbidden in this ſecond Commandement, to make any image of God himſelfe.

The

The third opinion of them that thinke there is a lawfull uſe of ſome Images and Pictures, though not in Religion, is moſt true: Otherwiſe were the gift, cunning and ability to doe theſe things by Painting, Carving, Graving, or ſuch like, a wicked thing; when as yet wee heard before, that it proceedeth of Gods Spirit, either in Bezaleel, or whoſoever elſe is endued with it. But then hereupon ariſeth another queſtion; As namely, whether Images and Pictures in Churches may not be had, though we put no religion in them. Whereupon wee may anſwer, that howſoever it be; tolerable in ſome mens opinions, and a thing indifferent to have ſome ſort of Pictures in the Church, for a civill uſe, as either for ſtory, and remembrance ſake, or for ornament and beauty of that place; and may ſeeme to bee warranted by the act of Ioſuah, who ſet a Stone in the Sanctuary of God; and by the deed of Salomon, who had the Pictures of divers things in the Temple, and of the Cherubims in the holyeſt place of all, yet certainly in this matter, it is not ſo good to looke what may be done, as what convenient to bee done. For if in any thing, ſurely in this it is true, Some thing is in ſome ſort lawfull, which is not expedient.

Images in Churches wee well know, have not ever beene uſed, howſoever Rome doth urge the matter; but then began, when as the Idols of the Gentiles being deſtroyed, and peace reſtored to the Churches under Conſtantine, they uſed with great affection and reſort, in certaine places and times, to ſolemnize the memory of ſuch godly Martyrs, as conſtantly for the Truth had ſuffered: ſetting up in their Churches, at theſe their ſolemne meeting, for Ornaments partly, and partly for a better remembrance of their conſtancy and Faith, the Pictures and Images of ſuch dead Martyrs, as eſpecially they judged worthy chiefe remembrance: and this began not to bee any cuſtome, till about the yeare of our Lord 380. as by much authoritie is eaſily and evidently to bee proved. And yet ſee and note it diligently, which indeed is to be marked of us all: Albeit the beginning of Images in Churches, was for no worſe end than I now have named: Yet did the godly Fathers in thoſe dayes, even vehemently ſpeake againſt the ſame, not condemning in it ſelfe, the hiſtoricall uſe of Pictures, but yet wiſhing in ſuch places of meeting to ſerve GOD, as the Churches were, rather priſtinam & primitivam ſimplicitatem; The olde and primitive ſimplicity, than ſuch deckings and ornaments of Images. Juſtly fearing the miſchiefe that indeed followed of it, and now ſo greatly aboundeth in the Church of Rome, to wit, groſſe impiety and Idolatry. Therefore I ſay againe, howſoever in it ſelfe any men thinke it to be lawfull, with ſome conditions, yet certainly it is no way convenient, but very dangerous every way to them in the Churches. The firſt point then of this Commandement, is now ſufficiently explained unto us, if one word bee added of the very firſt beginning of Images, and to what end they were invented.

Anno 380.

Reade the fourteenth Chapter of the booke of Wiſedome, and marke the Story well. The inventing of Idols (ſaith he) was the beginning of whoredome, and the finding of them, is the corruption of life. They were not from the beginning, neither ſhall they continue for ever, &c. Before the Flood wee reade not of them in the Scriptures. And after the Flood about three hundred yeares, lived Terah, Abrahams father, who as hee was the firſt Idolater that we reade of, ſo thinketh Epiphanius, hee was the firſt maker of an Image; and even hee that is meant in the fourteenth of Wiſdome before-named. But whoſoever firſt invented them, and whenſoever they firſt began, it skilleth not much: onely note his judgment that writ the Booke of Wiſdome, whoſoever hee was, how hee plainly affirmeth from the beginning they were not, but the vaine-glory of man brought them in, and the finding of them was the corruption of life. Now, beſides the uſe that there is touched, namely, to mitigate the griefe of a Father for his Childe, other uſes followed. For, Noblemen, wiſe men, and good Common-wealths-men being dead, had at their gates, doores, and other places, ſet up their Pictures, both to honour their memory, and to mitigate the griefe of their friends for their departure.

The originall of Images.

So writeth Valerius of Scipio and Cato, and many other Stories of the like done to other men. Accepta deinde res eſt, (ſaith Pliny) humaniſſima Ambitione per totum orbem: that is, The cuſtome was taken up, even through the world, as it were by a courteous and civill kinde of Ambition. So that the Childe would have his Fathers picture, the Client his good Patron, the Souldier his Captaine, and the Captaine his Souldier, the Field, the Campe, and all circumſtances.

And thus grew it from dead men to living; and that ſometime for honor, ſometime for diſhonor: and from private places, to be ſet up in Churches, from policie to religion, as hath been ſaid and ſhewed before. And thus much of making of Images, and erecting them, either in Houſes or Churches, private or publike places.

The ſecond point generall of this Commandement, is, to conſider the worſhipping of Images, whether it bee lawfull for a Chriſtian man or woman to fall downe before a ſtocke and a ſtone, and to doe it reverence, capping, kneeling, creeping, croſſing, kiſſing, lighting up Candles

Of the worſhiping of Images

Candles to it,and ſuch like, as wee ſee done in the Church of Rome, with great obſervation.

If wee looke the Scriptures of God, we have firſt here a plaine Commandement, Thou ſhalt not bow downe to them,nor worſhip them. Then have we David in plaine words,pronouncing deſtruction to all that doe it, ſaying: Confounded be all they that worſhip carved Images,&c. With a number like teſtimonies. But I paſſe them over,becauſe our adverſaries the Papiſts themſelves, are aſhamed of this their folly and wickedneſſe: But how? Aſhamed (I ſay) to confeſſe it, although they have not grace to bluſh at the doing of it. For what ſay they with one conſent, ſo many as have any wit, but that which their great Doctor,Thomas Aquinas, with many other, ſaith, namely, that Ne imagini quidem Chriſti, in quantum eſt res quædam, puta lignum ſculptum, vel pictum, ulla debetur reverentia,&c. That is, That to the very Image of Chriſt,as it is but an Image, or matter of wood, graven or painted, no reverence is due, &c. And therefore in no caſe they will confeſſe that they doe any worſhip to bare Images. O happy men, if they had grace to ſhame to doe that, which they ſo greatly ſhame to ſay they doe; or Conſcience to take away yet at the laſt,that which they know many thouſands ſtumble and fall at,howſoever a few of them that have learning, can diſtinguiſh betwixt the Image, and the thing repreſented thereby.

Pſa.97.

Summa 3.part q. 25. art.3.

But what is it then that they ſay for the maintenance of their Images, if they deny to worſhip them? But forſooth they ſay,they worſhip not the Image, but God in the Image, and under the Image.

Popiſh ſhifts.

But where, alas, have they their warrant, that God will bee thus worſhipped of them, and that whatſoever they do in outward ſhew to the Image,he will repute it and take it as done in heart to himſelfe? What we have to ſay againſt this vaine device of theirs,I pray you marke. Firſt, the very Gentiles had the ſelfe-ſame excuſe and ſhift for their Idolatry, and yet was their doing wicked. Arnobius ſaith of them, Non adorabant ſtatuas,quòd putabant, æs, aurum, argentum, aut ſimiles ſtatuarum materias, Deos eſſe, ſed quòd per ea, dij inviſibiles honorentur: that is, They worſhipped Images,not for that they thought, braſſe, gold, ſilver, and ſuch things to bee gods,but becauſe by thoſe things the inviſible gods were worſhipped.

Lib. 6.

Secondly, if we looke to the Scripture,we reade a complaint in the booke of Iudges, for that the people left the God of Iſrael and ſerved Baalim,and what, I pray you, was that? Did they thinke that Image to be God? No,ſaith the Prophet Oſee,They have called me Baalim;meaning God, that is, they thought that worſhip which they did to Baalim,was done to God under the Image, and by the Image,and yet ſaith the Word,They did evill in ſerving Baalim. What can be plainer againſt this idle excuſe, if you will looke and marke the places well? Againe, in the ſeventeenth of Iudges we reade of Micah his Idols in the forme of men, as ſome thinke,becauſe Chriſt appeared divers times like a man. And what, did he thinke thoſe his Idols to be God,or worſhip them as gods? No,his own words teſtifie the contrary,for he ſaith,Now ſhall the Lord bleſſe me,when I have a Levite to my Prieſt; he doth not ſay, Now ſhall my Teraphim bleſſe me, but now ſhall the Lord bleſſe me, diſtinguiſhing betwixt God and his Images. So that Micah did not thinke his Idols to be God, and ſo certainly did not worſhip them as God,but in them rather and by them thought he ſerved God,who accepted that to himſelfe,that was done to the Image which repreſented him, yet did he wickedly, and ſinned like an Idolater in ſo doing. How then ſhould this Popiſh excuſe be good of worſhipping God in the Image? I would to God, with modeſty and Chriſtian chaſtity,men and women would think of this reaſon drawne by a godly man, à pari, of the like. Would the husband be content with his wife, or the wife with the husband, if that duty which is due of thē one toward the other, ſhould be performed of either of them to a ſtranger,with this excuſe that the Papiſts make? No,we know we could not beare it, neither would we with any ſuch anſwer be contented. And why ſhould our hearts be ſo hard, and our judgements ſo bewitched, that wee ſhould not thinke the Lord loveth his Church,and every true member of it,as well as any man his wife,or any wife her husband, and is as jealous of that ſpirituall duty,that is due to him,as men are of the other? The one is actuall fornication,the other ſpirtuall,ſo termed even in the wiſdome of God, to beate into us that hee can as ill abide the one, as we the other; and yet we will not ſee,nor conceive. Againe, ſhall we thinke that the Iſraelites were ſo groſſe,as to thinke the Golden Calfe to be a very God, when as they knew it molten,and made of the earings that they plucked off? Truly it is impoſſible. For they knew that it had a beginning, and a God there was who had done great things for them ere that day, whoſe beginning then knew not: How then? Why,out of queſtion they did imagine, that the worſhip that they did to that Idoll,as done to God in the Idoll. And yet whether God was pleaſed with that excuſe or no,judge we all: Let it fall then even in the feare of God what mans head inventeth againſt the Lord in his owne duty, and at the laſt let us ſee it to bee a vaine mocke:to thinke we can worſhip God in an Image, and by it, or under it.

Gſee 2 15.

Iudg.17.

Another ſhift they have for defence of Images in the Church, but it is as ill as the former. They are (ſay they) lay mens bookes,and ſtand in very good ſtead, to put us in minde of God. It is very well. And is every kinde of book then good,and to be allowed of? Or is every manner of of remembrance by and by commendable? If not, then ſhould they not onely ſay they are lay mens bookes, but prove that they are good bookes alſo indeed to that end, for otherwiſe many bookes may as well hurt as profit the uſers of them, as I ſaid. But this they doe not, neither indeed can they doe, and therefore the conſequence they make is nought, and falleth of it ſelfe, if you marke it. Now that they are no good bookes, but very dangerous and deceiving ſights for lay men or other whatſoever, let the Word of the Lord himſelfe be judge. The Prophet Ieremie in zeale of ſpirit deteſteth ſuch bookes, and refuſeth to be put in mind of God by any ſuch deceitfull meanes. For the ſtock (ſaith he) is a doctrine of vanitie, yea they are vanitie and the work of errors, and in the time of their viſitation they ſhall periſh. The Prophet Abakkuk againe ſaith, That the Image is a teacher of lyes, though he that made it truſt in it, &c. Shall then the booke full of lies, vanities and error, be ſo good a booke and remembrance to lay men? Shall that which endangereth the learned, nothing hurt, thinke we, the unlearned? O that wee knew not by experience, into what fond and wicked opinions of God poore people have beene brought, by theſe painted and carved books? How many hearts lament their folly, and how many tongues to the praiſe of Gods mercy in viſiting them with his light, can, and doe tell, what fond conceits they had of the Lord and heavenly matters, ſeduced by the ſight of their eyes? Therefore ſince God hath ſaid it, and experience found it, that they are ſo dangerous, let them be bookes for Pagans and Heathens, ſurely for Chriſtians they ſhould not bee. Which of the Prophets or Apoſtles went about ever to have Images made, either to put themſelves in mind of any thing which the Lord had taught them, or their people of any thing which they delivered to them from the Lord: But they uſed the admonition of their brethren, and eſpecially by writing downe what they taught, they helped this infirmitie of ours. Signifying even by that their practice, what the meanes ought now to be to put us now in minde of God and heavenly things, chiefly his Word. The Lord himſelfe ſaith, Ye ſaw no Image, but heard a voyce onely: therefore make no Image. And againe, You ſaw that I ſpake to you from heaven, therefore ye ſhall make no gods of gold, nor ſilver: As if he ſhould have ſaid, My practice in ſpeaking to you by voyce, and not by Image, ſhould teach you, that by my Word, and not by Image, I am to be remembred. And it is a notable place in Eſay, that when the Word ſhall take place with his, then they ſhall abhorre Images. And thus much both of making them, and worſhipping them.

Eſa.30.21.

Next it doth follow, that wee conſider, how under this outward appearing groſſe Idolatry, are compriſed all deviſed wayes and meanes of our ſelves to ſerve the Lord; yea, even all, bee they never ſo glorious in our eyes, and our intents never ſo good, and godly, and reaſonable, as we think, yet if they be but our owne inventions, not warranted to us in the VVord, here under this name of Images they are contained, and together condemned. So that the very ſenſe of this Commandement is this, as hath before beene ſaid: By no device of their owne, or invention whatſoever will I be ſerved, and namely not by Images erected up to me, or in remembrance of me; but ever at all times, and of all men according to that rule that my ſelfe hath laid downe, and preſcribed onely: You ſhall not doe every man what ſeemeth good in his owne eyes, for in vaine doe men worſhip me with traditions of men. Moſes did nothing in building the materiall Tabernacle, beſide that was commanded and ſhewed him. Nadab and Abihu, the ſonnes of Aaron, dyed for preſuming of themſelves to ſerve the Lord with ſtrange fire.

Generally by no device of man, and particularly not by this. Deut.12. Eſa.29. Levit.10.

The very heatheniſh Romans had this reaſon with them, that it was better for them to bee quite without Chriſt, than to worſhip him, and others with him, againſt his will and liking. And ad placandum Deum ijs opus habent homines quæ ille jubet; that is, To pleaſe the Lord, ſaith Lactantius, men have need of thoſe things that he himſelfe commandeth. And a Chriſtian mind doth not finde a ſure ſtay, but when it heareth, Hoc dicit Dominus, Thus ſaith the Lord. If Saul breake the courſe that God doth appoint, and of himſelfe deviſe to ſerve the Lord, be his neceſſity to doe ſo, as he thinketh, never ſo great, and the intent of his heart never ſo holy-like, certainly Samuel both muſt, and will tell him to his face, he hath done fooliſhly, for the Lord hath more pleaſure in that his will is obeyed, than in all the fatlings of the Amalekites offered up unto him of our owne wils and heads. Intents will not ſerve, neither voluntary religion ſtand accepted. And therefore even let us weigh and follow the counſell of Salomon, and looke to our feete when we enter into the houſe of God, being more ready to heare, than to offer the ſacrifice of fooles, for they know not what they doe.

1 Sam.15.

Eccleſ.4.

Laſt of all, we are to conſider the reaſons that God maketh here: the firſt is drawne of his love towards us, yea of his exceeding great love, which is ever growne to a jealouſie. So dearely, ſo vehemently is his heart ſet upon us, yet not for any worthineſſe in us, that looke how grievouſly a jealous man can take the miſ-behaviour of his ſtraying wife, even ſo ill can the Lord abide that we ſhould impart our ſelves to others, beſide him, in obedience, worſhip and love. Now had we any feeling left within our ſides, & our hearts were not altogether ſo hard trampled and beaten as they are, what a reaſon were this for ever to keepe us knit unto the Lord? VVhy ſhould he love us, why ſhould he care for us, why ſhould he thinke of us, or ever once vouchſafe us good, who of our ſelves cannot thinke a good thought? There is no cauſe but in him.

The reaſons of this Commandement.

himselfe. Yet doth he not onely love us, but is jealous of us. How then should this force us to cleave unto him, to be onely his, and none but his for evermore? Is he ours, and will we not bee his againe? would he only enjoy us, and will not we be tyed unto him? Take heed: The greater love, the greater hate, when unkinde refusall is to reape his just reward. The second reason which the Lord here useth, is drawne of the punishment that will light upon us, if wee breake this Commandement. He will visite the sinnes of the fathers upon the Children unto the third and fourth generation: and sore is that anger, the flame of whose punishment casteth out smoak so farre; yet the meaning thereof is, as Ezechiel well sheweth, if the Children doe follow the fathers wickednesse, and not otherwise. The third reason is drawne of his mercy promised here even to thousands of them that love him and keepe his Commandements. O now that wee would weigh these reasons well, and lay them deepe up in our hearts. Truly if there be any portion of the Spirit of life in us, wee should finde them forcible to give us a taste of the wrath of God against Idolatry, and approaching before him with our owne inventions, what excuses, intents and reasons soever we think we have for the same, we should finde them strong to allure us to the chearfull and diligent seeking of the Lords will out of his Word, and the dutifull and constant serving of him according to that rule. But when we will not weigh his promised mercies, nor give our hearts leave to thinke of his threatned judgements, but headlong in unfeelingnesse runne on, and in blinde ignorance imagine, that our intents, if they bee good, must needs stop Gods mouth, and make him contented with the breach of his will, this, this is the poyson of the Whore of Babylon, that infecteth our soules to eternall damnation and wrath. O God and Father of mercies, disperse this dimnesse, as may stand with thy good will, from the eyes of thy deceived creatures, and yet once ere they die, let them see their sinnes against this Commandement, that in wrath they passe not to greater judgment, so due, and so sure to all wilfull contemners of the light of thy Word and Gospell. Amen. Furthermore, againe if we doe well, marke heare the words of our God, wherewith he uttereth these promises, and threatneth these judgment, truely they afford unto us two or three profitable notes and considerations. As first, because in our devices and worship of our own will, the best we can say, is that it commeth from a good meaning and intent, and therefore we thinke God cannot of his mercy refuse that which is well meant and intended towards him: I beseech you marke how the Lord here overthroweth utterly this defence, saying in expresse words, that they be haters of him, and so led with the liking of their worship from the Lord and his true service, that, when occasion serveth, they bewray extreame hatred thereunto, persecuting it with fire and fagot in the true professors thereof. O my brethren, if God repute me for an enemy, what can my pretended love availe me? If he say I hate him, how dare I (still bewitched with my folly) thinke I love him? Shall his owne mouth tell me, that I hate him, and that he so taketh all my doings, and will I not beleeve it? Is it not possible to make us feele our fault, and to see our sinne in this behalfe? Will we still challenge the Lord with our good intents and honest meanings, as wee thinke, when yet his owne tongue speaketh it, that if I either serve with him any other, as Saints, Angels, Images, or whatsoever, or him alone after any other way, than he prescribeth, I love him not, but hate him, yea even extremely hate him, and shall at his hands find the reward of a deadly enemy to his glory? Now Christ for his mercy sake touch us, and give us feeling. Secondly, let us marke againe in these the comparison of mercy and judgement together, how farre the one exceedeth. His enemies, and haters of his will, hee punisheth but to the third and fourth generation, but sheweth mercy to thousands of them, that love him and keepe his Commandements. Who would not serve then, and onely serve a God of such a nature? Yea, what heart is it that will not seeke to please, according to his will, so good a Lord as powreth mercy so long after his decease upon his off-spring and posterity?

Chap. 18.

If I swarve from Gods Commandements, I hate him, intend what I can.

Last of all, it is very worthy observation, how that speaking here of his Commandements, he placeth love before it, saying he will shew kindnesse to thousands of them that love him, and keepe his Commandements: As though he would have us know, that these two cannot be seperated, but whosoever frameth himselfe to obey the Lord, he must needs love him before, for out of that, as out of his fountaine and proper head floweth the other, not accepted else, nor liked if it doe not, and contrariwise if we doe love the Lord indeed, in truth, in verity, then will wee keepe His Commandements; marke it, His Commandements: hee doth not say, then will we devise this thing, and that thing, with twenty things moe of a good minde & meaning to please God withall, but we will keepe his His Commandements; that is, we will then seeke and search, we will then reade and heare every man, wee will endeavour to be instructed what God in his Word hath prescribed us to doe, and wee will keepe His Commandements. Now then once againe, even as the blood of Jesus Christ is deare unto us, let our Brethren of the Church of Rome, (for so we yet call them in hope of amendment) looke and marke what love of God is in them. Here is a note, and else often repeated in the Scripture, to know their love by. Alas, they devise Lawes, wayes and means every day to serve God withall, of their owne heads, but his prescribed rule in his Word, they utterly contemne and neglect. Now where true love of God is, out of it floweth a burning conſtant care to keepe His Commandements, not our owne. They keepe their owne, and with fire and fagot doe revenge the breach of them; but the Lords Word not ſo: with abſtaining from this meate and that meate, this day and that day, with ſingle life; though moſt impure, with prayers in an unknowne tongue, and thus often repeated over and over, with croſſings and creepings, Paxes and Beads, Holy-water and Creame, Aſhes and Spittle, with a thouſand ſuch things, have they deviſed to worſhip the Lord, and who ſo breaketh theſe, an Heretike he is, a Run-away from the Church, cite him and ſummon him, excommunicate him and impriſon him, burne him and hang him, yea away with ſuch a one, for he is not worthy to live upon the earth: But if he blaſpheme the name of the Lord by horrible ſwearing, if he offend moſt grievouſly in pride, in wrath, in gluttony and covetouſneſſe, of he be a drunken Ale-ſtale, a ticktack Taverner, keepe a Whore or two in his owne houſe, and moe abroad at boord with other men, with a number ſuch like grievous offences; what do they? Either he is not puniſhed at all, and moſt commonly ſo, or if he bee, it is a little penance of their owne inventing, by belly or purſe, or to ſay a certaine of prayers, to viſit ſuch an image in pilgrimage, &c. But all this deſerveth neither fire or fagot. Is not this for that man of ſinne to exalt himſelf againſt all that is called God, or that is worſhipped? Can it be denyed, but that he that puniſheth the breach of his owne lawes, above the breach of Gods Lawes, in that preferreth himſelfe before God? Surely it cannot, it is too plaine, and therefore once againe remember, that the love of God in man or woman, draweth them to the keeping of His Commandements, ſet downe in the VVord, and not of their owne conſtitution deviſed by themſelves. And thus much in briefe of this Commandement.

Read the Lord Cobhams laſt examination in the beginning of it.

The examination of the Conſcience.

NOw, if I would fruitfully meditate and think of theſe Commandements ſecretly, and ſhortly with my ſelfe, as I did of the former, then conſider I, that as in the other, ſo in this alſo, little is ſaid, and much is meant, part is put for the whole, and in the negative the affirmative is implyed. Therefore thus doe I take the Commandement, as if it were ſaid, thou ſhalt not worſhip me with any carnall, earthly, ſuperſtitious or outward deviſed worſhip by thy ſelfe, and namely, not by Images, but in heart, in ſpirit, in truth, as is commanded in my Word. Which when I know, if I would at any time rip up this heart of mine, and diſcloſe unto my ſelfe my ſecret guilt and ſinne herein againſt my God, and carefully conſider, and as I can in minde behold, how I have ever ſerved the Lord, or thought in judgement that he might be ſerved. And peradventure I finde, that living in the dayes of ſuperſtition and blindneſſe, ignorant of God and his truth, for feare and weakneſſe, with others, I have bowed my knee to Baal, worſhipped ſtocks and ſtones, or as I thought, God in them, and even been polluted with groſſe and grievous Idolatry. For which, if it ſo have beene, what can I ſay? Shall ignorance excuſe me? Did I labour then and ever by all meanes poſſible to attaine to knowledge? Or lived I rather careleſly as others did, thinking it good that many followed, and having or ſeeking no better ground of my conſcience, than the practice of my forefathers, Kings and Governours? If of this latter my heart condemne me, how ſhould my ignorance excuſe mee, ſince it was ſo plainly wilfull? Shall good intent or my good meaning ſtand for warrant before God? Ah! how ſhall he that gave me in charge expreſly, that I ſhould not doe what ſeemeth good to mine owne eyes, but what hee commanded, accept for excuſe my wilfull and ſtubborne diſobedience? Neither ignorance therefore nor intent may warrant ſo witleſſe walking before the Lord, but only pardon in Chriſt Jeſus my Saviour. But if either age, which then was yong, or other providence of the Lord have freed mee alwayes from ſo groſſe idolatry, yet ſeeke I further whether with any outward thing elſe whatſoever, not warranted by the Word, I have thought or ſought to ſerve and pleaſe the Lord, being, by reaſon thereof, brought aſleepe with an imagination of my well doing, and ſo careleſſe to ſeek or practiſe the duties of the Word. If I have, this alſo know I to be a breach of this Commandement. Then from things not warranted, I come to things commanded, as the hearing of the Word, Prayer, profitable conference with my brethren, and ſuch like: knowing that if in theſe by the Lord ordained, as things wherewherewith he is honoured & pleaſed, I have otherwiſe uſed my ſelfe, than I ſhould, inſtead of performing the Lords appointment, I have brought before him mine owne invention, walking on wittingly in mine owne wayes, and fearfully broken this precept of my God. Which when I well conſider, I need no further ſhew of grievous guilt to caſt me down from height of all ſuppoſed ſoundneſſe in this law. Mine eyes doe ſee, my heart ackowledgeth, my conſcience cryeth, my ſin is great. Stand O ſoule before the Lord, the juſt and upright Judge, whoſe piercing eye diſcovereth all thy wayes; ſet thy ſelfe now in his ſight, while mercy may bee had, whoſe voyce ſhall ſound thy laſting woe, if ſight of ſin procure not true remorſe. And ſay now ſoule before the Judge of truth, haſt thou alwayes uſed as hee hath willed thee, the hearing of the Word? Did never deſire of worldly praiſe provoke thee to this ſervice? Never diddeſt thou thinke or ſay, ſuch I ſee, and ſhall of them be noted if I goe? Did never feare of worſe opinion to be bred of thee in worldly eſtates by thy abſence, draw thee out? No fleſhly thought, or earthly liking of the ſpeaker hath there been within thee to prick thee to his hearing? Hath painted pride, and new or ſtrange attire never ſaid ſecretly in thee, to day go heare the Sermon? Lye thou maiſt not, the Lord being Judge, cleare thy ſelfe thou canſt not, O my ſoule, thy ſelfe being judge. Therefore that which the Lord appointeth as a ſervice to himſelfe, and for our endleſſe comfort, by this corruption becommeth a ſervice of thine owne, and to thy juſt damnation. For to heare the Lord biddeth, but not for theſe ends. Thus ſerving the Lord in a thing commanded, not as he commandeth, I ſerve him with mine owne invention, and guilty moſt grievouſly I am before him. O that I were any better in the duty of prayer? Am I never negligent, cold and frozen? Burneth the fire with my tongue? Shaketh my fleſh with the vehemency of my ſpirit? Never ſtrayeth my heart from preſent prayer? Never haſte I to an end, or warily wiſh the voyce I heare to ceaſe, it is too long? Ah wretch, how dare I ſay it? Conſcience cryeth, and will not bee bribed, this duty of prayer thus corruptly performed, the Lord acknowledgeth not as a ſervice by him commanded, but as mine owne invention, and a breach of this his precept. My conference with others in ſhew ſo good, in words ſo faire, taſteth it never of liking of my ſelfe, or vaine delight to heare mine owne diſcourſe, of pride to ſeeme and to be knowne a man endued with ſuch and ſo good gifts? Tendeth my heart in truth to the praiſe of my God, and the comfort of my hearers, whenſoever I ſpeake of fruitfull things without all vaine reſpect and hidden evill whatſoever? If it doe not, then the thing that in it ſelf the Lord hath commanded, as I performe it, he utterly abhorreth, and it is will-worſhip of mine owne, not preſcribed duty by my God; therefore a breach of this Commandement. What ſhould I ſay? The more I ſearch, the more I ſee: I am not as I thought concerning the keeping of his Law. Moe things yet in it are commanded, and moe things well by theſe I ſee I have not performed. Thus much ſerveth to ſound damnation to me, and witneſſe ſufficient in dreadfull day ſhall this my guilt exhibite againſt me, beſide a curſe upon my poſterity to many generations. But, O Lord, thy mercy reacheth unto the heavens, and thy faithfulneſſe unto the Clouds. Gracious art thou O gracius God, and full of compaſsion, ſlow to anger, and of great goodneſſe. Were my ſinnes as crimſon, thou canſt make them as white as ſnow: though they be as red as ſcarlet, ſoone canſt thou cauſe them to be as the Woolll. Deare Father have mercy upon me, and bury in the bottome of the ſea (that they never more appeare before thee) all my ſinnes, and by name my breaches of this Commandement. O my God, as thou haſt vouchſafed me a Saviour to quit me from this curſe ſo due unto mee for my diſobedience; ſo in that Saviour of mine, thine owne deare Sonne, looke upon me. He was borne for my ſake, he lived for my ſake, he dyed for my ſake, then let his birth, his life, his death, good Lord, profit mee, in winning pardon of thee for my faults, and direction of thy Spirit for the time to come, that better daily I may know to ſerve thee, and even in truth, as thou haſt preſcribed, performe the ſame unto thee. Amen, good Lord heare me.

The

The third COMMANDEMENT.

Question.

WHat is the meaning of this Commandement?

Answ. God chargeth us in this third Commandement theſe three things. Firſt, that we uſe with moſt high reverence the name of God, whenſoever we either ſpeake or thinke upon him. Secondly, that wee never blaſpheme the name of God by conjuring, witchcraft, ſorcery or charming, or any ſuch like, neither by curſing or banning. Thirdly, that we never ſweare by the name of God in our common talke, although the matter be never ſo true, but only where the glory of God is ſought, or the ſalvation of our brethren, or before a Magiſtrate in witneſſing the truth, when wee are thereunto lawfully called. In which cauſes we muſt only ſweare by the name of God. But as for Saints, Angels, Roode, Booke, Croſſe, Maſſe, or any other thing, we ought in no caſe by them to ſweare.

Queſt. What is meant by the name of God here?

Answ. Not only any word uſually given to him in Scripture, as Iehovah, or ſuch like, but alſo his Majeſty and excellency, with ſuch attributes as declare the ſame, as his wiſdome, his juſtice, his providence, his mercy, and ſo forth. Againe, his Law and Commandements, or his Doctrine and Word, are uſually ſignified by it, to make us more carefull to attend upon them, as things whereupon depend the honour, glory and name of God. Phil. 2. 9. Levit. 22. 31. 1 Tim. 6. 1.

Queſt. What is it to take the name of God in vaine?

Answ. Surely, either to ſpeake or thinke of it without moſt high reverence, and eſpecially to ſweare by it otherwiſe than we ought. Alſo to caſt behinde us the diligent care of his Commandements.

Queſt. Of the latter we ſhall ſpeake hereafter, now in the meane time how prove you that we muſt every way uſe reverently the name of God?

Answ. To name but one place of many, it is proved evidently by theſe words of the Law: If thou ſhalt not feare this glorious and feareſull name, The Lord thy God, then will the Lord make thy plagues wonderfull, &c. That is, if thou doſt not with moſt great feare and reverence uſe the name of God at all times, and ſhew the ſame by keeping and doing all the words of this Law, then will I plague thee to the example of all others, even in thy ſelfe and in thy ſeed, with great plagues and of continuance, and ſore diſeaſes and of long durance. Deut. 28. 52. Verſe 59.

Queſt. How prove you that in ſwearing I muſt uſe his name reverently?

Answ. By neceſſary conſequence. For if I muſt ever uſe it reverently, then when I ſweare by it.

Queſt. The Argument is very good, if it were lawfull to ſweare at all, but the Scripture ſeemeth to deny all ſwearing, ſaying, Sweare not at all, but let your communication bee yea, yea, and nay, nay. Whereupon the Anabaptiſts have thought this Law a ceremoniall Law, and now abrogated. Mat. 5. 33. Iames 5. 12.

Answ. Thoſe places you name are to be underſtood either of common talke, or of ſwearing by creatures, and they doe not in generall condemne all ſwearing. Of this judgement is Auguſtine, who ſaith, In novo Teſtamento dictum eſt, ne omnino juremus, non quia jurare eſt peccatum, ſed quia pejerare eſt immane peccatum: That is, In the new Teſtament we are forbidden to ſweare at all, not becauſe all ſwearing is a ſin, but becauſe forſwearing is an horrible ſin. And in another place, Admonitio non jurandi, conſervatio eſt à peccato perjurii. The admonition in Scripture not to ſweare, is a preſervation from falſe and wrongfull ſwearing.

Queſt. Is it then lawfull to ſweare?

Answ. Yea, it is both lawfull and a glory to God.

Queſt. Firſt, how prove you it is lawfull?

Answ. God in his Law expreſly commandeth us, ſaying, Thou ſhalt feare the Lord thy God and ſerve him, and ſhalt ſweare by his name, therefore it is lawfull. Secondly, God himſelfe and all his children (as occaſion ſerved) have uſed to doe it, and therefore lawfull. God himſelfe (as we reade) Becauſe he had not a greater to ſweare by, ſware by himſelf. And the Patriarkes, Prophets, and Apoſtles, did honour God with this ſervice. We ſee it. Deut. 6. 13. Cap. 10. 20. Heb. 6. 2 Cor. 1. 23.

Queſt. How prove you that it is honour to God?

Answ. By the teſtimonies before cited we evidently ſee, that the thing we ſweare by, wee make it the greateſt of all other, we make it the witneſſe and diſcerner of our truth we meane, and the revenger of falſhood and our fault, if we doe not as we ſweare, all which to be given to the Lord by ſwearing only by him, is a glory to him, and contrariwiſe, a diſhonour to him to aſcribe them elſewhere, ſince indeed they are not incident to any creature.

Queſt. But doe all ſwearers by the name of God, honour God in ſo doing?

Anſw. O no, unleſſe we ſweare as we ought, we diſhonour him greatly.

Queſt. How is that?

Anſw. Firſt, the matter muſt be true, to Gods honour, and the benefit of our brother. Secondly, before the Magiſtrate when we are lawfully called. Thirdly, the name of God muſt only be uſed. And laſtly, our affection ought to be good. The firſt is proved by the oath of Ioſua his eſpies made to Rahab. Againſt which it ſhould be an offence very fearefull, if men having the places of Judges, Juſtices, &c. ſhould miniſter oaths to men in every light trifling cauſe for more ſpeed, becauſe they will not ſtand to ſearch and examine the matter otherwiſe; and ſhould either doe it themſelves, or ſit and heare their ſervants doe it, in ſuch hudling, poſting, and unreverent manner, as that a man can ſcarce tell what he ſaith. Whereas amongſt Chriſtians it were very commendable, if there were ſome pithy and godly admonition (either longer or ſhorter) to adviſe them of the nature of an oath, what honor it is to God, if it be as it ought to bee, and what dreadfull woe it pulleth upon them, if it be otherwiſe. The ſecond is proved by the Law of God, provided and ſet downe to that end. The third is proved by the Prophet Ieremy, by whoſe mouth the Lord complaineth, that therefore he was forſaken of them, becauſe they ſware by them that are no gods. And mark it well: is the Mother of Chriſt a god? Are Peter and Paul, Saint and Angell whatſoever, ſo many gods? Is the Roode a god, the Maſſe a god, your faith and truth a god? &c. Is the body of Chriſt a god? Is his blood a god, his armes, ſide, feet and heart, ſo many gods? If they be not, how ſweare we by them then ſo uſually and fearefully? We heare what God ſaith by the Prophet, namely, that they that ſweare by any thing that is not God, doe flatly forſake the true God himſelfe, and will not we mark it? Shall it not feare us from ſo foule a cuſtome? I hope it ſhall. Laſt of all, that my affection ſhould be good, very reaſon may aſſure me. For if I come to ſweare, not for any care or love to the glory of God, to the truth of the cauſe, and peace and right of my neighbour, but in choller, in malice, for ſpite and envy, certainly, howſoever my oath doth good, yet ſhall the Lord never aſcribe that good to me, but in wrath puniſh me for doing a good thing with ſo evill a minde. Thus then we ſee how we muſt ſweare if God be pleaſed and honoured by us in that action, and how if we doe otherwiſe, we breake this Commandement, and take his name in vaine.

Ioſua 2.12.

Exod.22.10,11 Ierem.5.7. Amos 8.14. Sophon.1.4.

Queſt. One queſtion by the way let me aske you, whether may a Chriſtian admit an oath by an Idoll, having to deale with an Infidell, or no?

Anſw. The Civill Law (they ſay) permitteth ſtrangers to ſweare by their owne gods. Tertullian in the booke of Idolatry, ſaith, we ought not to contend with them overmuch about this matter. Auguſtine in an Epiſtle ſaith plainly, it may be admitted of a Chriſtian, and wee ſee it in the word, that when Iacob and Laban ſware each to other, Iacob ſweareth by the true God, and Laban by the god of Nachar, beſides other examples.

Queſt. Then to goe forward, certain it is that we are not onely bound to the affirmative, that is, every way with moſt high reverence to uſe the name of God, and namely, in ſwearing, but alſo to the negative, no way to pollute his name, and chiefly not in ſwearing. Having then heard how by oathes he is diſhonoured, I pray you what other breach doe you know of this Commandement beſide ungodly ſwearing.

Anſw. Truly Gods name is taken in vaine, diſhonoured, and this Commandement broken, in praying alſo as well as in ſwearing: for if I powre out a ſort of words without feeling, or any burning entire affection, if I draw neare with my lips, and my heart be far away, certainly I abuſe the holy name of my God in ſo calling upon him, and I am guilty of the breach of this Law. For beſide that reaſon teacheth God careth not for lip-labour, it is the rule of the holy Ghoſt, that when we pray, we ſhould pray in ſpirit, that is, with heart and affection.

Prayer.

Queſt. How elſe?

Anſw. Againe, Gods name is taken in vain and polluted, whenſoever it is called upon in conjuring, witchcraft, ſorcery, charming, and ſuch like. For the words of the Law are plain, Let none be found amongſt you that maketh his ſon and his daughter to go through the fire, or that uſeth witchcraft, or a regarder of times, or a marker of the flying of fowls, or a ſorcerer, or a charmer, or that counſelleth with ſpirits, or a ſoothſayer, or that asketh counſell of the dead. For all that doe ſuch things are an abomination unto the Lord, and becauſe of theſe abominations, the Lord thy God doth caſt them out before thee. And many other notable teſtimonies hath your booke quoted in the Margent.

Conjuring. Deut.18.10. &c.

Queſt. Why but in earneſt (to let the reſt paſſe) doe you not thinke much good is done, and may be done by charming, that is, by vertue of ſome wholſome prayers, as a Pater noſter, two or three good Avies and a Creede, or ſuch other good words, either Engliſh or Latine, or any thing elſe in ſignification oftentimes.

Anſw. I anſwer to this queſtion in three degrees. And firſt I ſay, the queſtion is not onely whether any good, (as you terme it) be done, or may be done by a charme, but whether it be or may be done lawfully by the ſame or no, and you heare the word of God plainly condemning the practice of it. Wherefore with what conſcience can we derive health, or any help whatſoever, either to our ſelves or ours by that meanes that God hath ſo fearefully threatned vengeance unto, unto, were we never ſo ſure to obtaine it by the ſame? Secondly, what benefit ſoever we reap by ſuch forbidden meanes, I dare aſſure you (all things conſidered) we get no good, but much harme: For what God will not have done, God is never the author, worker, and cauſe of, properly and directly; but health, or any help to our ſelves or others by charming, the Lord will not have procured, therefore of that health and help ſo gotten, aſſuredly the Lord is neither author, worker, nor cauſe directly. If then not the Lord, who but the devill? and if it be hee, (as moſt aſſuredly it is) then I pray you let us all, men and women thus reaſon with our ſelves: Is the devill our friend or our foe, our welwiller or our enemie? Surely, we cannot be ignorant of it, he is the ſworne enemy of mankinde, the Serpent that in burning malice deceived us once and overthrew us quite, the roaring Lion that rangeth about without any reſt, ſtill ſeeking out whom he may devoure. And will even be that hath even ſworne the woe of us all, and ſeeketh, as Peter ſaith, that is, with all diligence and endeavour, with might and maine, with tooth and naile (as we ſay) with his candle in his hand light, leſt by any meanes we ſhould eſcape him, applyeth his whole power to deſtroy us and to bring us to endleſſe calamity; will he I ſay ever do us any good thinke we, but to the end to infer thereby a greater plague upon us? certainly he will not, for he were not the devill if he ſhould, and we may be aſſured of it, as we are ſure that he hath that name and nature. Then I ſay let us mark. We finde by a charme bodily help in our ſelves or ours. But this would never Satan have done, unleſſe he had knowne that the uſing of meanes forbidden of God, would ſting our bodies and ſoules to eternall death in the world to come. Then ſee ſtill I ſay, and note it, good he doth us in body, that a thouſand times more evill he may worke both to body and ſoule in the day of judgement. Temporall eaſe hee is content to beſtow upon us, that endleſſe diſeaſe, miſery and woe, he may procure unto us. This is moſt true, and now what good doth charming if all things be conſidered? Shall a Chriſtian man or woman ſo hunt for help of body or goods, that they ſhall for it loſe body and ſoule eternally? Shall our health and wealth be dearer to us than the Lords Commandement? God forbid, and therefore let us reſt perſwaded, howſoever we thinke ſuch ungodly meanes procure us good, yet indeed all things conſidered, it is no good: For Satan being our foe will never doe us good but to the end to hurt us more by it, and the breach of Gods Commandement will ring our ſoules a paſſing peale from the face and favour of the Lord. Laſt of all (which eſpecially I thinke you would heare) I deny that by the charme any thing at all is done, whatſoever the words be. For every action muſt have a fit and convenient meanes applyed unto the patient to be done by, but bare words, Pater noſters, Avies, & Creeds, characters and figures are no means appointed of the Lord to doe any cures by, either upon men or cattell, and therefore if any thing be done, aſſuredly it is not done by theſe things as the true and working meanes, but by the devill himſelfe, blearing our eyes by theſe ſhadowes. And this vaine opinion very Ariſtotle could mocke and diſdaine as abſurd and fooliſh: Pliny alſo, with divers others.

Queſt. But how prove you by Scripture that bare words being good words be not forcible to this end?

Anſw. Surely, me thinkes beſide others, that example in the Acts of the Apoſtles proveth it, where we ſee thoſe vagabond Jewes there ſpoken of, uſed as good words as might be, but all to no purpoſe, when the devill liſted not to diſſemble. And therefore wee may ſee it is not the charme that can doe any thing by vertue of the bare words. And you cannot ſay that unto the words come any faith and good minde of the charmer, for faith leaneth upon promiſe, and promiſe annexed to a thing makes it lawfull, but charming hath neither promiſe in word, nor is allowed, but by name expreſly forbidden and condemned.

Queſt. Yet we ſee many things are done by it, and experience daily confirmeth a contrary aſſertion to you.

Anſw. True it is, and I grant it, that by charmes divers are healed, &c. But therefore that they were the very words that did it, it is no conſequence. For other meanes might doe it, and yet nothing apparent to us but the charme. As a witch may hurt me with ſpeaking to mee, not that her words doe it, but ſome peſtilent thing of an infective operation held in her teeth delivered her of her devill to ſuch uſe, as ſome of them at death have confeſſed. Daneus out of Auguſtine.

Queſt. What then is your concluſion touching Charmers, Soothſayers, and ſuch like?

Anſw. Truely this, in ſuch things as I can be aſſured by mine owne true underſtanding or others counſell, they doe by true naturall cauſes and meanes in reaſon effectuall to ſuch an end, I may lawfully uſe the benefit of the knowledge given them of God and ſeeke their help. But where I ſhall know the want of theſe meanes, or but in mine own heart ſuſpect it, ſurely there I may not, there I cannot with a good conſcience uſe them or ſeeke unto them, for the law that willeth a witch ſhould die, being broken of me by uſing ſuch a meanes, ſhall bring greater death to me without repentance.

Queſt. How yet further is Gods name taken in vaine?

Anſw. By raſh and ungodly vowes either made or kept.

Queſt. Whether might the Iewes vow what they would or no?

Anſw. No indeed. But firſt they had a warrant to vow, and then alſo even the thing that they they did vow was warranted. And if they went further than their commiſſion, were their intent never ſo good, it was rejected. Sometimes they vowed in adverſitie, to the end that if it pleaſed the Lord to deliver them, they might not onely in generall, but even in ſpeciall ſhew their gratefull heart to the Lord for the ſame. Thus vowed Iacob at his going to Padan Haran, and many moe in their ſeverall diſtreſſes. And this they did to prevent and ſtay in ſome manner the mutability of their will, and frailty of their nature, which in any griefe eaſily promiſeth to the Lord, but being once freed and ſet at liberty, ſoone forgetteth that ſweet feeling and all ſpeeches that proceeded from the ſame. Sometime in proſperity they uſed to vow for ſeverall ends. As for amplification of that outward ſervice of ſacrifices which then the Lord required, and this was warranted unto them to doe. Firſt-fruits and Tythes warranted alſo, gold and ſilver to the building of the Temple warranted alſo. Sometimes they vowed abſtinency for the ſubduing of the body, warranted alſo. Sometimes men vowed themſelves unto the Lord, as Hanna her Son Samuel, and this her and their deed was allowed of the Lord. But if once they came without a warrant, we ſee their ſervice rejected, were their heart and meaning never ſo good. Example is David promiſing to build the Lord an houſe, with many other. So ever hath the Lord kept man under his hand and direction touching Religion, hating the boldneſſe of man preſuming to invent any ſervice of himſelfe. I anſwer you, therefore I ſay, and you ſee it, that the Jewes might not vow what they liſted, and what they meant well in, but what the Word of the Lord gave them leave to vow.

Levit.7.22. Deut.12. Exod.25. Numb.30. Numb.6.

Queſt. Were they bound ever to keep their vow, if once they had paſſed it out of their mouth?

Anſw. No indeed. But it is marvellous worthy noting the exceeding care that the Lord had, leſt their vowes ſhould become ſnares to their conſciences. Therefore he would not the wives vow to ſtand unleſſe her husband heard and allowed it, nor the daughters without the fathers conſent. And if they vowed a wicked thing he would not have it performed, as we ſee. If an uncleane thing were vowed it might be redeemed. And which is eſpecially to be noted, if a poore man vowed a vow above his ability, being decayed betwixt the time of his vow and the performance, at the Prieſts diſcretion he was releaſed, and not ſnared with the word that had paſſed him once. For all which you ſee a great liberty granted to mans infirmity, leſt by any meanes his mouth might cauſe his fleſh to ſinne, and how it never pleaſed the Lord, that drew ſinne with it in the other hand, as the unchaſte vowes doe of chaſtity in the Church of Rome, with ſuch like. But indeed if they vowed a thing lawfull and warranted, and in their powers without inconvenience to performe, then were the Jewes very ſtraitly bound to performe their vowes, and not otherwiſe.

Levit.27.

Queſt. What ſay you then to the argument of the Papiſts, The Iewes vowed and the Lord accepted them, Therefore we may doe the like?

Anſw. I anſwer, it is a ſenſeleſſe concluſion: For they had warrant, we have none ſo to doe: the things they vowed were warranted, we vow Pilgrimages to this Saint and that, to this Idol and that, we vow to be Monkes, Fryers, Nunnes, to weare this apparell and that, to live ſingle, to abſtaine from this meat and that, with a number ſuch inventions of our owne no where warranted. Laſtly, they were releaſed if any inconvenience grew, our vowes muſt ſtand though body and ſoule periſh for it. Therefore to reaſon from the Jewes vow every way warranted, to the allowance of Popiſh and raſh vowes no way warranted, is abſurd.

Queſt. How yet further is Gods name abuſed?

Anſw. Gods name is yet further abuſed whenſoever it is prefixed before any wicked inſtruments, as the Popes Buls and pardons, which commonly begin thus, In the name of God Amen. So did the ſentences of condemnation againſt Gods children in Queene Maries dayes, pronounced by theſe bloody Biſhops begin alſo, with ſuch other devilliſh inſtruments, before which to ſet the name of God as though he were author and approver of ſuch acts, cannot bee but a fearefull pollution of the name of God, and a breach of this Commandement. Againe, to ſpeake of the name of God lightly and without any due regard thereof in ſports, playes, and paſtimes, when my conſcience telleth me I not once thinke of God, neither is that a right uſe of prayer. Alſo to uſe the phraſes and ſentences of Scripture in jeſt, in deriſion, in mirth unreverently, as a number doe moſt fearefully; ſure it is a grievous breach of this Commandement.

Queſt. And what ſay you of banning and curſing which the booke here nameth, and yet is it uſuall with David as it ſeemeth?

Anſw. Even this alſo in ſome circumſtance is a great evill and forbidden by this Law. For thus we are to weigh this queſtion: the matter either is the Lords or mine owne. If it be mine own in no caſe ever ſhould I curſe and wiſh any evill, but patiently abide the Lords good time to ſee to it. If it be the Lords, then is the party either corrigible or incorrigible and paſt all hope of amendment in mans eyes. If he be corrigible not even in the Lords cauſe ſhould I curſe my brother, but if he be paſt hope in mans judgement, then conditionally may wee pray the Lord either to turne him or to remove him, that no longer he may reſiſt his glory. And to this head are Davids ſpeeches moſt of them to be reduced. Others are pleaſed with this anſwer alſo, that

David had the gift of Propheſie, whereby he might ſee and ſay more than wee may ſafely follow, having not the like gift in us.

Queſt. What if I heare a man commit any of all theſe?

Anſw. Certainly, they that in zeale of heart and love to the offender, doe not rebuke the abuſe of Gods name, as their calling alloweth them, doe alſo ſin againſt this Commandement. So doe they againe that being utterly unworthy, take upon them raſhly or coveteouſly the calling of the Miniſtery, as they alſo who admit ſuch into the ſame. The Prophet is plaine if we mark him in this caſe. And to ſpeake much in a word, that we may ſooner end, by a careleſſe and a wicked life is the name of God greatly prophaned: For the Lord ſaith, you ſhall keepe my Commandements and doe them, neither ſhall you pollute my holy name. Where we plainly ſee that whoſoever doth otherwiſe than God commandeth, polluteth his name. And let ſervants count their Maſters worthy of double honour, ſaith the Apoſtle, that the name of God and his Doctrine be not evill ſpoken of. And more neere goe other places, when it is ſaid, Thou ſhalt obſerve and doe all things, &c. That is, thou ſhalt bend all thy thought and care upon this, how thou maiſt keep my Lawes and Statutes. Whereby we firſt ſee excluded all fained and careleſſe walking in the wayes of the Lord, and that the Lord regardeth him that trembleth at his words. Secondly, we ſee by it not only Atheiſts, but even every one that is not touched with deſire by their good life to glorifie God, to be guilty of this Law. And therefore wee may hereby ceaſe to marvell at the afflictions of thoſe men in whoſe lives we have ſpyed no great outward offence. For albeit they have not greatly to mans eyes offended, yet if they have not obſerved to keep his ſtatutes, that is, carefully feared and fled even from very little breaches, the Lord hath juſt occaſion to puniſh their coldneſſe. Laſt of all, the neglect of thoſe meanes that God hath appointed for welfare either of body or ſoule, is a breach of this Law. For the words and works of his wiſdome may not be refuſed as needleſſe, which were to detract from his wiſdome, but with all thankfulneſſe and readineſſe imbraced, that in ſo doing his wiſdome may be honoured. And thus doe you ſee in ſome part, the breadth of this Commandement.

Queſt. What then remaineth yet to conſider?

Anſw. Theſe words (thy God) are not to be paſſed over without ſome profit to us: and very well may we ſee in them that our obedience ought even in this Commandement alſo to proceed of love, and love ought to make us moſt carefull to pleaſe the Lord. Then are wee to weigh the reaſon annexed, namely, that the Lord will not hold him guiltleſſe that taketh his name in vaine, which is as great a threatning as may be. For all our help ſtandeth in this, that the Lord in Chriſt pardoneth us and will not charge us with our faults, which if hee will not doe, but enter into judgement with us, needs muſt we dye, and abide eternall woe. Therefore how ſhould this reaſon move us all and ever to a reverent regard of his name?

The examination of the Conſcience.

Queſt. NOw then I pray you, as in the former, ſhew mee how I may fruitfully uſe the cogitation of this diſcourſe?

Anſw. In the examination of our ſelves by this Commandement, what ſhould we do, but even lay before us, as with one ſight we may ſee then fully the ſeveral branches now repeated of the ſame, carefully weying in what caſe we ſtand, if we ſhold be judged according to them? And firſt to begin with falſe & vain ſwearing, where is that man or woman that can excuſe themſelves in it? Hath there never paſſed an oath from me in all my life, but before the Magiſtrate when I was lawfully called thereunto? Yes, yes, God knoweth both often and grievouſly hath my ſin appeared in this behalfe. My ſpeech hath not bin yea, yea, and nay, nay, as it ſhould have bin, but bitterly and vehemently, earneſtly, and ungodly hath this tongue of mine added more. Yea, (which was madnes now I ſee) I have ſought to get and keep my credit with mortall man by ſwearing, and to loſe it with my God by ſo offending. But O curſed credit ſo gotten, where were mine eyes, where was my underſtanding? Whether is it better for the preſent time of men to be beleeved, and of the Lord for evermore abhorred; with light ungracious people, with whom oaths be only truth, to abide a little deniall, & of God my God ever for my obedience to be loved? Yet have I, witleſſe wretch made choice of the former many a time, & neglected the latter. For, ſworne I have often to be beleeved, when I ſhould have abſtained, of God to be loved. If any rebuked me, it was unſeaſonable, it was unſavory ſure I am, I liked not of it, and ſure I am I amended not by it. Nay, have I not either excuſed oathes to be no oathes, but affirmations, or openly evill ſpoken of ſo good admonition, or, at leaſt ſecretly in my heart diſdained with ſcorne, and judged it fooliſh and preciſe curioſity? What hath any man to doe with mee? Let every veſſell ſtand upon his owne bottome, if I ſinne it is worſe for me, amend your ſelfe and carke not for others. Theſe have been our ſpeeches and ſuch like; I feare me, in the impatiency and ignorance of our hearts, and therefore of ſwearing to ſay no more, ſinned we have, and excuſe we want, the Lord grant pardon to our treſpaſſe. If I looke at the reſt, am I able to ſay I am not guilty in them? No, no, not I, nor any fleſh living, I am ſure of it, but that the Lord for ſinne will not let us ſee our ſinne, weigh our ſinne, nor grant us judgement to diſcover our guilt. For what man or woman may not the righteous God ſummon to his high court and ſay, Thou art faulty of taking my name in vaine by praying? Alas for my ſelfe, I ſee it in the time of mine ignorance I have pattered often with cold affection, for peradventure I knew not what I ſaid, thinking the deed done to be ſervice liked, and the words pronounced all to be well. And even now ſince the Lord hath opened mine eyes that I know it to be ſin to pray without attentive minde upon the thing I doe, and without ardent affection, yet how hard it is to doe it ever, and never to ſwarve or ſtray, I finde it, yea even impoſſible to my corruption. For this thing and that thing is Satan ready to trouble ſo fruitfull an exerciſe withall, and a thouſand wayes he hath to make the minde to wander from the thing it onely ſhould attend. If affection bee good, attention faileth: and if attention ſtand, affection dyeth. And therefore ſeeing that even reaſon teacheth me, that to call upon the name of God not as I ought to do, is plainly to abuſe his name and take it in vain, neither in this point can I cleere my ſelfe, but broken herein alſo I have this his Commandement. What vaine vowes and promiſes have paſſed from me needleſſe to be made, and fruitleſſe too to be kept? For ſorcery and witchcraft, charming and conjuring, am I able to ſay I have as earneſtly abhorred them as I ought, and every way ſo abſtained from them as I ſhould? Nay, hath not rather eaſe beene ſought in paine of me by theſe meanes, or at leaſt wiſhed if I could have gotten them? My ſelfe and my friends; my children and goods, have I loved obedience more than them? Or hath not ever ſome baſe creature, as ſwine or ſuch like, been dearer to me than the Lord, ſeeking by charme to ſave the one, and not fearing by ſin to loſe the other? God ſift not my guilt even now in this: for practice or will, for my ſelfe or for others, will ſurely accuſe me.

Praying, or ſinging.

Vowes.

Charming.

Further, and beſide all theſe, let it be well weighed of any Chriſtian heart that feareth God indeed, and carefully ſeeketh the credit of his name, how often unreverently in ſporting and playing, in ſhooting and bowling, in dicing and carding, we uſe his name, how the phraſe of Scripture will rowle out of their mouthes in jeſting and light conferences, how fearefully wee uſe him in curſing and banning our brethren, and ſurely he ſhall ſee no ſmall guilt touching this Commandement in every one of us, if God in juſtice weigh us in the balance, and reward us as hee findeth weight of ſinne full duly to deſerve. Where is that happy man or woman, ſo waking and ſleeping, ſo ſitting and going, ſo ſpeaking and keeping ſilence, ſo living and dying, as for no ſinne of theirs, for no infirmity, for no ſlip or fall, the name of God and truth hath been evil ſpoken or thought of? Let this man and woman appeare and boaſt that in great meaſure they have kept this Commandement. But if none ſuch can be found, whoſe frailty hath not foſtred in reprobate mindes a miſliking of good things, then let all fleſh fall downe before his footſtoole, and ſue out pardon, for that living ſo looſely they have taken his name in vaine and broken this Commandement. Laſt of all, if we caſt our eyes about, and conſider a little the manifold meanes provided by the Lord to doe us good in body and ſoul, and every way, are wee able to ſay wee have neglected none, but ever uſed them as wee ought, reverently, carefully, and with thankſgiving? Hath never an unprofitable baſhfulneſſe made us conceale our bodily griefe, or refuſe the meanes thought meet to doe us good? Hath not careleſſe contempt robbed us of the remedy appointed for our ſoules? And hath not unthrifty ſelf-will rejected meanes to encreaſe creaſe our worldly eſtate? If theſe all or any be true, wee have deſpiſed the wiſedome of the Lord, which appeareth in theſe things, and ſhould be magnified by them, & in them; we have polluted his name our ſelves, greatly occaſioned others to thinke lightly of good things, and grievouſly guilty we ſtand before him for it, of the breach of this Commandement. What ſhould I ſay of not rebuking others according to our place, whom we have noted to offend in any of theſe, which is a thing, as hath been ſaid, required alſo in this Law, and therefore a thing that reſting in us, doth crie for vengeance, though in all the reſt we were pure and innocent? For we were not borne for our ſelves, but alſo for others: and the body, the ſoule, the goods, and eſtate of our brethren ſhould be deare unto us, we not ſeeing and ſuffering them by our wils to doe the thing that we know will hurt them. What I ſay ſhould I ſpeake of this, many other branches yet remaining? Doe we not ſee alreadie ſhame enough and grievous ſinne in great abundance? Where were we now then even for theſe that have beene named, if the pearcing eyes of the living God ſhould prie into us, and with juſt reward ſeek to pay the wants he could eſpie in us? Could we eſcape the pit of endleſſe paine? Speake in the feare of God even what you ſee, Are you pure and blameleſſe in theſe all? Dare you ſtand out and make the challenge, Come judge and ſtay not, ſift me and ſpare not, thy tryall I feare not, for all theſe have I kept from my youth? O ſinfull fleſh eſpie thy caſe. Thou canſt not, thou maiſt not, and I know thou dareſt not, unleſſe the dreadfull wrath of God have ſealed up thy ſight. And therefore even in this Commandement alſo, as in the former, crie rather up to Heaven with ſhrilliſh ſhrike, Waſh me O Lord from theſe my ſinnes, and cleanſe me from my wickedneſſe. Have mercy upon me, O gracious God, and according to the multitude of thy mercies doe away mine offences. O ſweet Saviour, who may not ſee what he is without thee? Full heavy laden I come unto thee Chriſt my deare God, as thou haſt promiſed, refreſh and eaſe me. Amen, Amen.

The fourth COMMANDEMENT.

Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day.

Queſtion.

WHat is the meaning of this Commandement?

Anſw. Your booke anſwereth, that the hallowing of the Sabbath day, is to reſt from our labours in our calling, and in one place to aſſemble our ſelves together, and with feare and reverence to heare, marke and lay up in our hearts, the Word of God preached unto us, to pray altogether that which wee underſtand with one conſent, and at the times appointed to uſe the Sacraments in faith and repentance, and all our life long to reſt from wickedneſſe, that the Lord by his holy Spirit may worke in us his good worke, and ſo begin in this life everlaſting reſt.

Queſt. Had not the Iewes divers feaſts beſide this Sabbath?

Anſw. Yes indeed. Some of God immediatly appointed, and ſome by themſelves upon ſpeciall occaſiõ. By the Lord they were tyed to three ſolemne feaſts in the year, at which he would have all the males to appeare before him. To wit, The feaſt of unleavened bread, that is, Eaſter, or the Paſſeover, in remembrance how the Angel paſſed over their houſes, when in one night he ſlew all their firſt borne in Ægypt both of man and beaſt. The feaſt of the harveſt, of the firſt fruits of their labours which they had ſowne in the field, which was Whitſontide, or Pentecoſt, in remembrance of the Law that was given fifty dayes after their departure out of Ægypt. And the feaſt of gathering fruits in the end of the yeare, when they had cleanſed the fields, this was the feaſt of Tabernacles, putting them in minde that forty yeares they dwelled in Tents and Tabernacles in the Wilderneſſe. Beſides theſe they had the firſt day of the moneth, the ſeventh yeare, the Jubile, and ſuch others. The feaſt of the Macchabees, the remembrance of deliverance by Heſter, and ſuch others had they then againe appointed by themſelves.

Queſt. And even of this feaſt of the Sabbath, as I doe thinke; there were divers kindes: were there not?

Anſwer.

Exod. 23. Levit. 25.

Anſw. By that which hath beene ſaid, it partly appeareth ſo. For indeed they had every ſeaventh day a Sabbath, and that was called the Sabbath of dayes; they had every ſeventh yeare a Sabath, and that was called the Sabbath of yeares. Then reckoned they ſeven times ſeven yeares, which was nine and forty, and the fiftieth yeare was their Jubile. They had alſo their great Sabbath, as when the Paſſeover fell on the Sabbath day, as it did when Chriſt ſuffered. For it is there ſaid, that the Sabbath was a great day. But paſſing over theſe thus named by the way, this Commandement occaſioneth us to thinke onely of the Sabbath of dayes, and to conſider therein what remaineth, and what is taken away. Where mark firſt, that both in the Sabbath, and other feaſts, they were preciſely tyed to certaine circumſtances of time, as what day, in what moneth, how many dayes together, when begun, when ended, what feaſts onely at Hieruſalem, what elſe-where, with what rites and orders, & ſo forth. And for this Sabbath of dayes that this Commandement ſpeaketh of, ſo preciſe reſt was required in it, that further than a Sabbath dayes journey, they might not travell in it, they might not bake, nor ſeethe any meate, nor ſo much as gather any ſtickes to doe it withall, Now conferre and lay unto theſe places thus ſtrictly tying them, the words of Paul to the Galathians, Yee obſerve dayes, and moneths, and times, and yeares. Dayes, as the Sabbath, new Moones, &c. Moneths, as the 1. and the 7. Times, as Eaſter, Whitſontide, Tabernacles, &c. Yeares, as the 7. and the 50. &c. Which beggerly rudiments are moſt pernicious to them which have received the ſweet liberty of the Goſpell, thruſting them back unto ſuperſtitious bondage againe. I am afraid of you, ſaith Paul, &c. Therefore if wee marke this coherence of Scriptures and times, wee evidently ſee the caſe ſtandeth not now under the Goſpell touching this Sabbath, as then it did. Marke againe the ſame Apoſtle to the Coloſſians: Let no man (ſith he) judge you in meate or drinke, or in reſpect of an holy day, or of the new Moone, or of the Sabbath dayes, which are but ſhadowes of things to come, but the body is in Chriſt. Therefore you ſee a change. Adde hereunto, and marke the practice of Chriſt, who indeed not refuſing all uſe of their Sabbath and feaſts, at the firſt did both himſelfe teach and bee preſent at other exerciſes in the ſame. But yet that he might ſhew that he did not that of neceſſity. (as in former time it was done) now and then would hee both by word and practice inſinuate an abrogation or a change of the ſame from the former eſtate under the Law, as by theſe words; The Sonne of man is Lord alſo of the Sabbath: and againe, by defending his Diſciples when they had plucked and rubbed the eares of corne on the Sabbath day: healed on it, and preached other dayes beſide that day, &c. By all which I ſay it may well appeare, that there is not the ſame eſtate of the Sabbath now under the Goſpell, that was of it under the Law.

Exod. 16. 29. Chap. 3. 53. Num. 15. 4. 70.

Ver. 16.

Mat. 12. 8.

Queſt. How then I pray you ſtandeth it now?

Anſw. There was in this Commandement touching the Sabbath ever ſomething ceremoniall. Whatſoever is morall remaineth ſtill to us as much to be obſerved as ever of them: and whatſoever then was but ceremoniall, that is now by Chriſt taken away, and wee freed from it. As for example, to have ſome day in the ſeven to ſerve the Lord generally in, that was morall and remaineth ſtill, binding us unto it, as alſo to reſt that day from all labours, letting the courſe of piety and ſanctification that that day ought to bee kept. But to have preciſely the Saterday, and to reſt ſo ſtraightly from all labour as they did, that was but ceremoniall and a ſhadow, and therefore now abrogated by the comming of the body of Chriſt.

Queſt. Yea, but even the day alſo now in our Church is changed from Saturday to Sunday.

Anſw. Truth it is, and for that matter marke and conſider in the Scriptures, that as Chriſt in his time, ſo after him his Diſciples in their time, did beare a while with the infirmity of the Jewes, and taught on the Sabbath, and Paul haſted to Ieruſalem againſt the feaſt of Penteeoſt; yet ſo, that ever ſtill they inſinuated a freedome by Chriſt, and therefore daily alſo met, &c. But when as falſe teachers vehemently urged a neceſſitie thereof, to ſhew the freedome by Chriſt from dayes and times, then indeed ſtood they againſt it, and changed even the very day quite and cleane.

Queſt. But did the Apoſtles indeed themſelves make this alteration of the day?

Anſw. How ſhould we otherwiſe thinke, when wee conſider theſe and ſuch other places? Firſt it is ſaid in the Acts, that the Diſciples being come together the firſt day of the weeke to breake bread, Paul preached, &c. Now the firſt day of the weeke with the Jewes was Sunday, immediately following their Sabbath, wherein they uſed not to receive the Sacraments and heare the Word preached ordinarily, yet here we ſee the Diſciples did, and not on the Sabbath, which was but the day before: therefore you ſee a change of the day even by the Diſciples. Againe, to the Corinthians, Paul commandeth that the collection for the poore, which was a work of the Sabbath, ſhould be made every firſt day of the weeke, that is, on the Sunday, as we call it. And therefore wee plainly ſee what day they celebrated and met upon, having their ſolemne aſſemblies, namely, on this our Sabbath, laying aſide quite the Jewiſh ceremony. And it addeth alſo farther ſtrength to this, that Iohn ſaith in his Revelation, calling this our Sabbath day the Sunday, Dominicum diem, The Lords day. All or any of which teſtimonies if we would ſeeke to delude, beſide the judgements of them that have noted theſe places, the hiſtoricall teſtimony of thoſe thoſe dayes, and ſince will prevaile. For in Euſebius wee reade it, the witneſſe of Dionyſius the Corinthian, that in thoſe dayes they celebrated for holy the Lords day. Tertullian, naming the ſolemnities of the Chriſtians, beginneth firſt with the Lords day, which they celebrated, and ſheweth their exerciſes. Iuſtinus Martyr nameth the ſame day, and ſheweth the workes. Ignatius againſt ſome that being Chriſtians would retaine the Jewiſh Sabbath, ſaith in plaine termes; We celebrate no longer the Jewiſh Sabbath, but every one that loveth Chriſt, keepeth now holy the Lords day, being honoured with his reſurrection. The like witneſſeth Auguſtine, Cyril, and even all antiquity. And therefore though we ſee not the very time definitely named when this Sabbath was changed, yet we ſee it was by the Apoſtles in their times, and therefore hath credit enough.

Euſeb. lib. 4. Cap. 23. Lib. de Idololatria. Apolog. 2.

Now, the holy Church of Rome that would by this alteration made by this Primitive and pure Church challenge authority and liberty to change and doe what they liſt, ſurely wee muſt deny their conſequence, till ſuch time as they breed in us by good proofe that credit of their ſpirit, that we have, and ought to have of the Apoſtles that made this alteration of the Sabbath from Saterday to Sunday.

Queſt. This ſatisfieth me for my part touching the alteration of that which was but ceremoniall in this Commandement, namely, the day and the preciſe reſt in it, neither can it be otherwiſe than abſurd for any falſe Church, only under a title and an uſurped name of a Church to challenge authority to doe matters both contrary to piety and comlines, becauſe the true Church of God hath done what was moſt agreeable to them both. But now as I ſee the bond unto any particular day onely, and to ſuch ſtrict reſt in the ſame, as the Iewes obſerved, is taken away by Chriſt: ſo yet ſee I what is morall remaineth, namely, a day in ſeven, and a certaine reſt in the ſame. Wherefore I deſire as well to know the reaſon of the remaining of the one, as I have the cauſe of the abrogation of the other: and therefore firſt I pray you why have we ſtill yet a Sabbath, and ſhall have till the end of the world? and ſecondly, what reſt and exerciſes are therein required?

Anſw. The ends of the remaining of a Sabbath yet ſtill in the Church of God, are chiefly three. Firſt, that we might have a kinde of reſemblance and forme of eternall reſt from ſinne in the Kingdome of God. Secondly, that by this meanes ſervants and cattell might bee provided for againſt the cruell greedineſſe and inſatiable covetouſneſſe of ſome maſters and owners. And laſtly, Eccleſiaſticall diſcipline and ſome eſtate of a Chriſtian common-wealth in performing to the Lord joyntly together demanded duties, might this way be eſtabliſhed.

Maſter. N.

Queſt. Of every one of theſe I pray you ſeverally, for more plainneſſe, and firſt, what is that ſpirituall reſt and ſanctifying of the Sabbath, which layeth before us a reſemblance of eternall reſt?

Anſ. That is, when reſting from worldly buſineſſe, and from our owne workes and ſtudies, wee yeeld our ſelves wholly to Gods governance, that he may doe his worke in us, and when (as the Scripture termeth it) we crucifie our fleſh, we bridle the froward deſires and motions of the heart, reſtraining our owne nature that we may obey the will of God. For thus doing, our Sabbath day here upon earth ſhall moſt aptly expreſſe a figure and likeneſſe of the eternall and moſt holy reſt which we ſhal for ever enjoy in heaven. Yet ever muſt we know, that theſe things are not to be done onely on the Sabbath, but even all our life long, every day of every private man, and this one day is appointed chiefly above the reſt, for our negligence and weakneſſe ſake onely, without which ſuch appointment it is greatly to bee feared ſome would never doe it.

Queſt. And is this ſpirituall reſting from ſinne indeed neceſſary in every one that will as hee is bound, ſanctifie the Sabbath?

Anſw. Surely, it is even ſo neceſſary, as that without this all our other reſting, putting on our better apparell, going to the Church, hearing ſervice, &c. is nothing but even abhorred of God, and deteſted. This is a great matter, if wee had grace to conſider of it, yet nothing but plaine and open Scripture: For what ſaith the Prophet Eſay? Bleſſed is the man that doth this, and the ſonne of man which layeth hold on it: he that keepeth the Sabbath and polluteth it not, and keepeth his hands from doing any evill. See what it is to keep our hands from doing any evill, that is, to ceaſe from ſinne, and our owne wayes. Againe, the ſame Prophet in another place: If thou conſecrate the Sabbath as glorious to the Lord, and ſhalt honour him, not doing thine owne wayes, nor ſeeking thine owne will, &c. And in his firſt Chapter alſo, I cannot ſuffer your new Moones, nor Sabbaths, nor ſolemne dayes, (it is iniquity) nor ſolemne aſſemblies, my ſoule hateth them, &c. And why ſo? The reaſon followeth in the next words, For your hands are full of blood; that is, you abſtaine not from ſinne, remaine ſtill in avarice, deceit, cruelty, extortion, and ſuch like, which as long as you doe, howſoever you ſeeme to ſanctifie the Sabbath, I abhorre you and your doings. And then followeth notably a deſcription even of this ſpirituall reſt: Waſh you, make you cleane, take away the evill of your workes from before mine eyes, ceaſe doe evill, learne to doe well, ſeeking judgement, relieve the oppreſſed, judge the fatherleſſe, defend the widow, &c. Many other ſuch places are there.

Eſa. 58. 13.

Eſa. 1. 13, 14.

Queſt. Now I pray you of the ſecond end and uſe of the Sabbath a little alſo.

Anſw.

Answ. That was, and is, as hath beene ſaid in regard of ſervants, and the bruite beaſts, who are to have mutuall reſt from their travell, which yet ſome cruell inſatiable wretched miſers would hardly have granted, had not God inſtituted this day both for man and beaſt to reſt. This that I ſay is evident in the words of this Law, and therefore it needeth no further proofe. But let us thus profit by it. Firſt, it doth wonderfully ſhew the goodneſſe of God, who neglecteth nothing that he hath made, but carefully provideth for the welfare even of bruite beaſts. O faithleſſe hearts, if we can doubt the goodneſſe of our God to us, when we here before us ſee his care for thoſe creatures whom hee hath made us Lords of! Secondly, it well teacheth us what nature, pietie, and charitie requireth at our hands touching our ſervants and cattell. Nature ſaith,

Quod caret alterna requie, durabile non eſt.

What wants his mutuall reſt and eaſe, ſtill toſt in paine and ſtrife, Cannot continue long that courſe of labour, or of life.

And therefore Nature hath appointed as well the one as the other for creatures, and willeth that ſenſeleſſe hearts in us ſhould not break the ſame. Piety willeth that we ſhould let them ſerve God on this day as well as our ſelves, yea, even ſee that they doe it, Who are all one with us in Chriſt, made of the Sonne of God, redeemed with the ſame price, ſubject to the ſame hell if they doe not, &c. Charity requireth that we ſhould have a feeling of the paines of our ſervants. Thankfulneſſe would acknowledge the mercy of God, in making me Maſter and him ſervant, when he could have done otherwiſe if it had pleaſed him. And to conclude, if this reſt we deny either to ſervant or cattell, we ſhew there is no regard of nature in us, no pietie, no charitie, no thankfulneſſe to God for our eſtate, but the contraries of all theſe. I would to God men would carefully thinke of this, who upon every occaſion can finde in their heart to ſend horſe and men, cart and carriage to and fro on the Lords day moſt wickedly. Aſſuredly, it will have a ſmarting recompence in the end.

Deut. 5. Cap. 15.

Queſt. The third and laſt end of the Sabbath, yet remaineth, touching reſt and exerciſes required. I pray you what reſt are we bound unto, and what ſpeciall exerciſes on this day?

Anſ. Concerning the former it hath beene ſaid before, that there is required of us this day a reſting from our proper labours in our calling, as your booke ſaith, ſo farre as they are hinderances to that ſanctifying of the Sabbath, that is required of us. For in it thou ſhalt doe no manner of worke, &c. That is, no manner of worke that thou canſt not doe, and attend alſo to the exerciſes commanded for the Sabbath; as the Artificer cannot work in his ſhop and go to Church to pray and heare, the Countrey-man cannot both ſerve the Lord with his neighbours at home as he ought, and ſerve to his Chapmen his ſold corne in the weeke dayes alſo, &c. Therefore from theſe we muſt abſtaine.

Now for the ſecond thing, namely, the exerciſes demanded at our hands, many they are, and hard of me are many to bee either named or eſpied, ſo large is the Law of the Lord. But as I can I will lay before you ſome of them. And firſt to begin withall, for as much as without knowledge of God there is no love of God, without love no faith, and without faith no ſalvation by God, therefore it is a work or exerciſe of the Sabbath, a duty that we are ſtraitly bound unto, in that day to attend to the knowledge of God, by aſſembling our ſelves together into one place, and there with feare and reverence to heare, mark, and lay up in our hearts the Word of God read or preached unto us.

Queſt. How prove you this?

2 Reg 4. 23. Anſw. Doe you not remember the ſpeech of the Shunamites husband to her, when her child being dead ſhe deſired an Aſſe to be ſadled that ſhee might goe to the man of God: what wilt thou doe with him to day, ſaith he, ſince it is neither new Moone, nor Sabbath day? Whereby you may plainly ſee, that on thoſe holy dayes they carefully reſorted to the Prophets to be inſtructed in the will of the Lord.

In the Acts of the Apoſtles againe thus we read, that The firſt dayes of the weeke, that is, on the Sabbath day, the Diſciples being come together to breake bread, Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow, and continued preaching till midnight.

Acts 13. 16. Read Luke 4. 16, &c. to the 21. verſe. Mat. 13. 23. In another place, After the Lecture of the Law and the Prophets, the Rulers of the Synagogue ſent unto them: ſaying, Ye men and brethren, if ye have any exhortation for the people, ſay on: with a number moe ſuch places. Wherby evidently we ſee the manner of keeping holy the Sabbath in thoſe dayes. Yet is not the going to the Church and outward hearing of the Word all, but they are The good ground that heare the Word and underſtand it, bearing fruit, and bringing forth ſome an hundred fold, ſome ſixtie, and ſome thirty.

Queſt. Theſe places are plain touching the cuſtome of Gods children in times paſt, and beſide theſe very reaſon would teach us, that if God hath of ſet purpoſe in great wiſdome appointed one day generally of all men and women to be obſerved; ſurely, he would have on that day none to lurke at home in an hole, withdrawing themſelves from God, from his Word, from their brethren, and from all cōmanded exerciſes on this day: and therefore in my opinion our Recuſants (as we call them) that is, our refuſing fusing Papists to com to Church, doe greatly offend, I pray you what think you?

Answ. I settle no sentence of them, but what the dreadfull voice of the eternall Judge shall pronounce upon them in his generall day to the horror of body and soule everlastingly in the boyling heate of unquenchable fire, unlesse they repent, see and amend their intolerable obstinacy against the Lord. For can it be that the Lord should pronounce accursed all them that keep not every tittle of his Law, and yet not punish them that prophane his Sabbath by withholding themselves from the congregation, refusing appointed duties by God himselfe, and at home or abroad, in this corner and in that, under this hedge and that, patter to themselves, what God knowes they understand not, and therefore consequently what the Lord detesteth, and will assuredly charge them withall as sin in that day of his? How can we heare these examples of Gods children, purposely set downe in his Word to teach us, and our selves performing no such duty, yet boldly presume of mercy? what the best of them with all their learning could say for defence of this their folly, have we not heard, and may we not read? Too childish and frivolous are their reasons to justifie so great impiety. I refer you to the reading of them your selves, together with the answers made unto them by the godly. This only my selfe I say, that if I were a Papist and had to this day refused to come to the Church, to receive the Sacrament, &c. yet I assure you now seeing the weake grounds of those Doctors, (for more than one had their heads about them, though one beare the name) I would begin to looke better about me, and never pin my everlasting estate in paine and blisse, upon so slender and ungodly perswasions of perverse men. But what should we speake of reason which truly they have not of their deniall? God and many a conscience of theirs know full well, that it is not any impiety which they are able to charge our prayer or preaching withall, but a secret sworne or promised obedience to the forraign Antichristian power of Rome, without knowledge what they doe, blindly consenting to doe as others doe, and have done, for vaine glory and worldly speech amongst a few of their own pack, that maketh them obstinate against the Lord, despisers of his Sabbath, rebellions against their lawfull and most gracious Prince and his Lawes, unkinde contemners of the counsell of their deerest friends, breakers of their hearts whose lives they ought to love, increasers of their woe whose paine and griefe they should never wish to see, and finally, even every way to God, to Prince, to Country, to friends, and their owne soules enemies most dangerous and pernicious. The Lord Jesus Christ open their eyes, touch their hearts, and confirme their practice of behaviour to his will, if it may stand with his good liking.

Quest. I pray you now goe forward in recitall of the exercises of the Sabbath.

Answ. Secondly, beside the diligent hearing of the Word preached on this day, and reade unto us, it is our duties, and a godly exercise fit for the day, amongst our selves, and with our Pastor and Preacher, to conferre and talke of that which hath been said, and to ask questions how this and that is to be understood. Such examples have we in the Gospell, where it is said, that when Christ was alone, they that were about him with the twelve, asked him of the parable which before he had uttered, & he readily expounded the same unto thē. Then uttered he more, and without Parables (saith the Text) spake nothing unto them, but he expounded all things apart to his Disciples. Marke 4.10. Vers.34.

Thirdly, to receive together the Supper of the Lord, as wee are commanded, and the Church ever accustomed to do. To attend unto Baptisme, (if occasion so serve) duely pondering the promise that is past us, to serve the Lord, and praying faithfully for his guiding grace to be powred upon our selves, and also on those infants then presented to the Church, that they and wee may ever fulfill what we have vowed before the congregation. Fourthly, from a true feeling heart of Gods received goodnesse, to give him thankes on this day, for his many and great mercies upon body and soule, at home and abroad, upon our selves and ours, knowne and unknowne, bestowed the weeke passed upon us, to pray for the continuance of the same all the next week ensuing, and ever else, with his gracious supply of all necessaries whatsoever, without the which either our worldly estate or spirituall obedience to him cannot bee sustained. Luke 22. Acts 27.

Fiftly, to consider of the poore which the Lord hath set amongst us as subjects for our love to worke upon, to see what they want, how they live, and to visite them and provide for them. This hath ever of Gods children beene greatly regarded, and is a part of the discipline of the Church also. The Apostle Paul ordained a gathering in the Church of Corinth every Sabbath day to this use, & that to the example of other reformed Churches. Christ visited the Cripples and lazers on the Sabbath day, and healed him that had none to put him in the poole. The borne blinde he healed on the Sabbath day. And from the godly care of our fore-fathers touching this matter have flowne our Hospitals and Almes-houses, with such like. This is an exercise of faith and love fit for all times, but chiefly on the Sabbath day to bee regarded. Thus wee feed Christ when he is hungry, cloathe him naked, visit him sicke, and so forth, and sure shall wee be to finde it at the generall accounting day of his. 1 Cor.16.1. Iohn 5. Iohn 9. Mat.25.35.

Lastly, to take care and conferre amongst our selves how to maintaine all means that serve to the knowledge of God, as the Ministers, Schollers, Universities, Schooles, and such like: To meditate also this day more than other daies, of the creatures of God, & of his exceeding goodnes towards What it is to keep holy the Sabbath day.

What it is to keepe holy the Sabbath day.

towards us in them is an exerciſe of the Sabbath, with a number ſuch moe, that were now too long particularly to name: therefore to conclude and end this matter, eaſily may we hereby ſee, that to keepe holy the Sabbath day, is nothing elſe but even to ſeparate and conſecrate the ſame to all godly exerciſes, wherein our faith to God and obedience is to be ſhewed.

Queſt. If theſe then and their like be commanded to us on this day to be performed, their contraries I take by the ſame Law to be forbidden?

Anſ. Truth it is, and muſt needs be ſo, but I thinke it needleſſe now againe to goe over them, and ſhew their contraries; rather weigh them your ſelfe, and marke them particularly. Onely theſe I wiſh by name may more duely be thought of, that if the ſanctification of this day conſiſt greatly in laboring to know the Lord by the preaching of his Word, how ſhall they ſafely paſſe the curſe of God for the breach hereof, who with benummed ſoules, parched, padded, ſenſleſſe, and every way moſt hardned hearts, either lie and ſleepe on the one ſide idle, or toſſing the Ale-pot with their neighbours, ſuffer this day to paſſe without any inſtruction, and like dumbe dogs hold their peace, no way diſcharging the duty of a true Miniſter, and one that tendereth the glory of God, his owne and his peoples ſoules. What ſhould I ſay of them, that ſeeing the harveſt great, and laborers few, and feeling within themſelves working a ſecret power, perſwading to put their helping hand to this buſineſſe, yet doe not, but ſuffer the people to pollute the Sabbath for want of teaching, and ſtay themſelves from this worke of the Lord upon cauſes, that as it is to bee feared, will melt away, and not ſtand to excuſe them, when God ſhall come unto judgement? Every ſervant to his owne maſter, it is true, ſtandeth or falleth, yet may one ſervant admoniſh another to beware betimes, and therefore with my whole heart I wiſh a due regard hereof. Againe, if to ſanctifie the Sabbath, bee to conſecrate to it holy uſes, ſuch as have bin named, is it poſſible to eſcape the revenging hand of the eternall God, if he content in mercy with one day in ſeven, we deny him that alſo, and dedicate it to drunkenneſſe, to feaſting and ſurfetting? &c. Now in the name of God in heaven, and of Jeſus Chriſt his Sonne, who ſhall come to judge the quick and the dead at the later day, I require it of all that ever ſhall reade theſe words, that as they will anſwer me before the face of God and all his Angels, at the ſound of the laſt trumpe, they better weigh, whether carding, dicing, and tabling, bowling, and cocking, ſtage-playes and ſummer-games, whether gadding to this Ale or that, to this Beare-bayting and that bull-baiting, with a number ſuch, bee exerciſes commanded of God for the Sabbath day or no? O heart all frozen, and void of the feeling of the mercy of thy God, that having every day in ſixe, every houre in every day, and every minute in every houre ſo taſted of the ſweet grace of thy God in Chriſt, as that without it thou hadſt periſhed every minute, yet canſt not tell how poſſibly to paſſe over one day to his praiſe, unleſſe one halfe of it bee ſpent in carding and bowling. Awake, awake, in Chriſt Jeſus admoniſhed awake, and ſeeing all the weeke long the Lord of heaven doth defend and feed thee, comfort and bleſſe thee, and is contented but in one day eſpecally to be regarded, vow with thy ſelfe in requeſt of ſtrength to keepe it, and to the Lord that one day ſhall be conſecrated of thee, and obſerved according to his will.

Queſt. Theſe things then thus paſſed over, I pray you are theſe words, Sixe dayes ſhalt thou labour, &c. A Commandement, ſo that we ſinne, if we labour not on them all?

Anſ. No, they are no Commandement, but a permiſſion, or a remiſſion rather of ſo much right of the Lords. For ever hath the Church upon occaſions ſeparated ſome of the weeke dayes alſo to the ſervice of the Lord, and reſted from their labours. Which they never would have preſumed to doe, if the Lord had commanded to the contrary. And even now our holy dayes commanded by publike order, are not all to be miſliked, if to the glory of God and ſanctification of his name, they be beſtowed as they are intended. Therefore a Commandement I ſay they are not, but a remitting of the Lords right, who indeed might challenge all.

Queſt. And for the ſeventh day it ſelfe, may we not in any caſe doe any thing thereon, becauſe the words here are ſo, In it thou ſhalt doe no manner of worke, &c?

Anſ. I have ſaid before, if you remember, that the preciſe and ſtrict reſt of the Jewes on this day was ceremoniall, and therefore now by Chriſt taken away, that it bindeth not us. And therefore touching your queſtion and our eſtate in theſe dayes under the Goſpll, very certain it is, that not even in the ſeventh day we ſtand ſo bound to reſt, but that in it alſo we may worke, if either neceſſity ſo urgently requireth, or the deed done be greatly to the glory of God. Examples of the 1 King 22. firſt are David eating the Shew-bread, and the Diſciples gathering & rubbing the eares of corne. Of the ſecond, Chriſt himſelfe healing on the Sabbath day many, which yet the Jewes thought to be unlawfull. The diſcourſe of Chriſt touching this point, in the Goſpell, is very worthy noting, wherein he flatly and ſtrongly refuteth this ſuperſtitious conceit of the Sabbath in the Phariſies, and all other, by divers arguments: as firſt, by the example of David above named. Secondly, of their lawfull practice, they circumciſed children, and ſlew their ſacrifices, &c. on the Sabbath. Thirdly, by the teſtimony of Oſee, I wil rather have mercy than ſacrifice; That is, love to our brethren, than outward ſervice. Fourthly, from the leſſe to the greater, it is lawfull on the Sabbath day to pull out a brute beaſt that is fallen into a pit, or in ſuch like danger, as needs it muſt muſt be helped, or elſe it periſheth, therefore much more a man, &c. By all which you ſee that man is not made for the Sabbath, but the Sabbath for man. And even in the right of our Chriſt, we alſo are in ſome ſort lords of the Sabbath, as in it, to doe what urgent cauſe conſtraineth indeed, and may not conveniently be deferred.

Queſt. Here is named in the words of the Commandement, The ſtranger that is within thy gates. I pray you therefore how farre thinke you this bindeth us?

Anſw. I doe willingly ſtill tell you my opinion in every thing, my ſelfe and you alſo I truſt ready to yeeld to better advice, when we ſhall heare it. For my part I ſee not how we may anſwer it to the Lord, if being private men and houſholders, wee ſuffer within our gate to lurke and lie hid, any that refuſe to obey the Lord in the ſanctifying of this day, as is commanded to the glory of his name, after that ſuch meanes have been uſed for the reforming of them, as poſſibly we can. And the more I weigh with my ſelfe that moſt ſtrait law of the Lord, for execution of them that ſhould ſeeke to eſtrange any from the true God, the more I am confirmed by the very end, equity, and meaning of it, in this opinion, againſt all affection of kindred, aliance, friendſhip, or whatſoever. Reade the words, and marke the zeale which God requireth in all men towards him, when as no meanes will reforme our friends, but they ſtill peradventure tempt us, and then by the way, let it not paſſe unmarked, I pray you, how ſtraitly all maſters and miſtreſſes ſtand bound to ſee that the Lord bee honoured, not onely in themſelves, but by man-ſervant and maid-ſervant, old and young, in their houſes, of diſcretion, on the Sabbath day ſeeing God of purpoſe nameth them. And ſee againe how this naming of the ſtranger doubleth the bond more upon us. For by compariſon, if we ſtand charged with our ſtranger and gueſt, much more with our dayly ſervants, children, &c. it muſt needs be, and indeed weigh it well. Deut. 13.

Queſt. I am then thus, I thinke, ſatisfied in every point of this Commandement, neither doe I remember what further to aske you herein.

Anſw. The Commandements of the Lord (ſaith David) are exceeding broad, neither indeed is any man able ſo to lay open any one of them, but judgement by the gift of God encreaſed, more may bee ſeene and eſpied in them: but thus much now ſhall ſuffice for my meaſure, this onely added, that this reaſon drawne from the Lords owne example, who reſted from his worke on this day, ought greatly to move us to the carefull keeping of it, as even the very firſt word alſo of the Law, for if you marke it, hee doth not ſay, Keepe holy the Sabbath day, but Remember to keepe it holy, that is, have an earneſt care of it, and in any caſe forget it not, but remember to keep it holy. And thus much of this Commandement.

The examination of the Conſcience.

THe profitable uſe and application of this Commandement, is to weigh and duely conſider that it is the law of no man, but of God the chiefeſt Law-giver, the wiſeſt, moſt righteous, and moſt able to revenge, inſtituted of purpoſe by him for theſe and ſuch like ends.

Firſt, that we ſhould wholly conſecrate, as that day, our ſelves unto the Lord, and his ſervice, hearing, reading, and meditating thoſe things, which might lay before us the goodneſſe of Almighty God towards us, and our great ingratitude to him againe, with all other ſinnes, whereby we have provoked him to wrath, ſtirring up our hearts to true repentance for them, and amendment of the ſame.

Secondly, for the eaſe of ſervants and cattell, which otherwiſe by the unmercifull greedineſſe and cruelty of ſome, might happily be abuſed.

Laſtly, to expreſſe and lay before us ſome ſhew of that ſpirituall and eternall reſt in heaven, which we all ſo looke and long for. Then theſe things conſidered, to call to mind how often and grievouſly wee have offended againſt every one of theſe, as againſt the firſt, by abſenting our ſelves from the Church, and place of common meeting, when we might have been preſent, if wee would, a very horrible thing, if we could duely regard and thinke on it. For what is it, but to contemne God and his wiſedome, to ſtrive and fight againſt the ſpirit, teaching and converting men by the miniſtery of the Word, and even in effect to ſay, I am as wiſe and godly, as either he can make me, or ſhall make me: I will none of his grace. What is it, but to give a grievous offence to others, for the which the living God hangeth a woe over our heads, ſaying: Woe bee to him by whom offence commeth: it were better for that perſon to have a milſtone tied about his necke, and to bee caſt into the bottome of the Sea: And againe, It were good for that man if he had never been borne. What is it but to feed the Devils humour, and to doe that thing, that moſt highly pleaſeth him? Againe, to conſider how wee have offended, when we were preſent at Church by negligent and cold performance of that thing, which time, place, and duty required at our hands. Have we never come to the hearing of the Word, but with reverence, with willing deſire, preparing our hearts before unto it, by ſome ſecret praier within our ſelves, to the Lord, that he would bleſſe the Speaker, that he may ſpeak to our hearts, and bleſſe us, that we may attentively hearken, profitably feele, and thankfully taking whatſoever is ſpoken, increaſe in obedience to it? Have we never come to the Sacraments, when we could, and never without ſuch examination, and other circumſtances, as are ſtraitly required of a Chriſtian? Have we ſpent the Sabbath in godly conference and meditation, powring out thanks from a feeling ſoule for the Lords goodneſſe ever to us, and namely, for the weeke paſſed? Have we viſited or thought upon the ſick, ſore, diſeaſed, impriſoned, baniſhed, or any way ſuffering for a good cauſe, and to our power comforted them? Have we ſtudied how either to procure, or continue, or encreaſe amongſt our ſelves, or our neighbours the meanes of ſalvation, as the preaching of the Word, and ſuch like? O beloved, we have not, we know it, and muſt needs confeſſe it, if there be any truth in us. Too much have wee neglected all theſe, yea even divers of them, it is greatly to be feared, have little or never at all troubled our heads: but for their contraries in moſt full meaſure wee have wallowed in them, and with greedineſſe ever accompliſhed them. Where is the Miniſter whoſe negligence hath not made his people to pollute the Sabbath? Where is the people whoſe conſciences awaked, may not juſtly condemne them for ungodly gadding on this day to Church-Ales, to Weddings, to Drinkings, to Banquets, to Faires, and Markets, to ſtage-Playes, to Beare-baitings, and Summer-games, and ſuch like? Where is that Maſter that hath had a conſcience to reſtraine his ſervants from this impiety; or the ſervant againe that hath either bridled himſelfe for the Lords cauſe, or elſe well accepted his Maſter or Miſtreſſe reſtraint being made unto him, and which hath not rather burſt out into ungodly and diſobedient ſpeeches, murmuring that becauſe hee hath wrought all the weeke, therefore he ſhould have liberty to do what he liſt on the Sabbath, not conſidering that this Commandement bindeth not onely the Maſter himſelfe to honour God on this day, but to ſee to his family ſo much as he can, that they alſo doe it: nay I would to God the Maſters in many places were not ring-leaders to their owne and all other mens people, to prophane this Sabbath of the Lord; and that even ſuch Maſters, as in reſpect of their calling, office and credit in the Countrey, ſhould farre otherwiſe doe. When doth a Gentleman (to name no higher Eſtates) appoint a ſhooting, a bowling, a cocking, or a drunken ſwearing Ale, for the helpe, as they ſay, of ſome poore one, but upon the Sabbath? And if he bee at Church in the fore-noone, for the after-noone it is no matter, hee hath been very liberall to God in giving him ſo much.

What day in the weeke uſually doth hee give ſo evill an example of unmeaſurable ſetting in bed, as on the Sabbath? But O filthy ſavour that ariſeth out of this loathſome channell, thus raked up into the noſtrils of the Lord? I ſpare to ſpeake, I ſhame to ſee, I rew to know, what I fully know againſt our ſoules in this reſpect. Let every man and woman more particularly view themſelves, and lay open unto the Lord their ſinne in ſorrow for it: by this occaſion thinke what is commanded, looke what we have done, and the Lord make our ſinfull hearts to ſee, and ſigh for ſo great offence againſt our God. What ſhould I ſay of the ſecond end of the inſtitution of the Sabbath, namely, for the reſt of ſervant and cattell? But even in a word, woe is the man whom God ſhall judge according to his guiltineſſe herein. For it is too uſuall with al eſtates to be a meanes to rob their ſervants of the bleſſing due to the keepers of this Law, and to pull upon them the plague for the contrary, by making them ride and run, poſt and away, upon every occaſion that commeth in their heads, when in truth, if they would but even looke into it, the matter may bee done well without ſuch haſte. O happy is that man whoſe heart thinketh how his ſervant is bound to this Commandement of keeping holy the Sabbath, as well as hee, hath a ſoule to loſe or ſave as well as he, to be nouriſhed with the food of the Word as well as he, and therefore thereon concludeth, he will neither ſin himſelf, nor make his ſervant ſin in breach of this or any other Commandement.

The third end of the Sabbath we heard it was, that hereby might be reſembled in ſome ſort our ſpirituall reſt in heaven, wee ceaſing from our workes, and doing the will of God. But are wee able to ſay, wee have this done? O miſerable men, tenne thouſand times, if in this wee ſhould have our deſerts: for wherein, or how crucifie wee the fleſh more on this day than any other, bridle the froward deſires of the heart, reſtraine our owne nature, and doe the will of God more on this day than any other? Alas our owne conſciences crie unto us, wee doe nothing leſſe, wee drinke, wee eate, wee ſurfet, we ſweare, we play, wee daunce, wee whore, we walke and talke idlely, vainly, uncleanly, and ungodlily: Theſe are our workes on the Sabbath more commonly than any day in the weeke elſe; and if this bee to reſemble a ſpirituall reſt, then indeed wee doe it, not otherwiſe. Thus ſtand wee therefore guilty, and grieuouſly guilty of this Commandement. So that if wee had not a Saviour, who in our fleſh had fulfilled this Law, and every one for us, and appeaſed the wrath of God his Father, juſtly conceived againſt our ſinnes, never ſhould wee have looked within his Kingdome. And how ſhall we be better for all which hee hath done, but by ſeeing our paſſed ſinne, and namely, our foule and careleſſe abuſe of this Sabbath of our God, by lamenting the ſame even from our heart roots, purpoſing unfainedly to amend it hereafter, and even while life endureth to be more carefull to honour God on this day, than we have beene, and by ſtedfaſtly beleeving in Chriſt, and for Chriſt, and by Chriſt, to have all that is paſt forgiven? This is the way to bee freed from the curſe of this Commandement, and all other which we ſo grievouſly have tranſgreſſed, and therefore juſtly deſerved. O mercy great and marvellous! O nature ſweet and patient of our God, who contenting himſelfe with one day in ſeven chiefly to be his, and yet robbed of the ſame alſo by us vile wretches, notwithſtanding till this day hath ſpared us, whereas a thouſand times and a thouſand, he might with great right have deſtroyed us, either among our pots, or in our dances, or idle in our beds, asking us if that were to hallow the Sabbath, or to honor his name, to ſwill and to bibble, to leape, to wallow and tumble in bed till it be noone? with ſuch like.

Now doth hee ſpeake, now doth he warne, now doth he admoniſh, loath to puniſh us, a moſt mercifull God, and if now we will not conſider, learne, and bee inſtructed, that our waies heretofore have not beene good, and therefore amend them; ſurely, ſurely, if God be God, wee ſhall taſte his hand for ſo great diſobedience.

Now the living God awake us, and touch us truely in this behalfe: mercifull Father lay it never to our charge, for thy great mercies ſake, wherewith wee have grieved thee touching this Commandement, but encreaſe our knowledge, encreaſe our feeling, encreaſe our conſcience, carefully to live and ſpend our dayes in thy feare and favour, as thou maieſt be honoured, the power of thy Word magnified, our brethren moved with good example, our ſelves ſaved in the great day, and this Sabbath of thine for ever hereafter more carefully kept of us, to the better performance of the former, for Chriſt his ſake. Amen, Amen.

The fifth Commandement.

Queſtion.

What containeth the ſecond Table?

Anſw. As the firſt contained all duties due to the Lord, inward and outward; ſo the ſecond Table containeth all duties due to our brethren, either in heart or action. And therefore in this ſecond Table are laid the very grounds of all civill ſociety, from whence all mens lawes proceed, if they be juſt.

Queſt. But do theſe works of the ſecond Table concerne only our neighbors?

Anſw. No, we may not thinke ſo: For though outwardly they be done to men, and immediately as the proper object of them, yet indeed they are done alſo to God, and he more delighteth in them, than in all burnt ſacrifice: For if we feed our brethren, cloath them naked, viſite them ſicke, or any way doe them good, God taketh it as done to himſelfe.

Queſt. When any preſcription is made to men in the Scriptures what they ſhould doe, why ſo often and uſually are the works of the ſecond Table appointed?

Anſw. Not that they are better than the works of the firſt Table, but for that they are the true bewrayers of them: for every hypocrite will ſay hee loveth God, feareth God, truſteth in God, &c. becauſe theſe are ſecret duties in the heart, and of man cannot bee judged; but looke how hee liveth towards his neighbours, and it may ſoone bee ſeene, that failing in the duties of the ſecond Table towards men, the duties of the firſt which hee boaſteth of, in truth are not in him: For if they were, they would bring forth the other. He that ſaith he loveth God whom hee never ſaw, and hateth his brother whom he hath ſeene, is a lier.

Queſt. Which is the firſt Commandement of the ſecond Table?

Anſw. Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy dayes may be long, &c.

Queſt. What is meant by honour here?

Anſw. Reverence, obedience, and maintenance, if need require.

Queſt. What is this reverence?

Anſw. It is a true acknowledging in my heart and mind of that ſuperiority, which God hath given either my Parents, or any other perſon, together with a willing declaration of the ſame, by any ſuch outward geſture or behaviour, as it may be declared in, or by.

Queſt. How prove you that we muſt reverence our Parents?

Anſw. Many ſufficient proofes hath it in the Word, but a few may ſuffice us: You ſhall feare every man his father and his mother, ſaith the Law of God, that is, if we expound it, ye ſhall ſtand in a reverent awe and regard of them with love: for we muſt needs underſtand a ſon-like feare, not a ſervile in that place. Againe, Honour thy father and mother, which is the firſt Commandement with a promiſe, ſaith the Apoſtle: this honour implieth reverence. Thirdly, the example of our Saviour Chriſt performing this reverence to his Mother, and his reputed father Ioſeph, doth prove it to us. And that example of Salomon, who being King, and hearing that his mother came to ſpeake with him, went to meet her, bowed downe to her, cauſed a ſeat to be ſet for her, and placed her on his right hand. Laſtly, the Scripture expreſly forbidding ſuch things as are contrary to this reverence, manifeſtly proveth the ſame to be our duty.

Luke 2.

1 Kings 2.

Queſt. What is contrary to it?

Anſw. Firſt, to curſe father or mother is manifeſtly contrary to it: and hath not the Scripture forbidden it, ſaying: Curſed be he that curſeth father or mother, and let all the people ſay, Amen? And againe, He that curſeth father or mother ſhall die the death, yea he ſhall die and his blood be upon him.

Deut.27.16. Exod.21.17. Levit.20.9.

Queſt. What elſe is contrary to it?

Anſw. To ſmite father or mother is apparently contrary to it, and this alſo hath the Word forbidden: He that ſmiteth father or mother ſhall die the death. And to mock our Parents is contrary to this reverence wee owe them: and therefore it is ſaid in the thirtieth of the Proverbs, The eye that mocketh his father, or deſpiſeth the counſell of his mother, let the Ravens of the field devour it, and the young Eagles pick it out.

Prov.30.

Queſt. How if the ſonne be a Magiſtrate, and the father none, whether muſt hee then reverence his father, or no?

Anſw. In matters that concerne his office he muſt doe his office, and his father muſt acknowledge his authority, but in private places and matters, notwithſtanding hee is a Magiſtrate, hee muſt doe reverence to his father, as is due, neither taketh Magiſtracie this duty from man, or out of man, for they may both well ſtand together.

Queſt. How prove you it?

Anſw. King Aſa executeth his office, and depoſeth his mother, wee reade, yet otherwiſe, no doubt, he reverenceth her as a childe: And pretily was it ſaid of Taurus the Philoſopher, when the father and ſonne came to him about a matter, the ſonne being a Magiſtrate, and the father none, none, that the father ſhould ſit downe upon that one ſtoole that hee had, till the queſtion was diſputed, whether of them ought of right to have it.

1 King.15.13.

Queſt. And are the children onely bound?

Anſw. No indeed, but there is a duty as well of the parents to their children, as of the children to their parents.

Queſt. And what is that I pray you?

Anſ. In generality this it is: If the parents look for at the childrens hands, honor, that is, reverence, obedience, and maintenance if they need, according to ability, then it is queſtionleſſe their duties, ſo to behave themſelves toward their children, as that theſe things may be due unto them.

Queſt. In particularity what procureth reverence to them?

Anſw. Firſt and formoſt, if parents will breed this in their children, let them in any wiſe carefully looke to their life and behaviour before them. For truely, grave, modeſt, and vertuous behaviour ſtriketh the hearts of both children, ſervants, and all other beholders, with a reverent conceit of ſuch perſons, and contrariwiſe light behaviour loſeth the ſame. Parents behaviour.

Queſt. What eſpeciall things can you name that indeed loſe parents and ſuperiours this reverence?

Anſw. Neglect of Religion, Drunkenneſſe, incontinency of life, uncomely talke, wanton behaviour, ſwearing, with ſuch like; and which may not be forgotten, brawles, jarres, and unkindneſſe betwixt man and wife, before their children and ſervants.

Queſt. What elſe breedeth reverence?

Anſw. Good bringing up, a duty which the parents doe owe to their children, as farre as their power will reach, and which indeed maketh the children performe to them their duties the better.

Queſt. How prove you that parents are bound to this?

Anſw. The Apoſtle giveth an expreſſe commandement of it, ſaying, Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath, but bring them up in inſtruction and information of the Lord. And the neglect of this bringing up, maketh many parents want good behaviour in their children. For very great is the force of it to good or evill; as the Heathen man Lycurgus, by his two whelps very lively ſets out, the ſtory whereof is this: Lycurgus deſiring to let the Lacedemonians ſee the force of education, brought forth on a day to them two whelps, which he had diverſly brought up, the one hee had accuſtomed to the field, the other kept ever at home, and with them hee brought out alſo an Hare, and a pot of pottage; which when hee had ſet downe, the one according to his uſe of bringing up, tooke preſently to the Hare, and the other utterly neglecting what even Nature ſhould have wrought a regard in him of, as preſently betooke himſelfe to the pot of pottage. See then, ſaith Lycurgus, O ye Lacedemonians, what bringing up is in very brute and unreaſonable creatures, how much more muſt it needs bee effectuall to good or evill in your children? And the example moved them much. But in how many moe examples out of good writings may we plentifully ſee how carefull ever all godly parents have beene, that in the fruit of their bodies the Lord ſhould bee honoured, and his true Religion planted and placed in their poſterity? for very well knew they that, which experience taught both them and others, that as vertuous and godly fruit is a ſpeciall bleſſing of the Lord, ſo an ungracious and froward offſpring is a croſſe, that next after ſenſe of Gods wrath againſt themſelves, doth ſting moſt bitterly the heart of godly parents. And againe, they knew that, which we alſo cannot bee ignorant of, that by nature neither theirs were, nor ours are borne ſo pure, as that they needed not the induſtry of their parents to reforme them: For both then was it, and now is it moſt true, which the Spirit of wiſedome ſaith: Fooliſhneſſe is bound in the heart of a childe, but the rod of correction ſhall drive it away from him. And in another place, The very imagination of mans heart is altogether evill from his childhood. Wonderfull hath the care of Heathens beene therefore in this reſpect, as partly you have heard, and might moſt largely have beene laid further before you, if it were needfull. An ancient ſaying it was, and common amongſt them: Nil dictu fœdum viſuve hæc limina tangat Intra quæ puer eſt. That is, Let never any thing undecent to be ſaid or ſeene, enter into the houſe where a childe is within. Cato the wiſe Counſeller of Rome, thruſt Manlius from the Senate, becauſe on the day time, his daughter being by, he kiſſed his wife. Plutarch in his booke of this matter ſingularly diſcourſeth of this care, how great it ought to bee, and ever hath beene in good men, and he maketh a compariſon betwixt Education and other matters which men much eſteeme, preferring it before them all: Natalium ſplendor (ſaith he) res eſt præclara, at bonum à majoribus profectum, &c. That is, Birth and parentage is a notable thing, but yet deſcending to us from others. Riches are highly regarded, yet ſuddenly taken from them that have them, and given to them that looked not for them, and ever common to the bad as well as to the good. Glory is a thing in mans eyes honourable, yet ever moſt variable. Beauty much wiſhed for, yet not to be kept any long time with all the wiſhes and wiſedome in the world. Onely one thing, ſaith he, there is, the benefit whereof never faileth, but with life, and that is the ſingular fruit of good bring up. Lycurgus the Rhetorician, when it was objected to him, that hee waſted too much upon the feathers of his children, anſwered moſt wiſely, That to a man that indeed would undertake to better his children to his deſire, he would not onely give that wages, but even the halfe of all that ever he poſſeſſed. Such a care had this Heathen of that, which Chriſtians profeſſing God, can be ſo careleſſe of, in theſe dangerous and infective dayes. Ariſtotle could ſay, that looke how much better it is to bee well, than to be; ſo much more bound are thoſe children to their parents, that receive by them good bringing up, than they which receive but their bare exiſtence in the world. Another in Plutarch againe ſaith very pretily, That if he could, he would get him to the top of the higheſt hill that any where hee might find, and with all his power, from whence he might furtheſt be heard, crie out upon the monſtrous madneſſe of thouſands of parents, that take ſuch intolerable and inceſſant paines, to leave much unto their children, and yet never any care at all, in compariſon, what manner of men or women they ſhall be, to whom ſo much ſhall be left: As though that earthly pelfe either wholly made a man, or elſe muſt of neceſſity with worldly credit, continue his poſterity upon earth, when want of bringing up, maketh want of knowledge any way with credit to uſe the ſame. But what view I ſo much the commendable care of Heathens in this behalfe? Have not Gods faithfull beene in this point as carefull as they? Yes truely, many have, and in better order a great deale. For there being in this thing degrees and ſteps to be obſerved; as firſt, of piety; ſecondly, of learning; thirdly, of manners; and laſtly, of the function or calling: the children of God, many of them have in this excelled the Heathen, that being generally as carefull as they in all, particularly in this, as men better acquainted with it, through greater given light and knowledge they have far excelled them, that firſt they have attempted, what indeed is firſt to bee cared for, namely, to frame the hearts of their children to God and grace, and then in order to the things following. We ſee it in Adam, who taught his ſons to ſerve the Lord. We ſee it in Abraham moſt notably. We ſee it in Timothies parents, who brought him up from a childe in the knowledge of the Scriptures. Wee ſee it in David, Ioas the King, and a number others. Generally to them all it was a commandement, that as ſoone as their children could underſtand and aske them queſtions, they ſhould carefully inſtruct them concerning the Lords dealings with them, and for them: And I doubt not but many did it of the ancient Chriſtians. Philo writeth that they were called cultores ac cultrices, that is to ſay, Tillers, becauſe as men painfully till their ground, ſo they carefully laboured the ground of their childrens hearts, to plant in them the feare of God. Nos hodie vaſtatores ac vaſtatrices, (ſaith he) That is, Wee in theſe dayes may better bee termed deſtroyers, than tillers; ſo retchleſſe wee are, and careleſſe in this ſo great a matter. Hence ſprang the Cloyſters in the beginning, ſaith Chryſoſtome, and that kind of life, namely, of the exceeding care that men had to have their children well brought up, and excluded from evill company, and hurtfull ſights in the world, till yeeres and ſetled inſtruction had made them leſſe capable of the harme thereof. Afterward they degenerated from that inſtitution, and became as we well know dens of drones, and nurſeries of ungodlineſſe, corrupters of all, not correctors of any, and the wrath of the Lord hath now deſtroyed them. It is a good admonition of wiſe Salomon, Teach a childe in the trade of his way, and when he is old, he ſhall not depart from it. And that experienced ſonne of Syrach in many places ſpeaking of this matter, hath theſe words, in my opinion not lightly to bee looked on: Neither deſire nor delight (ſaith he) in children, though never ſo many, unleſſe the feare of God be in them. For one that is juſt, is better than a thouſand: and better it is to die without children, than to leave behind us ungodly ones. Thus let it ſuffice to have touched this matter, whereof long and large Treatiſes are made, needfull to be touched, if ever needfull, and even long ſtood upon; for too much it is of parents neglected, and yet are they grieved, if of their children they be not reverenced: and howſoever many there be, that in theſe dayes are carefull enough to procure unto their children knowledge of Arts, of Countries, and any thing that in worldly ſort may make them mighty or famous, and ſpoken of: yet is the ground of all very fearefully neglected, namely, to ſettle in them the true feare of the God of Iſrael, delivered and taught in his Word: yea, it is even accounted by father and childe not ſo needfull, or beſeeming for a Gentleman, to the great exaſperating of the Lords wrath againſt them in their ſeed. Humility alſo and ſhamefaſtneſſe are taken from youth in theſe dayes, even by their parents and their teachers, and where it hath ever beene held, bluſhing in meaſure, modeſty and ſilence, have beene commendable tokens in young yeeres, now is it a ſhame to be aſhamed at any time: bluſhing is want of countenance and bringing up, ſilence is ignorance, modeſty is too much maidenlineſſe, and in ſhort, now vertue is vice, and vice very comely and gallant behaviour. So times are changed to and fro, and changing times have changed us too. But of this thus farre.

Ephes.1.4. The force of Education.

Prov.22.15. Gen.8.

Prov.25. Syrach. 16.22. & 30. alſo.

Queſt. What elſe nouriſheth in children due reverence?

Anſw. Due correction. Due, I ſay, with wiſedome and moderation: For hee that ſpareth his rod, hateth his ſonne; but he that loveth him, doth chaſten him betimes. Chaſten thy ſonne while there is hope, and let not thy ſoule ſpare for his murmuring. And in another place, Withhold not correction from thy childe, for if thou ſmite him he ſhall not die.

19. verſe 18. 23. verſe 13.

Q. But what if parents in fooliſh pity cocker up their children, and pretermit this due advertiſement?

Anſw. Then will they loſe this reverence moſt aſſuredly in their hearts, and often make them them come to evill ends. It is proved by Heli his two ſons, who by their fathers lenity, conceived not what it was to ſin againſt the Lord, and therefore to their own hurt, and their fathers great griefe, taſted the heavie hand of God, and died both in a day. Alſo by Abſalon, Ammon, and Adoniah, Davids Sons: Whoſe fearefull ends may ſerve for ever to admoniſh all Parents, how they fooliſhly love their children, and cannot abide to ſay or do their duties to them, nor yet to let others. Marke well the ſixt verſe of the firſt Chapter of the firſt booke of Kings, and be wiſe betime. A ſmall twigge will not kill the tendereſt Prince, Lord or Ladie in the world. If thou ſmite him, ſaith Salomon, you heard before, he ſhall not die: I warrant him. 1 Sam.2. & the 4. alſo. Prov.23.13.

Queſt. What is the ſecond part of this honor that children owe to their parents?

Anſw. Readie and willing obedience.

Queſt. And what is that?

Anſw. Obedience is the performance of parents will, ſo farre as lyeth in our power, and lawfully we may.

Queſt. And how prove you that this, children are bound unto?

Anſw. Firſt, by the words of Salomon: Obey thy father that hath begotten thee, and deſpiſe not thy mother when ſhe is old. Secondly, by the Apoſtle to the Coloſſians: Children obey your parents in all things, for that is well pleaſing to the Lord. And to the Epheſians againe: Children obey your parents in the Lord, for that is right. Thirdly, it is very ſtrongly prooved by the ſharper puniſhment, which God appointed for all diſobedient children, to wit, even flat and preſent death. For we reade in the Law: If any man have a ſon that is ſtubborne and diſobedient, that he will not harken unto the voice of his father and mother, and they have chaſtened him, and hee would not hearken unto them, then ſhall his father and mother take him and bring him unto the Elders of the City, and unto the gate of the ſame place, and ſay unto the Elders of the City, this our ſon is ſtubborne and diſobedient, and will not hearken unto our voice, he is a riotour and a drunkard: and all the men of the Citie ſhall ſtone him with ſtones to death, and thou ſhalt put evill away from thee, and all Iſrael ſhall heare and feare. Prov.23.22. Coloſ.3.20. Epheſ.6.1. Deu.21.18. &c.

Queſt. But how farre muſt a child obey?

Anſw. If we paſſe over the diſcourſe of Philoſophers touching this matter, and come to the Scriptures, the Apoſtle Paul determineth it thus, That children muſt obey their parẽts in all things. Coloſ.3.20.

Queſt. Why, but ſhall we thinke Paul would have a child indeed obey his parents in all things, as the words ſound? What if they command a wicked thing?

Anſw. No indeed we may not take Pauls words ſo generally, we muſt expound that place by another place of Paul to the Epheſians, where he biddeth children (as you heard above) obey their parents in the Lord. And by the words of Mathew, where it is ſaid, He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me. Epheſ.6. Mat.10.

Queſt. And how then conclude you touching my queſtion?

Anſw. Thus I conclude, that a child is bound to obey his parents in all things in the Lord, that is, ſo farre as his obedience may ſtand with the duty which he oweth to his God, and with ſuch circumſtances touching his owne perſon, as both reaſon and piety would ſhould be regarded. Which concluſion compriſeth aſſuredly their obedience as touching mariage.

Queſt. What begetteth this obedience in children?

Anſw. When parents deſire obedience, they muſt know that it is their duties to command things lawfull in reſpect of God, and convenient in regard of their children. This excludeth forcing to marrie againſt all liking.

Queſt. What is the third and laſt part of this honor?

Anſw. Maintenance of our parents, if need be.

Queſt. What meane you by this maintenance?

Anſw. It is a thankefull ſuſtaining of the want of our parents, either by our riches, counſell, ſtrength, or any other thing, which God hath bleſſed us withall, and they have not.

Queſt. But how dare we interprete the Commandement thus: Honor thy parents, that is, maintain them as thou art able, and they have need?

Anſw. Surely, firſt, very reaſon telleth us, that this is as due as either reverence or obedience: but let that paſſe, wee have apparent Scriptures, where by honour is meant maintenance. As namely in the Apoſtles ſpeech to Timothy: Honor widowes, that be widowes indeed. That is, provide for them, and let them be ſuſtained. Againe, in the ſame place a little after, They that rule well are worthy of double honor, where by honour in part is meant maintenance. Laſtly, in the Goſpell of Saint Marke, our Saviour Chriſt notably ſheweth, that the Scribes and Phariſees perſwading children to give to their uſe, that wherewith they ſhould have helped their parents, cauſed them to breake this Commandement in not honouring them as they ſhould. Where we evidently ſee Chriſt himſelfe includeth in this honor, maintenance, and theſe places as they warrant this interpretatiõ, ſo do they alſo plainly prove that children owe this duty to their parents. 1 Tim.5.17. Marke 7.

Queſt. What further may be ſaid for the warranting of this, that children ought to relieve their parents wherein they can?

Anſw. Beſides the teſtimonies of Scripture now alledged to prove it, the Spirit of God hath added added reaſons to urge it, and there are alſo examples to perſwade it, and fearefull experiences of Gods wrath upon the contrary to feare us from it.

Queſt. What reaſons?

Anſw. In the 6. to the Epheſians the firſt Verſe, this reaſon is added: becauſe it is a juſt thing or right. And indeed ſo it is right both in reſpect of God that appointeth it, and in reſpect of that which our parents have done for us before.

Queſt. What elſe?

Anſw. Againe in the 3. to the Coloſſians, the 20. Verſe, this reaſon is alledged: becauſe it is well pleaſing to the Lord.

Queſt. What example?

Anſw. Valerius in the 5. Booke and 4. Chapter, ſheweth a notable example of a daughter that nouriſhed her mother in priſon with her breſts. And if Heathens by the law of nature knew ſo much to be their duty, how much more Chriſtians, having added thereunto the light of Gods Word?

Queſt. What elſe?

Anſw. It is alſo read of the Storkes, that when they are old they keepe continually the neſt, and their young birds provide for them, and feed them till they die.

Q. Well then, yet what now if children refuſe thus to behave thẽſelves to their parents or neglect it?

Anſw. They are then to looke for the wrath of the Lord on them ſharply with heavy hand puniſhing ſo foule a fault. And to conſider well that as others have found him, ſo ſhall they undoubtedly. Cham, Reuben, Hophni, and Phinehas, with a number others are before their eyes, as experiences to be wiſe by, if they have grace.

And above all other, Abſalom that graceleſſe man, who like a diſobedient child to a good father, ſought greatly to diſhonour him, and ſo horrible was his ſin, that even the earth was weary of ſo wicked a burden, and would carry him no longer: the heavens alſo were aſhamed of him, and the wrath of God hanged him up betwixt heaven and earth by the haire of his head, till Ioab thruſt him through with three darts being yet alive. A fearefull ſpectacle to all rebels againſt their Prince, or diſobedient children againſt their parents.

Queſt. Briefly now, whom doe you note to be comprehended here under the title Parents?

Anſw. Firſt, parents by nature: ſecondly, by dignity and office: thirdly, by age: and fourthly by benefice. Generally they are all in ſtead of parents to us, by whom as by inſtruments the Lord deriveth his mercies to us.

Queſt. Who be parents by dignity or office?

Anſw. Magiſtrates over the people, maſters over their ſervants, Miniſters over their charges, and ſuch like.

Queſt. For Magiſtrates what ſay you?

Anſw. I ſay, their place and calling, that portion above others which the Lord hath given them of his authority, majeſty, and excellency, proveth unto us, that we muſt reverence them. The encreaſe and ſafety of that which we poſſeſſe through peace maintained by them, proveth that we ought againe thankfully to maintaine them, their eſtate and government, by Tribute, Taxes, Subſidies, and ſuch like: and for obedience it is in a number of places commanded, as are alſo the former. Therefore when as all the parts of honour are due unto them, as reverence, maintenance and obedience, I may conclude, Magiſtrates as parents are to be honoured.

Q. There is no queſtion to be made of any of theſe, but now how farre are magiſtrates to be obeyed?

Anſw. Certainely, but in the Lord, as was ſaid before of our naturall parents. For the limits both of the Magiſtrates bidding and our obeying, are theſe two, piety and charity, contrary to theſe muſt neither they command, nor we doe.

Queſt. How prove you this?

Exod. 1. Dan. 3. 1 Kings 18. Anſw. In the firſt of Exodus, when the Kings commandement paſſed theſe limits, the midwives would not obey, and the Lord bleſſed them for it: the three children obeyed not the King, as we read in Daniel: Obadiah, and Heliah obeyed not the King and Queene: Daniel himſelfe obeyed not: and the Apoſtles ſaid, God before you muſt be obeyed; with many ſuch examples.

Queſt. What if ſtatutes be ſtraite, and in yeelding our policy great, may we not yeeld a little?

Mich. 6. 14. &c. Anſw. Indeed be the weather never ſo hote, ſtatutes never ſo ſtrait, policy never ſo great, God is God, hell is hell, we may not doe what is good in our owne eyes, nor decline either to the right hand or to the left. Reade the Prophet.

Queſt. How prove you that Miniſters are contained under the name of Parents?

1 Cor. 4. 1. Anſ. They are in Scripture repured ſpiritual fathers, as we may ſee in many places, namely to the Corinthians, Though you have ten thouſand inſtructers in Chriſt, ſaith the Apoſtle, yet have you not many fathers, for in Chriſt Ieſus I have begotten you through the Goſpell. Againe, to the Galathians, My little children, ſaith he, of whom I travell in birth again untill Chriſt be formed in you. And in his Epiſtle to Philemon, I beſeech thee for my ſonne Oneſimus whom I have begotten in my bonds. Therefore fore truly termed Elizeus the Prophet Eliah, when he cryed, my father, my father, the charet of Israel, and the horsemen of the same. Now then, since they be thus accounted in the Word, proofe enough it should be that all those three parts of honour lately spoken of belong unto them. Yet for more full contentation let us weigh the words of Christ in the Gospel, As my father sendeth me, so send I you, he that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you, despiseth me, with many such. Whereby apparant it is, that in his Ministers, God is honoured or dishonoured: for obedience to them in the workes of their calling the Scripture also is plaine, saying; Obey them that have the oversight of you, and submit your selves, for they watch for your soules, as they that must give account, that they may doe it with joy and not with griefe : for that is unprofitable for you. And for their maintenance also testimonies many are there in number both in the old and new Testament, as, Thou shalt not muzle the mouth of the Oxe that treadeth out the corne, The workman is worthy of his wages, He that serveth the Altar let him live of the Altar, He that delivereth us spirituall things by very good right ought to challenge and reape at our hands againe temporall: and to conclude, in flat words the Apostle commandeth, let him that is instructed in the Word, make him that hath instructed him partaker of all his goods, with other such speeches divers.

2 King.2.12.

Iohn 20. Matt.10.

Heb.13.

Quest. How prove you that masters are fathers to and over their servants ?

Answ. For the office and duty, no man that is godly will doubt (I hope) that the Lord hath blessed him with that superiority above others, not that hee should rule as a tyrant over them, but to love, cherish, and defend them even as a father his children, they doing him true and faithfull service. And for the name it selfe, besides a number other proofes, that plaine place warranteth it in the booke of the Kings, where Naamans servants come unto him and say, Father, if the Prophet had commanded thee a great thing, wouldest thou not have done it ? See how the Spirit of God giveth to masters the title of fathers.

1 King.5.13.

Quest. What prescription is there in the Word for servants duties toward their masters ?

Ans. First, see the words of Paul to the Ephesians : Servants be obedient to them that are your Masters according to the flesh, with feare and trembling, in singlenesse of your hearts, as unto Christ, not with service to the eye as men pleasers, but as the servants of Christ doing the will of God from the heart, with good will serving the Lord and not men, and know yee, that whatsoever good thing any man doth, that same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free. Secondly, weigh well the same Apostles speech to Titus, Let servants be subject to their masters, and please them in all things, not answering again, neither pickers, but that they shew all good faithfulnes, that they may adorne the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. Againe, to the Colossians most notably speaketh the same Paul saying : Servants be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, in all things, not with eye service as men pleasers but in singlenes of heart fearing God: and whatsoever you doe, do it heartily, as to the Lord and not to men, knowing that of the Lord yee shall receive the reward of the inheritance, for ye serve the Lord Christ. The same counsell giveth Peter also, adding that not only to the loving, kind and courteous master, but even to the froward also, of servants this duty must be performed. And marke this wel I beseech you, because many servants take their masters unkindnes for an excuse of their disobedience or infidelity in their services, which indeed must, not be so, saith Peter; but be they never so froward, yet we must doe all duty if we be servants and even joy heartily in that crosse, that notwithstanding our faithfull and painfull duty, yet wee suffer unkind words, sowre and severe lookes, with such like at their hands. For wee serve not them, but God in them, said the places before cited, and what good thing soever we do, we shall receive it at our good Gods hands againe assuredly, what contempt soever they shew of us, casting us off unrewarded, yea, even with hatred peradventure for our good wils, as often it falleth out. O sweet and most sweet comfort for all servants. What stony heart doth not even melt at the consideration of this gracious nature of the Lord, that if I be a servant, and honour him in that my calling, by true, faithfull, painefull and loving service to my master and mistrisse, be they never so sowre, so wayward, so unkind, so bitter, so without either discretion to discerne a good servant, or conscience to reward him: yet will my God, I say, never forsake me, but returne into my bosome with his blessing my true dealing, living, and meaning, most assuredly, and marke the proofe and practice of the same upon Iacob and Ioseph, with others, as you reade them. Stand therefore in strength, serve with comfort, slippe not from you calling for want of reward, if other ability serve to continue. The Lords Word is past him, his promise is out, he will consider and recompence all true servants, feare it not, doubt it not, but cleave to the Lord, and when ever any snubbes and checks in word or countenance undeserved arise, say in your heart with David cheerefully, O Lord, blessed is the man that putteth his trust in thee.

Psal.84.

Quest. What say you of parents in respect of benefits ?

Ans. I must needs say they are greatly to be honored and truely loved againe, whose love and affection hath broken out in fruits to us ward. For ingratitude before God and man is hatefull. And he that rewardeth evill for good, evill shall never depart from his house, saith Salomon.

Prov.17.15.

Quest. How prove you, that under the title of Father and Mother, old men and old women bee meant, and to be honoured ?

Answ.

1 Tim 5.2.

Levit.19.32. Iob.32.6.

Let all towne officers conſider this, and become parents, not ſpoilers of the towne. Eph.6.

Anſw. The words of Paul to Timothy teach it: For rebuke not an elder (ſaith he) but exhort him as a Father, and the elder women as Mothers. And touching the honouring of them, the law is plaine, Thou ſhalt riſe up before the hoare-headed, and honour the perſon of the old man, and dread thy God: I am the Lord. And in Elihu we ſee the practice, who ſtayed his ſpeech that his ancients might ſpeake before him.

Queſt. How then may we conclude this matter?

Anſw. Thus, for this thing we may note and end: That if the Scripture to Magiſtrates, Miniſters, Maſters, and ſuch like ſuperiours, have given the name of parents, then ought they all, and every one of them, in heart, affection, and action, be anſwerable to the ſame.

Queſt. Now then to proceed, here is a promiſe added to the keepers of this Commandement, that their daies ſhall be long in the Land. And to the Epheſians it is ſaid, that this is the firſt Commandement which is a promiſe, yet was there one added to the ſecond if you look on it, how then anſwer we this?

Anſw. We anſwer, that the promiſe annexed to the ſecond Commandement, belonged to all, but this belongeth particularly to this, and therefore it is the firſt with any ſpeciall promiſe.

Queſt. What might be the reaſon of this promiſe?

Anſw. This may ſeeme to be ſome reaſon of it. Naturall Parents are the inſtruments of life, other Parents, as Magiſtrates, Miniſters and Benefactors, are the inſtruments of good and comfortable life, now it pleaſed the Lord to give them for a bleſſing long life, who dutifully behave themſelves to the inſtruments of life.

Queſt. Why but is long life ſuch a bleſſing?

Anſw. Surely mans life is full of trouble and griefe, it cannot be denied. Yet I anſwer, firſt, that notwithſtanding even to live and have a being is of it ſelfe a mercy of the Lords, yet to continue living, to ſerve and praiſe the Lord, to encreaſe his kingdome by any ability in us, is a greater mercy. For a good nature rejoyceth in opportunity given to ſhew himſelfe thankfull, though it be to his trouble and coſt, and ſo muſt we. Secondly, I anſwer, that all theſe miſeries of mans life have come of man himſelfe, and not of God, and therefore wee ought no leſſe to account of Gods bleſſing, for the thing which we our ſelves have beene cauſe of. Thirdly, it may bee anſwered, that God doth not promiſe barely long life in this place, but good with it alſo, either in reſpect of outward proſperity, or inward comfort.

Queſt. How prove you that?

Anſ. By having recourſe to Pauls words, who repeating this bleſſing upon them that honour Father and Mother, doth not ſay only, that thou maieſt live long on earth, but, that it may be well with thee, and thou maiſt live long upon earth. Therefore though mans life be full of miſeries, yet as God promiſeth continuance of it, it is a bleſſing, and a great bleſſing.

Queſt. How can this promiſe reſpect us, ſeeing it nameth particularly Canaan, ſaying, that thy dayes may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, meaning it?

Anſw. Paul againe doth anſwer this, who boldly putteth for thoſe words theſe, on the earth: therefore by his interpretation it is not to be reſtrained to Canaan onely.

Queſt. Doe alwaies they that honour Parents live long, and contrariwiſe againe?

Anſ. We may not ſay ſo. For all things fall out alike to the good and evill, juſt and unjuſt, ſaith Salomon, meaning of outward things as life is, and it is the wiſdome of the Lord it ſhould be ſo, that good things (as we call them) may not be too greedily ſought for, becauſe they are common to the wicked, neither evill things be unlawfully eſchewed, becauſe they are incident to the good.

Queſt. How then is God true in his promiſes?

Anſ. So farre as long life may be a benefit to his children, ſo farre he ever giveth it: but if in wiſedome he know it better for them to be gathered to their Fathers, then he taketh them away and recompenceth want of temporall life with eternall.

Queſt. Yea, but that is not his promiſe then, for his promiſe is long life here.

Anſ. He that promiſeth money, and giveth gold, breaketh not his promiſe: he that promiſeth little and giveth much, breaketh not his promiſe: but ſo doth the Lord with us, and therefore who is he that unthankfully pleadeth againſt his mercy?

Queſt. What fruitfull notes now gather you of theſe words?

Anſ. Firſt, wee may note that the Lord joyning a promiſe of mercy to this Commandement, and not dealing ſo with any thing which hee liketh not, greatly pleaſing out of queſtion in his ſight is the keeping of this law: namely, when every man doth duty where duty is due, and in love we allow, cheriſh, and maintaine one another. Secondly, if long life be a bleſſing promiſed to ſuch as obey their Parents, and this obedience proceedeth greatly of good education, then they that careleſly and ungodlily neglect the ſame in their children, doe as much as lieth in them to ſhorten the daies of their poſterity. Laſtly, we alſo in this promiſe annexed, note that if long life be a gift of God, than commeth it not by nature or good conſtitution of body, further or longer then it pleaſeth the ſame God to bleſſe the meanes, and grant it. And thus much briefly in this Commandement.

The Application.

NOw remaineth it to apply theſe things to our ſelves, every one diſcloſing his life and inward thoughts before the Lord, and before our ſelves, as neare as we can, to the end that ſight of ſinne, if it be found in us, may bring forth ſorrow: and given grace to ſome ſtrength to ſtand, if we can find we have had it, may encreaſe our thankes to the Lord our God, who did ſo aſſiſt us. Let every one weigh their calling and eſtate, ſee what of them in this Law the Lord requireth, and what of them in their places hath bin performed. Children in duty ſubject to our Parents, we are or have beene every one of us. Have we then ever done it, or preſently doe we in the true teſtimony of a feeling conſcience, reverence in heart, and by all outward ordinary meanes, thoſe ordained inſtruments by the Lord, of ſo great good to us, our natural parents? Never have our hearts harboured any light or unworthy thought of them, or againſt them? Never have we failed in any outward geſture, to teſtifie to the world our hidden love and dutifull regard of them? Can wee ſay in truth, what of a childe any way ought to be, or (to mitigate the matter a little) what of us poſſibly could be performed in reſpect of age, of ſtrength, of ability, of time and opportunity, with ſuch like, that of us hath bin done ever fully, and willingly to them? O conſcience, caſting in our teeth our corruption, thou accuſeſt us.

Theſe boyling hearts not bearing juſt reproof, undutifully have often, if we could remember it, repined at their authority, impatiently fretted at their due correction, and the moſt of us, out of queſtion, at one time or other, if wee have not openly throwne out a curſe, yet have our hearts included a wiſh, and words peradventure uttered as much, not conſonant every way with our duties. Nay have not even outward violences bin offered to them by us? Joyfull were the Saints in heaven, if in truth we all could anſwer, no. But God knowes a guilty mind in many a one, doth ſtop his ſpeech, and filthy fact to beat or wiſh to beat them who brought him forth, doth cry to God without repentance for a plague. What ſhould I name, what ſhould I feare to name, ſo will it wring us alſo, the mocking of our parents? Where is that child, that hath carefully covered to his power, and ever borne withall in himſelf the wants, or infirmities whatſoever of his parents? No, no, the Lord hath not onely ſomething againſt us in this behalfe, but even great and grievous hath bin our fault, and ſtill it remaineth in many of us. Wee laugh to ſee our parents ſhame, we ſmile at their wants, we publiſh their infirmities, we diſdain their ignorance, we loath their age, and in many a thing to our owne confuſion, if the Lord give not an amending repentance, we bewray a robbed hart of the true reverence which ought to be in children to their parents. Alas, if God judge us for our obedience, where are we? what witleſſe will erecteth a kingdome in us? How cleave we to our ſelves in all matters, and thinke our owne direction beſt? How deſpiſe we the counſell of our friends, and caſt behind us their experience? Every ſonne and every daughter would rule their mariage wholly themſelves. And even in every action, alas what diſobedience ſheweth it ſelfe in us unto our parents? For maintenance which is the third branch, of honor, even that alſo accuſeth many a child before the Lord. Rare is the man that hath imploied every ability of his wit, of wealth, of knowledg, of ſtrength, at every need to his parents comfort. And therfore the Lord in mercy, not in fury, deale with us as we are children. Are we parents? then weigh and mark whether ſo we have alwaies behaved our ſelves, as that theſe duties of our children might be due unto us, even in regard of our behaviour: if not, then have wee pulled upon us the guilt of our childrens want of dutie, being cauſes of the ſame, and the Lord is angry with us. What life have we led before our childrē, to breed and continue theſe duties in them? Hath it bin holy, grave and modeſt, and ſo remaineth as neere as we can, ſeeking to hide from the eyes of their witleſſe heads, ſuch wants as we know our ſelves ſubject unto? No, no, but careleſly and looſely, even in every place, parents bewray neglect of religion, they will go to the Churches, or good exerciſes when they liſt, and that very rarely, they ſhew no regard of the dutie of Chriſtians, they carry no gravity in their doings, nor modeſty in their behaviour, but live moſt diſſolutely, & often incontinently, they ſweare fearefully without regard, ſpeake profanely, not reſpecting the frailty of the youth that heareth them; father and mother let unkind ſpeeches paſs from them one towards another in the preſence of their children, to the great impairing of their credit with them, careleſſe God knowes of their bringing up, and too full of fooliſh pitie, when they ſhould correct them. All theſe are meanes to make the children faile in reverence to their parents, and to tempt them to ſinne. And therefore let us looke if we be parents, and grieved with unreverent regard in our children of us, whether wee our ſelves be not cauſers of the ſame. Againe, for their obedience it faileth oft by fault in us. For if we be parents, wee lay great burdens upon our children, preſſing them ſtill with our authority, we enjoyne them what we liſt, not weighing wel what they can like, and not carefully conſidering as well their natures, as our owne deſires, as well their comfort and convenient being, as our owne affection and will to have it ſo, what marvell if often God breake our hearts with their diſobedience? The like may be ſaid of that thankfull maintenance, that ſhould of children to their parents be performed. The very unnaturall and unkind dealing of parents with their children in their youth, denying them reliefe and comfortable helpe, maketh them often (though it ſhould not) when they have attained to any eſtate, to deale as undutifully with their needy parents againe. Conſider therefore, I ſay, if wee be parents, what cauſe we give, and compare it with the fruit we find in our ſeed. Let ſinne appeare, if we heve offended, and let the law condemne us, if we have tranſgreſſed: for ſurely what duties this Law bindeth all children to performe; it as ſtraitly bindeth all parents to deſerve. The parents evill excuſeth not the child, but it maketh him guilty of his childs offence. Thus may the reſt alſo deſcend into themſelves. Too apparent is contempt, in our lives, of Magiſtracy and authority. We honour them not as parents, but both in reverence, obedience, and maintenance of their ſtate by retribution of ſome part of that wee have got by them, we bewray ungodlineſſe, and ſinne againſt the Lord and them very grievouſly. For where is that heart that riſeth up in thankfulneſſe for them to our God; that obeyeth them ſecretly as well as openly, for conſcience, not for feare? Nay, O ſinne of ours, if it be ſought out by the Lord in this reſpect, even growne aſſuredly up to heaven. For how dare we and doe we defeate their lawes continually? How ſet we our ſhifts againſt the wiſdome and working of the Lord by them? We mocke the Lord, and ſwell in pride againſt him. For be he as wiſe as he will, in directing the Magiſtrate to a law, to rule us by, wee ſhortly after will be up in wit againſt him, to ſhake in pieces by a ſhift all his endeavour. Truly our hearts be dead, our ſin is great, and the Lord hath wrath in ſtore, if this our dealing with our parents be not confeſſed and amended. Thus deale we alſo with our Miniſters and ſpirituall Fathers, begetting us to the Lord, with moſt vile uſage we often abuſe them, and if not, yet in heart at leaſt, as the refuſe of the world, we eſteem them: Let God be judge, or our own ſoules, what baſe and ſcornfull conceits we harbour of them, and whether in truth, as parents they be loved, accounted of, and dealt withall. What ſwelling pride in youth againſt the aged? What ungratefull hands and hearts againſt our great and gainefull friends? Every way, every way guilty we are of the breach of this Commandement, if wee can ſee it. Magiſtrates alſo, and Miniſters even as much for their great offences in their callings, ſo that if in juſtice we be repaied, ſhort ſhal our lives be here on earth, and in the world to come eternall death. Who can ſay he hath done the duties of a Governour? Who can ſay he hath lived lawfully as an inferiour? Alas we are touched all with ſin, and robbed by it of all the bleſſing. Yet ſin eſpied and truly loathed, finds ever pardon. For this cauſe Chriſt died, that we ſhould not be damned, if we will be taught. Things paſt be gone, and the Lord forgive us: Some be to come, and the Lord ſtrengthen us. Whether we be parents and have not deſerved, or we be children, and have not performed, the Lord hath mercy if we do amend, the Lord hath love, if our lives do ſeek it, and judgement alſo, if perſwaſion profit not. Life doth he promiſe, if we keep this law, and life will he give us, as he is God, and true both here and evermore.

The

The sixth COMMANDEMENT.

Question.

HOw standeth the order of this Commandement?

Answ. Great wisdome hath our God shewed even in the order of every one, and by name of this. For having in the former established degrees against men, some to rule, and some to obey, if he should not also have set limits for their authority, it had been to arme injustice, and to strengthen oppression and wrong.

Quest. What is the equity of this Law?

Answ. It is a very just Law, and meete to be established and made in three respects. First, in respect of God himselfe, who loving all good preservation of life, goods, credit, &c. and hating the contrary, fitly provideth to work the same in men, whom he would have holy as he is holy. Secondly, in respect of man, for our brother is our owne flesh, and we come all of one roote, and therefore we should not kill. Lastly, for as much as the society and traffick of man with man cannot be, unlesse life may be in safety, therefore even in respect thereof also, meete it was that the Lord should make this Law, that we should not kill.

Quest. Is all killing of any thing that hath life forbidden in these words of the Law?

Answ. No indeed, but if we would understand what notwithstanding these words wee may do, we must consider that all living things are of three sorts: either they are plants, hearbes, trees, and such like, or bruit beasts, or reasonable creatures. And all these in time, place, and for some causes we may kill, notwithstanding these words. For the first, we have warrant in these words: I have given you every hearb bearing seed, which is upon all the earth, and every tree wherein is the fruit of a tree bearing seed, that shall be to you for meate. For the second, Every thing (saith God) that moveth and liveth shall be meat for you, as the green hearb I have given all things. For the third and last sort, both the sundry Commandements of God in sackages of Cities, to put to sword, man, woman, and childe, prove it, as also many his Lawes made to that end. Gen. 9. 3.

Quest. But may any man shed mans blood?

Answ. No, only they have lawfully shed mans blood, which have had a calling of the Lord to the same, as the Magistrate.

Quest. And what say you of the Warriour?

Answ. We must comprehend him under the title of a Magistrate, for so indeed he is, if he be thereunto appointed. The calling also John Baptist approveth in that his speech unto the soldiers, whom he doth not bid to leave that life, but to use it rightly, which yet he would not have advised them, if it had been ungodly. Also in the Gospell, Christ toucheth not the Centurion for his kinde of life, neither Peter Cornelius, who was a Captaine, or yet his messenger, which was a soldier. And I come unto thee (saith David) in the name of the Lord, and blessed be the Lord which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight. Luke 3. Mat. 8. Acts 10. Psal. 143.

Quest. Is only the actuall killing of man forbidden?

Answ. No, but even aswell also the ordinary forerunners of murther, to wit, fighting, and quarrelling. For, if a man cause any blemish in his neighbour; (saith the Law) as he hath done, so shall it be done unto him. Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe. Whereby we see plainly how the God of heaven alloweth not that hurting, and laming of our brethren in fight, which a fleshly man taketh to be so lawfull, so glorious, and an argument of such valour in him. And no doubt but this Law of God thus executed upon us would quickly coole that raging heat within us, which no counsell of our friends, no consideration of necessary circumstances, as of our calling, the place where we live, the charge of wife, children, and such like hanging upon our safety, the law of man, no nor the Law of God it self condemning us for it, can stay or asswage. Again, Resist not evill (saith the Lord) but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheeke, turn to him the other also: That is, be so far from yeelding to the rage of thy affections, which provoke thee to strike againe, that even rather be thou content to take as much more, than to displease thy God, by ungodly and forbidden revenge. And for quarrelling, what a sweet and vehement perswasion is it of the Apostle against such bitter words of a boyling and boisterous heart? Now therefore (saith he) as the elect of God, holy and beloved, put on tender mercy and kindnesse, humblenesse of minde, meeknesse, long suffering, forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrell to another, even as Christ forgave you, even so do ye. Hatefull therefore before God are, as I say, the ordinary forerunners of murther, quarrelling, and fighting with their fellowes whatsoever. And assuredly if the Lord were in us, as wee thinke he is, that meek spirit of his would kill more and more that fearefull hastinesse to revenge, that is even in all, and we would learne of him, for he is meek and lowly in heart. Mat. 5. 39. Coloss. 3. 13.

Quest. What thinke you of killing by combat?

Answ. I must needs thinke that the practice in a Christian Common-wealth being naught and unlawfull, the death that thereby ensues, is horrible murther, and condemned in this Commandement. Mat. 11. 20.

mandement. Now, that to fight a combat in a godly State is not tolerable, it may eaſily appeare if you weigh the cauſes for which it is at any time taken in hand. For if they be not (as it will appeare) ſufficient to warrant it, then is it not warrantable. The firſt cauſe that is alledged for it, is to try a truth, which otherwiſe cannot be knowne ſay they. But it may be anſwered that the end good, doth not by and by make the meanes good: to try out a truth is good, but to try it with the hazard of life, is more than can be warranted.

There are many lawfull meanes to finde out truth by, and if all thoſe faile, then is it evident that the Lord for ſome cauſe reſerveth it to himſelfe for a ſecret: and to ſeeke importunately and impatiently by extraordinary meanes (as a combate) to finde it out is to tempt the Lord, and even as it were by violence to draw from him the manifeſtation of that which as yet hee would not have revealed.

Secondly, the one party is innocent, yet either of them deſireth the death of the other indifferently, ſo that murther is in the heart of both of them, which amongſt Chriſtians ſhould not be countenanced. Sometimes the combate is craved for vaine oſtentation of courage & ſtrength, many a Thraſo thinking his glory to ſtand in the challenging of another to ungodlineſs, but this I hope no man will ſay to be a good cauſe for a Magiſtrate to admit of a combate. Sometimes to avoide or revenge ſome great diſgrace offered to a man, he beggeth thus to fight. But a Chriſtian man that muſt make an account at the day of Judgement of his life given him from above, muſt learne to eſteeme more of life, than honour (if honour by lawfull meanes may not be kept) and more of God and his Commandement, than of them both. Beſides, the profeſſion of a Chriſtian is to heare evill and to ſuffer evill, though he doe well, and deſerve ſo: therefore farre ſhould we be from yeelding to ſuch heats. Some alledge that it endeth ſtrife, and therefore is to be admitted: but to this may ſerve the anſwer to the firſt cauſe alledged for it.

And beſides, who knoweth not that howſoever it endeth it betwixt thoſe two, becauſe the one of them dyeth, yet layeth it the foundation of even deadly hatred in the hearts of all their friends, ſeed, and poſterity, and ſo for one which is killed, there ſtarteth up an hundred diſcontented hearts, ſeeking and following all occaſions of ſtrife againſt their enemies. Therefore in peace and at home how a Chriſtian Magiſtrate may allow the combate, we finde no ſufficient cauſe and warrant for the field: yet ſome doe thinke it is meete, and that they have reaſon for it, for ſay they when two Armies are incamped in battle together, if upon cauſes it bee judged fit not to hazard the loſſe of many, but to commit it to two Champions, either ſide agreeing to yeeld upon the overthrow of their man, who can miſlike this? But we anſwer, that as yet the combate in it ſelfe is not proved good, but is evill: and to doe evill that good may come of it, we may not.

Againe, in ſuch a caſe as this, we muſt conſider, not only of the men and their ſafety, but alſo of the cauſe and his honeſty. The cauſe is certainly either good or evill, either juſt or unjuſt. If it be good and juſt, then is not the credit of it to be laid upon one man onely to the mocking of juſtice and right: and if it be evill and unjuſt, then of a Chriſtian Magiſtrate not one mans life to be ſpent in it, and for it.

Yea, but ſay they yet further, the party that hath the good cauſe is far the weaker, and not able to ſtand if they once joyne all together, & therefore this other way of two to try all, is good. And we anſwer alſo further, that this were a marvellous diſtruſt of Gods mercy and power, not tolerable in a Chriſtian. For if the cauſe be good and meet to be maintained, then is the cauſe the Lords, the men the Lords, and he ſaveth not by Bow and Speare, nor by the multitude of an hoſt, ſo that we ſhould ſo regard theſe, but giveth victory at his will to the weaker, and driveth away, as the winde the duſt, very mighty force aſſembled againſt him, and his children. Therefore, not even yet doe I ſee a cauſe to beare out any combate. If there be any corruption in men that juſtice be not done (which ſometimes alſo is a cauſe alledged) we muſt ſay as he ſaid, committing our ſelves and our matter to God. Video, fero, ſpero: That is, I ſee, I ſuffer, I truſt in God. And even with a good heart, be ready to heare any thing, rather than by a thing whereof I have no warrant, to ſeeke my ſatisfaction.

Queſt. Why, what ſay you then of Davids act with Goliah?

Numb 25. Exod. 32. 1 Kings 18.

Anſw. I ſay it was an extraordinary motion in the heart of David, wrought by the Lord upon the hearing of blaſphemy againſt God, and it may not be our imitation, no more than the fact of Phinees, of the Levites, or of Eliah, which were all meere extraordinary, and had their warrant by ſuch ſpecialty from the Lord, as that others may not look it ſhall extend to them, if they doe the like.

Queſt. What now of killing of our ſelves, is that never tolerable?

Chap. 1.

Anſw. Much of this matter hath S. Auguſtine, in his firſt Booke of the City of God. And firſt he reaſoneth thus, If Iudas did evill in hanging himſelfe (which hee thinketh no man will deny) what may warrant any man or woman to lay violent hands upon themſelves? For never can any fall in earth to a fouler fact, or to worſe eſtate in the eyes of God and man. Secondly ſaith he, the Law ſaith not, Thou ſhalt not kill thy neighbor, limiting it as it were to ſome, but indefinitely, definitely, Thou ſhalt not kill, extending it largely to all: and therefore ſaith he, not even our ſelves may we make away. Thirdly, not Iob in all his extremity durſt doe this, when as yet one prick would have finiſhed all his woe. And therefore no man may kill himſelfe. Chap.28. Chap.24.

Queſt. Well, but yet becauſe you name Auguſtine, I have heard of ſome cauſes propounded by him in this matter?

Anſw. Truth it is, but none to the warranting of this ſinne. For firſt ſaith he, what if a woman doe it to ſhun pollution of her body, or after ſhe is polluted to flie the ignominy following upon it? And he anſwereth to it, that the firſt is wicked, and proceedeth of this error, that whatſoever is done in us, the ſame is alſo done by us, which is not ſo, for then were chaſtity a vertue of the body, and not of the minde. It is not for a Chriſtian to ſay, this will I not ſuffer, but this will I not do. The minde being ſtained, the body is filthy, though it never did act, but not contrariwiſe: for the body by violence abuſed, is never able to make guilty the minde which conſenteth not to it. And therefore this excuſe, ſaith Auſten, cannot warrant ſuch ſin, as to kill our ſelves. For flying of ſhame which would follow that fact, neither, yet may it be done: for the ſhame is not ſo great as the act, and therefore if the deed done unto her may not warrant her, the ignominy following may not doe it. Si non eſt impudica quæ invita comprimitur, non eſt illa juſtitia qua caſta punitur: That is, If ſhe be now unchaſt which unwilling is oppreſſed, then is it no juſtice wherby the harmleſs is puniſhed. Sedmulier avida laudis metuit, ne quod violenter paſſa eſt dum viveret, putaretur libenter paſſa ſi viveret. But ſaith he, A woman that ſtandeth upon ſpeech and praiſe, reaſoneth with her ſelfe, that what ſhe ſuffered againſt her will while ſhe lived, ſhe ſhould be thought to ſuffer with her will, if ſhe lived: And therefore, ſhe will kill her ſelfe. Indeed, ſo may a woman reaſon that regardeth more man than God: But the Chriſtian guided with the ſpirit that David had, learneth to ſay with him, O God thou knoweſt my innocency, &c. And to reſt in joy of ſpotleſſe minde, whatſoever the world ſpeaketh. Then goeth he further, and they will anſwer ſaith he, what can they tell how they may be tempted to conſent by long importunity, or by ſight of hard extremity, and therefore they will provide before hand, leſt they ſhould offend, and they will kill themſelves. O, ſaith Auſten, what a ſpeech is this? Iam nunc peccemus, ne poſtea forte peccemus: jam nunc perpetremus certum homicidium, ne poſtea incidamus in incertum adulterium: That is, Let us now ſin, leſt hereafter we do ſin: let us now commit certaine murther, leſt we fall hereafter into uncertain adultery. Let us now do that which we cannot live to repent, leſt hereafter we doe what we may repent, &c.

Queſt. But indeed is it not a vile thing to fall into the hands of mine enemy?

Anſw. Indeed, Cato an Heathen, with many other could not abide it, neither Saul a caſtaway could ſuffer it. But better is the warrant ever of this ought to be done, than, and this is done of another: therefore we muſt not weigh the latter, but the former. And we ſee neither Patriarks, Prophets, nor Apoſtles, ever to have done it. Nay, ſaith Chriſt, When they perſecute you in one city fly into another. Where he might have ſaid, diſpatch your ſelves, leſt your enemies triumph over you. Now, if they might not doe it, for whom everlaſting manſions in heaven were provided, what care we for a thouſand examples of Infidels and Pagans? Thus then I conclude, that neither for theſe cauſes alledged, nor any other whatſoever, we may violently deal with our ſelves, and end our life.

Queſt. What if we neither kill others nor our ſelves, but yet peradventure conſent?

Anſw. Even that conſent of heart is horrible murther, and condemned in this Law. Herodias as guilty for conſenting to the death of Iohn Baptiſt, and ſeeing it, as if ſhee had hewed off his head her ſelfe. Haman as guilty for Mardocheus, as if he had done it: David for Vrias, Ieſabel for Naboth, Pilat for Chriſt, as if they themſelves had been executioners.

Queſt. Often alſo have I heard men ſay, that ſorow and care will ſhorten our time?

Anſw. Indeed it is not mans ſpeech only, but even the Doctrine of the Spirit of God. For a joyfull heart (ſaith Solomon) cauſeth good health, and a ſorowfull minde dryeth the bones. Heavineſſe in the heart of man bringeth it downe, but a good word rejoyceth it: yea, a joyfull heart maketh a cheerfull countenance, and by the ſorow of the heart, the minde is heavy. This Doctrine of God have men by experience found ever ſo true, that when any of them in their writings have ſpoken of care and ſorow, they have given unto them the epithites of biting, eating, conſuming care, and ſuch like, becauſe indeed they have that worke in thoſe that are too much ſubject to them. Galen the Prince of Phyſitians, in his Booke of the preſervation of health, affirmeth plainly that cares doe pull on and haſten many diſeaſes in us. Ariſtotle a Philoſopher ſaith, that ſorow dryeth and waſteth that naturall heat in us wherein our life conſiſteth, and ſo as it were giveth a reaſon of Galens aſſertion. No doubt the thing is true, tryed and found to their harme in thouſands. And therefore even in this reſpect muſt a Chriſtian beware leſt the Lord have againſt him in the day of judgement, that he ſhortned his owne life, ſuffering uncomfortable ſorow to lie ſnubbing and checking his heart within both day and night. Alas, what is it that ever hapned to a man or woman in earth, which taſt the mercy of God in Chriſt Jeſus towards them, ſo bitter, as that it may not be allayed, and comforted even with this, that God is on their ſide, and who or what Prov.17.22. 12.25. 15.Verſe 13. Rom.8.

can be againſt them? Doth not every thing, yea even every thing happen for the beſt to thoſe that love God? Have a true heart, and meane not falſly, and then ſay in faith as David doth, My help commeth of God which preſerveth them that are true of heart. Yea, let me ſay to all that ever ſhall reade this, in the name of the Lord of heaven, when cauſe of humility hapneth, deferre not to be humbled, harden not your hearts in the day of affliction, but ſacrifice them up bruiſed and troubled to the Lord, yet ever ſo far yeeld to ſorow, as that you conſtantly and even cheerefully hold that which followeth in the Prophet, A broken and contrite heart is never deſpiſed. And therefore whatſoever the matter is, with David unto your ſad ſoule in every corner cry: Why art thou ſo ſad, O my ſoul, and why art thou ſo diſquieted in me? Still truſt in God, ſtill truſt in God, for I will yet thank him, he is the help of my countenance, and my God. Thus tarry ye the Lords leiſure, be ſtrong and he ſhall comfort your heart, and put your truſt in the Lord.

O Lord help. Omnes cum vaſemus, &c. Pſal. 42. Pſal. 7. ult.

Queſt. Thus then having ſpoken of actuall murther, or murther of the hand, as we ſay, together with the branches thereof, proceed if you thinke good to the murther of the tongue.

Anſw. That even by the tongue alſo this Commandement is broken, it is evident by the teſtimony of our Saviour Chriſt himſelfe, who expounding this Law in the fifth of Mathew, concludeth them in it that ſay Racha, or thou foole to their brethren, that is, that by bitter and uncomely ſpeeches ſhew their heatts to be robbed of love, and to lodge an unlawfull affection towards them.

Mat. 5.

Secondly, the compariſons which the Scripture uſeth of the tongue, proveth plainly there is a murther by the tongue. It compareth it to poiſon, to fire, to ſpeares, to ſharp arrows, and many ſuch things, and all to teach, that as theſe are the inſtruments of murther, ſo is the tongue. Wherefore juſtly prayeth David in his Pſalmes, O Lord deliver me from lying lips, and from a deceitfull tongue. Iuſtly pronounceth he the curſe of God upon it in another place, ſaying, that the Lord ſhall roote out all deceitfull lips. And Solomon alſo flatly affirmeth, that he which hath a naughty tongue, ſhall fall into evill. Marvellous me think is alſo the diſcourſe of that wiſe man Syrach touching this matter, and to be carefully weighed: Abhor (ſaith he) the ſlanderer and double tongued, for ſuch have deſtroyed many that were at peace. The double tongue hath diſquieted many, and driven them from nation to nation: ſtrong cities hath it broken down, & overthrown the houſes of great men: the ſtrength of the people hath it brought down, & been the decay of mighty nations: the double tongue hath caſt out many vertuous women, and robbed them of their labours. Who ſo harkeneth unto it ſhall never finde reſt, neither ever dwell quietly. The ſtroke of the rod maketh markes in the fleſh, but the ſtroke of the tongue breaketh the bones. There be many that have periſhed by the edge of the ſword, but not ſo many as have fallen by the tongue. Well is him that is kept from an evill tongue, and commeth not in the anger thereof, which hath not drawne in that yoke, neither hath beene bound in the bands thereof. For the yoke thereof is a yoke of iron, and the bands thereof are bands of braſſe. The death thereof is an evill death, and hell were better than ſuch one. With moe ſuch ſpeeches in that Chapter if you reade it over. And in another place, Who ſhall ſet a watch before my mouth, and a ſeale of wiſdome upon my lips, that I fall not ſuddenly by them, and that my tongue deſtroy me not? Fearefull therefore is the fault of the tongue, as we plainly ſee.

Queſt. How doe men uſe to kill by themſelves?

Anſw. By ſlanders, reproaches, mockes, and taunts, ſaith your Booke (and conſider indeed the diſpleaſure of God againſt all theſe: as againſt the firſt by an expreſſe Law againſt it:) Thou ſhalt not walke about with tales among the people, meaning, as ſlanderers, backbiters, and quarrell pickers doe. Alſo by the hatred of it, which the Spirit of God worketh againſt it in the godly, as in David, who ſaith he will deſtroy the ungodly ſlanderer which privily ſlandereth his neighbour: in Solomon, who counſelleth in any caſe to refraine harkening to them: and in many others. Againſt the ſecond by his Law publiſhed in that behalfe: that we ſhould not curſe the deafe, neither put a ſtumbling block before the blinde, that is, no way reproach them with their infirmity, but feare the Lord, for he is our God, as though he ſhould ſay, reproaches of our brethren, and to feare the Lord, are never in one man together. And it is a ſpeech worthy noting, of the wiſe Syrach, That who ſo caſteth a ſtone at birds, frayeth them away, and he that upbraideth his friend, breaketh friendſhip. Yea, mark what followeth, though thou dreweſt a ſword ſaith he, at thy friend, yet deſpaire not, for there may be a returning to favour. If thou have opened thy mouth againſt thy friend, feare not, for there may be a reconciliation: but if upbraiding, or pride, or diſcloſing of ſecrets, or a traiterous wound doe let, then by theſe things, every friend will depart. And againe, in another place; the man that is accuſtomed to opprobrious words, will never be reformed all the dayes of his life.

Queſt. Horrible I ſee then it is either to ſlander or reproach any with ſuch infirmities as they have, but a mocke I take not to be in ſo high a degree?

Anſw. What degree ſoever it is in, it skilleth not, certain and ſure it is, that God abhorreth it. And I refer but any heart that hath feeling to the firſt words of David in his Pſalmes, Bleſſed is that man that hath not ſate in the ſeat of the ſcornfull: I beſeech you if they be bleſſed that have not done it, what are they that daily doe it? The wicked thought of a foole is ſin, and the ſcorner is an abhomination abhomination to men, ſaith Solomon. Yea, ſcornfull men bring a City into a ſnare, be that rebuketh a ſcorner purchaſeth to himſelf ſhame, and he that rebuketh the wicked getteth a blot. Rebuke not a ſcorner leſt he hate thee, but rebuke a wiſe man and he will love thee. Wherefore not without reaſon ſeemeth the tranſlation of Hierome, and the Greekes, of the Hebrew word Lezim, mockers, into peſtilents, peſtilent fellows and hurtfull, for ſo they are indeed, even the plagues of a Common-weale. Yet if we mark the uſuall cauſe of mocks, it will make us ſee more into the vileneſs of this ſinne. For it is ever lightly for doing well, and refraining evill, that the wicked mock the godly, and is it not a vile ſpirit that cannot abide vertue, but ſo greedily thirſteth after vice? Drinke not with the drunkards till thou be drunke, and they mock thee: ſweare not with the ſwearers, but admoniſh them, and they mock thee. Be not vain in words, in apparell, in behaviour, and they mock thee. Heare the word, reade the word, talk of the word, and by and by, O yong Saint, old devill, you will to heaven or your bones be cold, with a number ſuch mockes and devilliſh taunts. The degrees be divers, yet all devilliſh, ſome ſcorne all admonition, and they would have every fatte (they ſay) ſtand on his owne bottome, and every man to meddle with himſelfe. Some ſcorne, but at that which toucheth themſelves, ſhooting out their lips, and refuſing to be charmed. Some ſecretly in heart, by a moſt contemptuous conceit of that good thing whatſoever, which their crooked nature cannot like of. Others openly by very vile ſpeeches uttered againſt God and godlineſſe, againſt their brethren, and what graces God hath given them. But it is a ſealed truth, and God give us hearts to conſider it well; Iudgements are prepared for the ſcorner, and ſtripes for the back of the foole. Michol, Davids wife, a mocking miſtreſſe, out of her gaſing window not ſparing her owne husband the King of a frump, and that in a good thing, found the reward of it at the Lord, ſhe was curſed as barren while her life endured, and never had children. Thoſe mocking children at the baldneſſe of the Prophet, felt the reward of ſuch a ſin: For our example the Lord cauſed Beares to devoure them all preſently. Semei that ſcorned the eſtate of David, went not to his grave in peace. Bician that ſcoffer, was devoured of dogs, as they write. And as yet never ſcaped the unrepenting ſcorner the hands of the Lord. For how ſhould it ſtand with his juſtice, to call us to a reckning for our idle words, and not for our mockes and ungodly taunts? wherefore truth it is, and ſhall ever ſtand: Bleſſed is the man that hath not ſate in the ſeate of the ſcornfull.

Prov. 19.29.

2 Kings 2.

Queſt. Why, but may we not jeſt merily one with another?

Anſw. Yes indeed, for all jeſting is not mocking, ſuch as now we have ſpoken of, and ſhewed to be evill. Merily, if you remember, did the Prophet Eliah jeſt with the Idolaters and worſhippers of Baal, bidding them cry loud, for their god peradventure might bee talking with ſome body, or purſuing his enemies, or in ſome journey ſome whither, or peradventure aſleep. Thus ſaith the Text, did Eliah mock them, and yet this mocking being but a pleaſant jeſting to have taught them good if they had grace, diſpleaſed not the Lord. Another example alſo we have in the Prophet Eſay, laughing as it were at their folly who would worſhip that as God, the chips whereof had made them ſuch a fire that they cryed A ha, I am well warmed. And for the place to the Epheſians, it condemneth not this manner of ſpeaking and jeſting, but that which proceedeth either of a vain deſire to ſhew our ſelves, or of an ungodly covering to ſting our brethren.

Epheſ. 5.

Queſt. Thus then I ſee the malice of the tongue to be great, and even all men by it to be made guilty of this Commandement, though their hands never ſhed blood: yet is it ſuch a miſchiefe as the godly are much ſubject to, I meane, to be ſtinged with the tongues of the wicked: and therefore I pray you if you know any give me ſome counſell how to thinke of this croſſe.

Anſw. Truth it is, that howſoever the ſin be great to mock, or to ſpeake againſt any deſpitefully, and eſpecially the godly, yet is it a croſſe uſually incident to them that will ſeparate the ſins of this world, ſo neare as they can from their lives, to be taunted and ſpoken againſt, by both open deſpiſers of goodnes, & by open profeſſors alſo of religion. And that comfort which I know, is to thinke even often and ſeriouſly of theſe, and ſuch other places; The mouth of the wicked, and the mouth full of deceit are opened upon me (ſaith David) They have ſpoken to me with a lying tongue, they compaſſed me about alſo with words of hatred, and fought againſt mee without a cauſe. For my friendſhip they were mine adverſaries. But I gave my ſelfe to prayer. See the refuge of this Saint of God in this kinde of croſſe, even to heaven: mark the reſt of his conſcience, even the Lord: and if ever the like caſe be ours, let us poure with him our guiltleſſe grief into the boſome of our God, and thereon tend, till the Lord think good to make our truth appeare alſo to men. The like ſpeech and practice note again in another place of the ſame booke; Princes (ſaith he) did ſit and ſpeak againſt me, but thy ſervant did meditate in thy ſtatutes. And again, The proud have had mee exceedingly in deriſion, yet have I not ſhrinked from thy Commandements. And what a ſpeech is it of Paul to the Corinthians? I take pleaſure in infirmities, in reproaches, &c. Wherefore in God rejoyce, who ſeeth the heart that meant no harme, in the Lord be cheerfull, whoſe mercy turneth the deſerved croſſe of many great griefs into the biting of a peeviſh tongue, and in patience paſſing the time on, ſay in faith, what many have ſaid in folly: That time ſhall try the truth.

Pſal. 119.23. Verſe 51. 2 Cor. 12.10.

Queſt. Yet there are ſome moe branches of this murther of the tongue.

Anſw. Indeed by the tongue alſo no doubt they kill, who by cruell counſell ſtir up the hating hearts of men to any bloody perſecution, or which with their mouthes witneſſe an untruth, to the end to ſhed any blood thereby, as did the Judges of Suſanna, and as many conſcienceleſſe in theſe dayes doe, being upon an enqueſt of life and death, to be maſters of their will.

Queſt. Now if you thinke good, a little alſo of the third kinde of murther, namely, of the heart, and firſt how it is proved?

That there is a murther of the heart.

Anſw. The words of our Saviour Chriſt are plaine, that out of the heart come evill thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murthers. Therefore there is a murther of the heart. Again, S. Iohn ſaith, Whoſoever hateth his brother is a manſlayer. But hatred is in the heart, & therefore manſlaughter. Thirdly, the minde and the will being the beginnings or fountaines of all actions, if they be infected, the man muſt needs be guilty before the Lord.

Queſt. Doth this feareſull ſin ſtep into the heart at firſt, or it creepeth rather by degrees, as other great ſins doe?

Anſw. Satan is more ſubtill than ſo, to draw every man to the extremity of ſinne at the firſt, and therefore howſoever in ſome men he doth upon a ſudden, yet ordinarily this murther ſtealeth into our hearts by theſe ſteps. Firſt, Satan breedeth by his unmarked creeping into our affections a miſliking of ſuch a man or woman, and yet we well know not why, but we cannot like them. Then doth this miſliking breed anger: for we cannot beare at their hands, that which we can well ſuffer at others. Anger breedeth hatred, hatred deſire of revenge, and deſire of revenge murther. Thus ſtealeth ſin into us, and by theſe ſteps. Therefore firſt every Chriſtian is to take heed how miſliking of any groweth upon him, and to ſnub the courſe of Satan at the firſt. Secondly, to looke the fruit thereof, namely, anger, weighing well what was ſaid to Cain, Cain why art thou angry? And by our Saviour Chriſt in the Goſpell, But I ſay unto you, whoſoever is angry with his brother unadviſedly, ſhall be culpable of judgement, expounding there this Commandement, and including as you ſee anger in it. And hence have growne all thoſe vehement ſpeeches in the Scriptures againſt it; Let all bitterneſſe, and anger, and wrath be put away from you, and be ye courteous one towards another, and tender hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Chriſts ſake forgave you (ſaith the Apoſtle.) And again, Be ſlow to wrath, ſaith another. For the wrath of man doth not accompliſh the righteouſneſſe of God, That is, anger and wrath hindreth Gods work in us. Unto which and a number ſuch other perſwaſions in the Word, the prophane writers by the very light of reaſon have agreed, and ſought in their ſort to give men a ſight of this foule vice. Anger have they ſaid, is the beginning of madneſſe, anger is the drunkenneſſe of the minde, anger admitteth not good counſell, anger is the roote of murther, death, with a number ſuch ſpeeches.

Miſliking.

Anger.

Gen. 1. 6.

Mat. 5.

Epheſ. 4. 31.

Iames 4. 19.

Queſt. Foule then I ſee is this vice in all, and eſpecially in a Chriſtian: and therefore it were good we knew how to avoide it.

Anſw. We reade that a King of Thracia being preſented with a ſort of very fine glaſſes, by and by brake them all in pieces. And being asked the reaſon, anſwered, that he did it to avoid the wrath that he was ſure would be in him againſt them that ſhould breake them afterward. How then are we taught by this King, though not every way to doe as hee did, yet with him to be carefull to prevent our anger by taking away the occaſion? The occaſions of anger in many men are play, and gaming, curioſity in dealing and medling, taking a matter as they thinke they heard it, when indeed they heard it not right, nipping words, and gauling ſpeeches, with a number ſuch: which if men will not have any care to eſchew, then in vaine doe they ſay they are afraid to let murther into their hearts. For in truth the effects will follow if the ordinary cauſes doe goe before.

Queſt. Why, but is all anger forbidden to a Chriſtian?

Anſw. No indeed: it is as lawfull for a man in time, place, in his office, and for a juſt cauſe to be angry in convenient meaſure, as it is unlawfull otherwiſe. And it is apparent by the children of God, in all ages, the Patriarkes, Prophets, Apoſtles, and other, whoſe hearts have burned with miſliking of evill, and words bewrayed as much unto them. Wherefore truly was it ſaid of the godly Father, Nolle iraſci, ubi iraſcendum eſt, nolle emendare peccatum eſt: That is, for a man not to bee angry, when hee ſhould bee angry, is as much as to bee unwilling to amend what is amiſſe.

Queſt. Proceed now I pray you to the other branches.

Anſw. Anger as was ſaid, begetteth hatred, nay becommeth hatred if it be let to ſettle. For Odium eſt inveterata ira, Hatred is nothing elſe but old anger: and therefore ſince anger is apparently forbidden in this Commandement, hatred by conſequence being feſtred anger, muſt needs be much more. Beſides, we have heard the words of the Scripture plaine, He that hateth his brother is a marſlayer. Therefore I paſſe it over and come to the fellow that is ever joyned with it, when it meeteth with a fit ſubject, to wit, envy, a vice cõpounded of the hatred of another for vertue, gifts, favour, and honour, and ſuch like, and of ſelf-love which maketh us grieve to ſee our ſelves in theſe things excelled of him. A vice alſo of the Spirit of God by name forbidden.

1 Iohn 5.

Envy what it is forbidden. Eat not the meat (ſaith Salomon) of him that hath an evill eye, neither deſire his dainties. Let us not be deſirous of vaine glory (ſaith the Apoſtle) provoking one another, envying one another. But laying aſide all maliciouſneſs, all guile and diſſimulation, all envie and evill ſpeaking, as new born babes, let us deſire the ſincere milke of the Word of God, that we may grow thereby. Unto which expreſſe teſtimonies if we joyne the experience of ſuch evil as envy hath wrought, we ſhall plainly ſee the foulneſſe of it. Aaron and Miriam envied Moſes, and the Lord with leproſie plagued her. Corah and his company envyed him alſo, and the Lord as abhorred, made the earth to ſhrinke and ſwallow them up quick, with all that they poſſeſſed. Saul had an eye upon David, for the womens ſinging, and it ſtirred him ſtill to ſeek the life of his ſonne and ſervant. Ioſephs brethren envied him, and it almoſt brought them to his blood-ſhedding. Every way therefore is envy in a Chriſtian poyſon, and apparently it faulteth againſt this Commandement. It is a poſſeſſion beſides, that deſtroyeth the poſſeſſor. For as the ruſt the yron, and mothes a garment, ſo eateth up envy the man that envyeth. Theſe things make envie loathſome enough to a godly minde, and yet is there more to be ſaid againſt it. For beſides all this, envie as it wiſheth another mans fall, ſo doth it rejoyce if it happen unto him. Which alſo is a thing very horrible in the eyes of God. For he that mocketh the poore (ſaith Salomon) reproached him that made him; and he that rejoyceth at deſtruction, ſhall not be unpuniſhed. Again, Be thou not glad, when thine enemy falleth, and let not thy heart rejoyce, when he ſtumbleth, leſt the Lord ſee it, and it diſpleaſe him, and he turne his wrath from him to be avenged of thee. To the which words of Salomon how conſonant was the practice of Iob, teſtified in that moſt excellent ſpeech of his: If I rejoyced at his deſtruction that hateth me (ſaith he) or was moved to joy when evill came upon him: If I ſuffered my mouth to ſin by wiſhing a curſe unto his ſoule, &c. Meaning that he never did it, neither would do. For it is a fearfull ſin, Calamitas illius fores pulſat, qui aliorũ calamitatibus non movetur: that is, Miſery knocketh at his door of right, whoſe heart ſorroweth not to ſee others in adverſitie. And never object his hard hap to any man (could the Greeke Orator ſay) for fortune is common to all, and what is to come, is not yet ſeene. Therefore even this companion of envy maketh it worſe, as I hope we ſee, and of all that would pleaſe the Lord more carefully to be ſhunned. To rejoyce at the ſinnes of another much more muſt be grievous, if his worldly eſtate may not bee rejoyced at that it is evill. Beſides, when by ſinne the Lord is grieved, and my brother wounded to eternall death, what a ſpirit were it to rejoyce? Again, conſider our ſelves in compariſon with them that offend, and either we are better, like, or worſe, the two later give no cauſe of joy, and the former ſhould fill our heart with praiſe for our grace given of God, and not our mouthes with mockes at the infirmitie of others.

Numb. 12.10.

Prov. 17.5. 24.18.

Iob. 3.1.

Queſt. What elſe is forbidden?

Anſw. Laſt of all, as the murther of the heart, is forbidden all cruelty and hard dealing with our brethren, for even this the Lord abhorreth alſo. The Law that was made of forty ſtripes to be given to an offender, and not above, did evidently draw to ſome pitifull feeling our cruell raging and fierce affections. The Law for widowes that they ſhould not be wronged, and for the fatherleſſe that they ſhould not be forſaken, ſhot at the ſame marke. So did the forbidding of Uſury to the poore, the taking of his raiment to pledge, the detaining his hire, and ſuch like things. All were to worke ſome mercy in us towards others, and to tell us plainly that the Lord abhorreth cruelty towards any.

Deut. 25.

Queſt. Thus then, if you thinke good, let it ſuffice to have ſpoken of theſe three ſorts of murther, to wit, of the hand, the tongue, and the heart, together with ther branches: and now a little of the affirmative part of this Commandement, if you will.

Anſw. The affirmative part of it eaſily may bee knowne by the negative. For who ſeeth not that if generally all hurting, or taking away of life (unleſſe it be by the Magiſtrate lawfully) bee forbidden, then generally alſo is commanded all care and preſervation of the ſame: and if in ſpecialty the bitterneſſe of the tongue be forbidden, then is the ſweetneſſe, the ſoftneſſe, and the comfort of the ſame commanded: if miſliking, hatred, envy, and joying at other mens harmes bee forbidden, then is an heart well thinking and accepting of other commanded, then is love and a true rejoycing at the good haps of our brethren commended: and to conclude, if all cruelty, rigor, and extremity be forbidden, then is all lenity, mercy, and pitie commanded. All which are vertues of great praiſe, and affording large perſwaſions unto our hearts to love and like them, to embrace and follow after them. But ſo ſhould I dwell too long in this Commandement. The blackneſſe of their oppoſite vices I hope, doth make their beauty and brightneſſe great before our eyes. Onely I wiſh us, to the end we may abound in all mercy, that we would often conſider that comfortable ſpeech of the Lord by his Prophet: If thou refreſh the hungry and troubled ſoule, then ſhall thy light ſpring out of darknes, the Lord ſhal ſatisfie thy ſoule in drought, and make fat thy bones, and thou ſhalt be like a ſpring of water, whoſe water faileth not: As alſo that ſentence which at the day of dayes ſhall be pronounced upon it; Come, come ye bleſſed of my Father, & poſſeſſe the kingdome prepared for you: for when I was hungry ye fed me, when I was thirſty you gave me drinke, when I was naked ye cloathed me, when I was ſick ye viſited me, &c. Both which places, places, with many moe to the ſame end being often thought upon, will ſoften our hearts in all dealings with our brethren, and make us profitable to them ever to our powers. And yet (which I had almoſt forgot) it is not enough for us to doe good, to be kinde, and to ſhew mercy, but we muſt do it alſo ſpeedily, readily and fitly, that is, when the need of our brethren requireth it, obſerving carefully all occaſions. For as it is ſaid of gifts, that, qui cito dat, bis dat, he that giveth a thing quickly, giveth it twice: ſo is it of all things we doe, to help in time is double help, and a benefit having loſt the opportunity of our brothers need, loſeth his welcome. Wherefore Iob propoſeth that he had not cauſed the eyes of the widow to faile in long looking for his helpe. And Mardocheus requireth of Heſter not onely helpe, but preſent, a ſingular example for all eſtates.

Queſt. What puniſhment had the breach of this Commandement?

Anſw. The ſpirituall puniſhment of it, as of all other ſinnes, is eternall damnation both of body and ſoule. For without ſhall be dogges, inchanters, whoremongers, murtherers, &c. (ſaith S. Iohn) The temporall puniſhment of it was amongſt the Jewes by the Lawes of God, blood for blood, and before the Law by expreſſe words, unleſſe in ſuch caſes as the Cities of refuge were ordained for. And even as it were above all other ſins it is worthy marking, how ever the judgement of God hath not ſuffered this ſinne to lie unknowne or unpuniſhed. All Stories bee full of examples, and every man almoſt in his owne dayes, hath knowne ſome experience. Hot is the wrath of the Lord againſt this ſinne, and his mercy therefore ever keepe us from it.

The Application.

WIth what words now ſhould I wiſh every one to deſcend into themſelves, and to take a view of their eſtate before the Lord touching this Commandement? Many branches of it have beene laid before us, and what branch is it which we have not broken, being narrowly ſifted by the Lord? The murther of the hand, I know will be our inſtance; but alas, how many things make men guilty in this? If ever in ſervice againſt the enemy we have paſſed the bounds of a Chriſtian heart, in cruelly murthering concerning the manner, who yet might have dyed reſpecting the matter, weeare guilty and ſpotted before the Lord. If women and children, aged and impotent, ſick and diſeaſed, that carryed no weapon againſt our cauſe, have not ſo farre forth been regarded of us and ſpared, yea defended by us from our fiercer fellowes as by right we might, our hands have faulted, and our love hath wanted to the life of our brethren. If cruelly we have wiſhed, but in our inward hearts any diſorderly and unmercifull ſpoile of our foes in field, wee have ſinned certainly in this doing. For even the ſpoyle that a Chriſtian ſouldier maketh of his enemies in the warres, ſhould ſavour of the mercifull nature, ſo neare as he can, of that God whom he profeſſeth. If we have been ever, as you heard, but any occaſion of the death of any, either preſent, or ſpeedier than otherwiſe it would have beene, or of the ſhortning of our owne health, life and ability, by intemperancy, incontinency, or any meanes whatſoever, the juſtice of our undefiled God doth finde it out, and wee have ſinned againſt him in this thing. Where then is our righteouſneſſe, but even in this branch of actuall and hand murther? For the tongue what ſhould I ſay? Doth no mans heart accuſe him of unrighteouſneſſe? Have we never paſſed any ſpitefull ſlander, to the hurt of them we ſhould have loved? Denyall of it can never hide it, but confeſſion of it hath mercy promiſed. The name peradventure of ſlander is odious to us, and we hardly can accuſe our ſelves of ſo foule a vice. Well then, let him change his coate, but remaine the ſame monſter ſtill. Have wee never reported any unknowne thing to the harme of our brethren? Never whiſpered that matter in the eare of another againſt any body, which yet if it had been mine owne offence, I would willingly have wiſhed concealed and covered? Hath this heart of mine carryed ever that love in this reſpect, and that true and tender regard of my brothers credit that poſſibly it might, or of duty it ſhould? O the God of gods be mercifull unto us, and deale not with us according to our ſinnes, neither ever reward us according to our iniquities. For I am ſure I may ſpeake it in truth, and yet in ſorrow againſt all fleſh that liveth, we are faulty in this behalfe. Wee ſnub not our hearts when we ſee their want of love provoke our tongues to ſpeake unlovingly. We ſay not in our ſelves with a pauſe upon the matter, matter, what am I about to say, to whom, of whom, to what end? Will it hurt or profit him, what is my desire, how should I wish if his case were mine, and so forth? But headily, unadvisedly, and I feare unlovingly we speake what we list, and almost say with the wicked; Our tongues are our owne, and who shall controle us? Therefore I say againe for this branch of murther by the tongue, the God of mercy bee mercifull to us, and truely teach us how we both sinne in it, and how we ought to be reformed of it. For reproaches how stand we? Have we never cursed the deafe, nor put a stumbling block before the blind? That is, have we never insulted over any mans infirmity, or unkindly reproached him with his imperfection? O spitefull tongues of ours, how passe they the bands of love herein? It is our pleasure to bewray the wants of others, it is our pastime to grieve their spirits, and to gaule them for them, yea, we glory in their ignominie, we swell in conceit of our selves when we see them, and we stretch out our neckes, and lift up our hautie eyes when we passe by them. Their weakenesse is our boast all the day long, taunting them and riding them, as we use to speake, in every corner, and as very Pharisies we are in another case, we looke at their wants, we exalt our selves, and in pride we speake it, or at least inwardly thinke it, we are not as those silly idiots are. Rare is that man and woman that with a tender heart comforteth and covereth whom they see to need, as they wish their owne wants with the sufficiency of Jesus Christ covered from the wrath which they deserve. But I trust for the time that is to come, it shall never be verified of us, which we have heard before out of Salomon spoken, That the man which is accustomed to opprobrious words, will never bee reformed all the dayes of his life. And for that which is past, the God of mercy wipe it out as hee hath promised. Let us consider the mockes and taunts that have passed from us even with joy in our wits that wee could so doe, and every speech so neare as wee can, whereby our brethren have received harme privately or openly in place of justice, or out of it. And are wee then upright before the Lord touching the murther of the tongue? Blessed is the man whose unrighteousnesse is forgiven, and whose sinne even in this respect is covered. The murther of the heart remaineth, wherein we are to weigh how we have ever upon any occasion suffered mislike to grow within us of our brethren, or anger, or hatred, or envy, rejoycing at other mens fals, desire of revenge, crueltie, or bitternesse, pretermission of opportunity, or any other branch thereof, and whether through our negligence and suffering Satan to creepe upon us, even all these almost have not beene within us at one time or other, one pulling on another as things unseparable? How hath misliking of some, and wee well knew not why, made us apt to anger with any thing which they did, and often displeased with them more than we would? How hath anger being lodged too long, changed his nature and become hatred in us? How hath hatred hatched up envy and desire of revenge? how hath envy wished the fall of others, spited the good whatsoever it was, joyed at their misery, if wee lived to see it? How hath desire of revenge pricked us to the thing it selfe, nursed up cruelty and over great security? What wants have we shewed of tender compassion and comfort to the comfortlesse? What prolonging have we made of the good which we have done, and how carelesly have we passed many an opportunity to doe our duties in kindnesse to our brethren? Alas then, where is the perfection of our love, where is the innocency of our life, where is that integrity of ours touching this Commandment which wee dare present of it selfe to please before the Lord? Our hearts are stained, our tongues have straied, and even our hands also peradventure against it have grievously offended. Let us thinke of it, and the Lord give us hearts effectually to feele it. For the sight of sinne can never hurt us when it causeth sorrow and true repentance. And to see sinne, to despaire we need not, since Christ our Saviour hath fulfilled the Law for us. The very strength of the Law is but conditionall damnation, if we will not be humbled, if we will not repent: But if we doe, then steppeth Christ in with all his perfection, and presenteth himselfe to his Father for us; Then doth he justifie, and who can condemne? Then will hee save us, us, and what can lose us? O that we would therefore see our offences against every Commandement, and namely against this! O that we would confesse them as we can hereafter. The Lord give it, and the Lord grant it, and so shall we live with the Lord for ever.

The seventh Commandement.

Thou shalt not commit Adultery.

Question.

What is the meaning of this Commandement?

The act.

Answ. First there is forbidden all adultery, fornication, and other uncleanesse in our bodies (saith your Booke) which needeth no proofe besides the plaine words of the Law, and that print which in his conscience every one carrieth about: yet hath the Author added some for more strength against the froward, which I leave to every one to reade by themselves. Secondly, there are forbidden all unpure thoughts, and lusts of the heart. For as in the other Commandements it hath beene said, so is it to be thought of again in this; The Law-giver is Spirituall, and therefore this Law. Besides, it is testified in plaine words, that not onely he is guilty of this Law which committeth the act, but he also which looketh upon a woman and lusteth after her, and therefore the contrary is incident both to body & minde. Thirdly, the Apostle placeth chastity in body and minde. Nay, in very truth, man is rather that which he is in minde, than that which he is in body. The qualitie of the heart is the qualitie of the man, and therefore an adulterous heart, an adulterous man no doubt, and a breaker of this Commadement. Now what a generality may this particularity very profitably teach us, namely, not only to runne to the outward shew we beare, & to our body with the actions thereof, when we would judge of our selves, but even to our very heart and inward thoughts, to see how all doth there, and as there we finde, so to give sentence. If there bee integrity, then so thinke: but if there be lust and adultery, if there be dissimulation and falshood, if there bee iniquity and sinne, then according to it let us thinke of our selves, and say, the Lord be mercifull to us such and such, for as our hearts are, so are we. Moreover, it may give us a great light to discry the spirit that guideth the Church of Rome. For if God condemne the thought, how allow they the fact of simple fornication at the least, if not of adultery, and yet say they have the Spirit tho? Is the Spirit of God so variable, that sometime he condemneth the thought, and sometimes alloweth the very fact? What an impiety were this to be said or thought? Therefore strange out of question from the Lord is their spirit. Thirdly, in this Commandement is condemned that thing whatsoever, which inticeth to any uncleanesse, whereof there might many particulars be named.

The thought. Mat. 5. 21.

Man is that which he is in heart.

Quest. And I pray for more plainesse let it not be grievous to name some of the chiefe?

And of Sodomy for the 3 hot moneths.

Answ. First then, here is forbidden all wanton and immodest lookes, for the eye is a vehement inticer unto lust, as appeareth by many proofes. For thus fell Putiphars wife into ungodly lusting after Ioseph: for the Text saith, she cast her eyes upon Ioseph. Thus came David to adultery with Bersebe, even by disorderly looking upon her from his house top. Thus fell the sonnes of God into unlawfull love with the daughters of men, by seeing that they were faire. This caused Peter to say of the wicked that they had adulterous eyes. And the knowledge of it made Iob to take a bond of his eyes, that they should not looke upon a maide. Whereunto for another inticement to uncleanesse, we may referre all undecent and uncomely pictures, the corruption of our eyes, and consequently of our hearts, and therefore no doubt here also condemned. Thirdly, unchaste behaviour, such as the Lord cryeth out against by his Prophet, saying, that the daughters of Sion are haughty, and walke with stretched out necks, and with wandring eyes, walking, and mincing as they go, and making a tinckling with their feet, &c. Fourthly, all wanton speech, filthy tales, songs, and sonnets of love and lightnesse, lacivious salutations, and such like. For evill words corrupt good manners, and there must no corrupt communication proceed out of our mouthes, but such as is good to the use of edifying, and may minister grace to our hearers. As for filthinesse, foolish talking, jesting, and such like, they are things uncomely for a Christian. Again, unchaste books, and wanton writings, who knoweth not how they tickle to uncleanesse? and therefore both they and the reading of them forbidden in this Law. Sixtly, too much shew in apparell, painting, tricking and trimming our selves above conveniencie, it is a dangerous allurer of lust, and therefore forbidden.

Quest.

Queſt. I could wiſh yet a little larger ſpeech of apparell, becauſe I ſee it is one of the wormes that waſteth at this day the common-wealth, that decayeth houſe-keeping, that maketh ſtrait the hand of the maſter to his ſervant, and the Lord to his Tenant, and a thing to conclude, that the deare children of God cannot overcome themſelves in.

Anſw. And I will willingly anſwer your wiſh with a little more ſpeech of it, yet not ſuch as with diligence might be made, but ſuch rather as I have at times thought of, and found in ſome manner effectuall. Apparell.

Firſt, therefore mee thinke the very originall of apparell ſhould much move a Chriſtian feeling heart. For, when we had ſinned, then were we cloathed: when we had loſt our honour, then were we apparelled: ſo that it is the ſigne of our ſinne, the badge of our rebellion, the witneſſe of our ſhame, and it remembreth unto us, that we ſhould weepe continually to thinke what wee have loſt. Now alas, how ſmall cauſe have we to be proud of ſuch a livery? Nay, ſee the dulneſſe of our hearts, and the abſurdneſſe of our dealing. If a theefe ſhould be ſaved from hanging, with this condition added, that hee ſhould ever weare a halter, were it not a ſtrange hardneſſe of his heart if he ſhould ſo forget his fall, and ſo glory in his ſhame teſtifyed day and night unto him by that halter, that he ſhould begin to boaſt of his halter, to be proud of it, and to make it of ſilke in ſumptuous ſort, for ornament to his necke? Truely it were. And ſo it is in man a very ſtrange worke of Satan, that he ſhould ſo exceed in pride with this thing, the ſight whereof ſhould rather pinch his heart with ſorrow, than be ſo exalted even out of his owne knowledge, with apparell, which in truth (to ſpeake as a good heart ſhould feele it) ſhould humble us, beate us downe, and make us even with the Peacocke, let our feathers fall for the foulneſſe of our feet. Therefore I ſay one thing, me thinkes to draw us to mediocritie in this matter ſhould be well, weighing of the firſt beginning of apparell. Gen. 2.

Secondly, the ſpeedy waſte of it is ſomething. For how can a good conſcience warrant unto us ſuch great charge, yea, ſuch exceeding charge in a thing ſo changeable, when we ſhall give an account how we beſtowed our goods? The matter or the forme failes, ere ever our price bee halfe anſwered with uſe. And there is no eſtate in earth that may warrant a Chriſtian man or woman to be a wilfull waſter of the Lords gifts unto them.

Thirdly, the miſliking of the Word ſhould make miſliking in my heart of exceſſe or vanity in this matter. Now the Lord ſaith in the Law: Thou ſhalt not weare a garment of divers ſorts, as of woollen and linnen together. The meaning whereof was this, hee would not have them new-fangled, wanton and fantaſticall in their apparell. The ſame God cryeth out againſt the Jewes by his Prophet, that he would take away the ornament of the ſlippers, and the calles, and the round attires, the ſweet bals, the bracelets and the bonets, the attires of the head & the ſlops, the headbands, the tablets and the earings, the rings and mufflers, the coſtly apparell and the vailes, the wimples, and the criſping pins, the glaſſes, the hoods and the lawnes. With which in extremity uſed no doubt they had provoked the Lord, and daily did offend him. Alſo by another Prophet, I will viſit the Princes, and the Kings Children, and all ſuch as are cloathed with ſtrange apparell: that is, as imitate the vaine faſhions of other Countries in any vaine manner. And the Apoſtle Paul hath a moſt plain ſpeech to women, whereby men alſo may know their dutie. I will (ſaith he) *that the women array themſelves in comely apparell with ſhamefaſtneſſe and modeſty, not with * broidered haire of Gold, Pearles, and coſtly apparell, but as becommeth women that profeſſe the fear of God, with good workes.* Which very words Peter alſo hath to the ſame end. Theſe with many more ſuch places ſhew us the miſliking of the Lord of diſorder in apparell, and they ſhould I ſay me think make us miſlike alſo with it. Deut. 12. Eſa. 3. Soph. 1. 8. 2 Tim. 2. 9. * Reade the note of this word in the Teſtament. 1 Pet. 3. 3.

Fourthly, the ſentences of grave and godly Fathers, which have ſpoken of this matter, ſhould not be neglected of us. And what are they? If the matter of our apparell bee too coſtly, heare what Saint Bernard ſaith: exterior ſuperfluitas veſtium, interioris hominis indicium: The outward ſuperfluity and waſte of the garment, is an evident token of the inward man (that hee is unreformed.) If the forme and faſhion be unſeemely or wanton, then ſaith the ſame Father, Veſtium curioſitas deformitatis mentis & morum indicium eſt; The curioſitie of the garment bewrayeth deformitie of minde and manners in thee. Thus matter and forme being unſeeming, either of them diſcredit man and woman, and make their inward hidden corruption appeare to the world.

Fiftly, all the world knoweth it, and it cannot be denyed that immoderate apparell is a vehement inticement to the breach of this commandement: and therefore wicked. Caſtitatis comes frugalitas, The companion of chaſtity is frugalitie, ſaith a learned man, and even in apparell. I would to God, if with a Chriſtian heart any will not thinke of theſe two laſt reaſons, yet that they would thinke of them with worldly wiſdome, and in policie weigh them. For there is no man or woman ſo farre fallen out with religion, and honeſty, but that if they bee not ſuch, yet they deſire to ſeeme ſo, and to be ſo taken; now apparell in matter or forme unſeemly, robbeth them of this, that they neither ſeeme nor are thought to be of many. For touching religion, who can thinke them mortified to ſinne within in heart, who ſo ſeeme to live to all vanity and exceſſe without in body? Who can thinke they are reformed in ſoule, who are very much above their their calling unreformed in ſhew? Man cannot enter into the inward heart, but judgeth ever by the outward fruit, and religion withing uſeth alwayes to ſhew men effects without. For honeſty of body, though our hearts never meant any thing contrary to it, yet doe wee by apparell bring our credit in queſtion, when it paſſeth our calling and conveniency. And therefore even in policy, if we care not for Chriſtianity, wee ſhould beware. Laſt of all, modeſty in apparell both touching matter and forme, anſwereth to the originall of it well, which was to hide us after ſinne, confirmeth by practice that apparell is vaine, liveth according to the named Scriptures, eſcaping the threatned evils, and finding promiſed good, ſaveth our credit out of queſtion, anſwereth the gravity of the Goſpell, hindereth no piety, (for often under an ill garment a good heart is hidden) and laſtly, is ſo farre from alluring to luſt, that it even cutteth the throat of it, and very greatly ſtoppeth it. Sex ſunt enim quæ incorruptam ſervant caſtitatem, ſcilicet, ſobrietas, operatio, inhibitio ſenſuum, aſperitas cultus, raritas ſermonis, evitatio opportunitatis, perſonæ, loci, & temporis; that is, There are ſixe things which keepe chaſtity uncorrupted; to wit, ſobriety, labour, reſtraint of our ſenſes, courſneſſe of apparell, rareneſſe of ſpeech, and eſchewing of opportunity, of perſon, place, or time. O but yet it ſtickes in our hearts that apparell makes a man. Indeed many ſo judge both of themſelves and other, that they are made, and beautified by apparell. But the very heathen man ſhall condemne us,, if we doe ſo, who could thus ſay, that Ornamentum eſt quod ornat, ornat autem quod honeſtiorem facit. Id autem non aurum, non ſmaragdus, coccus, ſed quæcunque gravitatis, pudoris, & moderationis ſpeciem præbent: that is an ornament (ſaith he) which adorneth us, and that adorneth us that maketh us honeſter. Now that doth not gold, precious ſtone, ſcarlet, but that which giveth a ſhew of gravity, ſhamefaſtneſſe, and moderation. And thus now let it ſuffice a little to have anſwered your deſire touching apparell, pretermitting the judgment of God upon Herod, even then when hee was moſt royally cloathed above all other times, with many things moe, which to this end might be brought. And this I pray you take not ſpoken to draw all to an equality, or yet any from the thing that is meet for their calling, but to kindle care in all, that we deceive not our ſelves with our worldly calling ſo much, that we forget our calling to God, to his Goſpell, and to his mercies ſo many in Jeſus Chriſt, and what is convenient for the gravity and excellency thereof. This is my meaning, and this is my end.

Acts 12.

Queſt. Now then proceed I pray you to recite ſuch other provocations to the breach of this Commandement as you know.

Anſw. Theſe prophane and wanton Stage-playes or Enterludes, what an occaſion they are of adultery, and uncleanneſſe by geſture, by ſpeech, by conveyances, and devices to attaine to ſo ungodly deſires, the world knoweth with too much hurt by long experience. Vanities they are it we make the beſt of them, and the Prophet prayeth to have his eyes turned away by the Lord from beholding ſuch matter: Evill words corrupt good manners, and they have abundance. There is in them ever many dangerous ſights, and wee muſt abſtaine from all appearance of evill. They corrupt the eyes with alluring geſtures: the eyes, the heart: and the heart, the body, till all be horrible before the Lord. Hiſtrionicis geſtibus inquinantur omnia; (ſaith Chryſoſtome) Theſe Players behaviour polluteth all things. And of their Playes he ſaith, they are the feaſts of Satan, the inventions of the Devill, &c. Councels have decreed very ſharply againſt them, and polluted bodies by theſe filthy occaſions have on their death-beds confeſſed the danger of them, lamented their owne foule and grievous fals, and left their warning for ever with us to beware of them. But I referre you to them, that upon good knowledge of the abhomitations of them, have written largely and well againſt them. If they be dangerous on the day time, more dangerous on the night certainly: if on a ſtage, and in open Courts, much more in Chambers, and private houſes. For there are many roomes beſide that where the Play is, and peradventure the ſtrangeneſſe of the place, and lacke of light to guide them, cauſeth error in their way, more than good Chriſtians ſhould in their houſes ſuffer.

Queſt. What elſe?

Anſw. Dancing againe is in the number of vaine paſtimes, and the allurements to uncleanneſſe, as much experience hath too well proved. The Scriptures checke it, the Fathers miſlike it, the Councels have condemned it, and the proofe of Gods judgements upon it biddeth us beware. Inſtrumenta luxuriæ tympana & tripudia, ſaith one, the inticers to luſt are pipings and dancings. Laqueiſunt & ſcandala non ſolum ſaltatoribus, ſed ſpectatoribus: They are ſnares and offences not onely to the actors, but alſo to the beholders. Iob noteth it as an old practice of the Devill to occupie men withall, and as an ancient exerciſe of the wicked, that they ſhould dance. Upon which words a godly writer ſaith: that from the Tabret & the Flute, which in themſelves are not unlawful, they come to dancing, which is the chiefeſt miſchiefe of all. For there is alway (ſaith he) ſuch unchaſte behaviour in dancing, that of it ſelfe: and as they abuſe it, (to ſpeak the truth in a word) it is nothing elſe but an enticement to Whoredome. In the Goſpell the Spirit of God noteth it in a wicked woman, as an immodeſt thing, and of a damnable effect in her wicked father Herod, to dance. And ſuch as interpret the place are not afraid of theſe words, that that it was meretricie laſciviæ turpis nota nubilis puellæ ſaltatio. That is, that for her to dance being a maid for yeeres mariage-able, was a note of whoriſh wantonneſs, For whoſoever (ſaith he) hath a care of honeſt gravity, hee ever condemneth dancing, and eſpecially in a maid. Againe, hee calleth it, ſpectaculum familiæ Regis probroſum, A diſhonourable ſight in a Kings houſe: with many ſpeeches moe of miſlike. Sirach a wiſe man, and of great experience, biddeth a man not to uſe the company of a woman, that is a ſinger and a dancer, neither to heare her, leſt he be taken with her craftineſſe. The godly fathers as I ſaid miſlike it. For ſaltatio ad adulteras, non ad pudicas pertinet, ſaith one of them: Dancing belongeth to adulterous, and not to honeſt women. A ſharpe ſpeech: Yet was this grave father not afraid to ſpeake it. Saltatio barathrum diaboli, ſaith another: Dancing is the devils hell. And we heare ſpeech of Iacobs mariage (ſaith he) in the Scripture, but not a word of any dancing that was at it. Mira Colluſio ſaith another. Saltat diabolus per puellam: It is a ſtrange iugling, when wee thinke the maide doth dance, and it is not ſo, but the devill in her, or by her. The Councels have condemned it as others have at large ſhewed. And very Tullie could ſay, an honeſt may would not dance in an open place for a great patrimony. For the iudgements of God upon this vaine paſtime, it is ſtrange which Pantaleon noteth out of Crantzius, that in Colbecke a Towne in Germany, certaine light perſons hopping and dancing in the Church yard of Saint Magnus, being by the Miniſter admoniſhed to ceaſe, and not ceaſing, did for a long time (not able to ſtay) runne round about, and at laſt fell all downe dead.

But becauſe others have ſo largely writ againſt this vanity, I ſay no more of it at this time, but wiſh us to conſider that it is an inticement often to adultery, and therefore in this Commandement forbidden. And as for any dancing that we reade of in the Scriptures to have beene uſed of the godly, we muſt underſtand, that their dancing was even a ſober modeſt motion with ſome ſong uſually to Gods praiſe, and men by themſelves, women by themſelves. Which nothing will warrant our cuſtome and guiſe in theſe daies.

Queſt. Are there yet any more allurements?

Anſw. There are yet many moe. But I may not in this ſort ſtand upon them. Gluttony and drunkenneſſe, with houſes of open whoredome, your booke nameth, and proofes for them. Idleneſſe alſo is another meanes, the vow of chaſtity, the deniall of ſecond mariages, the going of men in womens apparell, and women in mans apparell, with a number ſuch. This onely muſt I ſay, and ſo conclude this negative part of this Commandement, looke whatſoever it is, that wee can ſee to be any allurement, any occaſion, or meanes to uncleanneſſe, all that is condemned in this Commandement, as much as the very act of adultery, which here onely is expreſſed. Then how the holy Pope of Rome can warrant by the Word of God the erection and continuance of his ſtewes, iudge you, although his gaine be never ſo much thereby. Nay, how could that monſter Sixtus the fourth, warrant an erection of a ſtewes of both kindes, that is, both of women and men, whereby 20000. and ſome yeeres 40. thouſand Duckets came to his coffers? Or the whole Church of Rome ſo like of, and ſo diminiſh the ſinne of fornication? That at this day in Venice it is counted good policy when there be foure or five brethren of one family, one onely to marie, and all the reſt to welter with as little ſhame in open lechery, as Swine doth here in the common myre. Can this ſpirit that guideth them, be the Spirit of God, when it condemneth not the act, whereof God condemneth all occaſions and allurements? No, no, the Lord give us eyes, and then have we markes ſufficient to bewray them by.

Queſt. Thus then may we ſee what we are forbidden in this Law: now I pray you adde ſome thing of the things we are commanded in the ſame.

Anſw. For this matter your booke anſwereth well, that as we are forbidden in it all uncleanneſſe, and all inticements to the ſame: ſo on the other ſide wee are commanded to keepe our bodies and ſoules chaſte, pure, and as the temples of the holy Ghoſt, or if the gift of chaſtitie be not given us, then to uſe the lawfull remedy appointed for us by God, which is mariage. Concerning therefore chaſtity wee are to know, that very greatly the Scripture layeth downe Gods liking of it, and with many words exhorteth us unto it. This is the will of God, (ſaith the Apoſtle) even your ſanctification, and that you ſhould abſtaine from fornication, that every one of you ſhould know how to poſſeſs their veſſels in honour and holineſs, and not in the luſt of concupiſcence, even as the gentiles, which know not God. And in another place, Seeing (ſaith he) that wee have theſe promiſes dearely beloved, let us cleanſe our ſelves from all filthineſs of the fleſh and ſpirit, and grow up unto all holineſs in the feare of God. And againe, the ſame Apoſtle beſeecheth the God of peace to ſanctifie them throughout, that their whole ſpirit, and body, and ſoule may be kept blameleſſe till the day of the Lord Ieſus Chriſt. Many ſuch as theſe are there, all which our un-erring Papiſts take and expound of ſingle life, and will have them ſo many teſtimonies of the ſame to excell mariage. But their bold ſpeaking is not ever ſound prooving, and therefore we ſtay to beleeve them.

1 Theſſ. 5. 23.

Queſt. In other matters indeed wee have good cauſe to refuſe them, but in this (give mee leave to ſpeak as I thinke, being ready to learne if I erre) me think we are not to miſlike ſo much of their ſpeech.

For, ſurely it cannot bee denied, that the ſingle life is farre above the maried. The Scriptures you know have many ſpeeches to this end.

Anſw. Well then, for your better ſatisfaction, it will not bee amiſſe, if wee a little conſider the courſe of this error And firſt I pray you marke, that during all the time of the old Teſtament they dare not, nor doe not ſay, that ſingle life paſſed mariage in excellencie, but contrary, to bee fruitfull and ſtored of children was a bleſſing, and to bee otherwiſe was a reproch unto them. Therefore this perfection and excellency of ſingle life, they ſet it to bee but now in the time of the Goſpell. Where let us alſo beginne, and going with them, ſee whether it bee ſo or no. Wee conſider then and ſee, that as the Lord is holy himſelfe and pure, and therefore hath ever liked and loved all holineſſe in his children, and by name, this cleanneſſe of body and mind, which we ſpeake of; ſo on the other ſide, Satan being impure and filthy, hath ever ſought and laboured to worke the like in us, and by name, to draw us to impurity of fleſh and ſtaine of mind in this behalfe. The Lord hath had ever his meanes to worke the one: Satan hath had his againe to breed the other. The Lord by his Word and Spirit, and what elſe it pleaſed him to uſe: Satan by ſundry alſo very forcible wayes wrought the contrary. Some hee ſo mightily hardened, and ſtrangely overcame, that even contemning the Lord and his threats, and ſmothering what in their owne conſciences at any time they found contrary to it, gave themſelves over as it had beene bruit and ſavage beaſts to all luſt and uncleanneſſe without remorſe. Of theſe ſpake the Apoſtle to the Epheſians, ſaying: That they being paſt feeling gave themſelves to all wantonneſſe to worke uncleanneſſe even with greedineſſe, where the word hee uſeth is very ſignificant. And againe to the Romanes he ſaith, that God gave them up to their hearts luſts unto uncleanneſſe, to defile their own bodies betwixt themſelves, yea, he gave them up to vile affections. For the women changed the naturall uſe into that which is againſt nature. Then ſheweth hee the meanes and way whereby all this was wrought in them. For a man would think that even reaſon and nature ſhould keepe us from ſuch pollution: They regarded not (ſaith the Apoſtle) to know God, and therefore God delivered them up into a reprobate mind, to doe thoſe things which are not convenient: That is, God ſuffered Satan ſo to harden their hearts, and to deprive them of the uſe even of naturall light, as that thoſe things ſeemed but ſports unto them, and matters of ſmall weight, which otherwiſe would have feared them even to thinke upon. The Prophet Oſe ſeemeth to alledge the very ſame manner of proceeding of Satan in thoſe that know God, when hee ſaith of Iſrael, that whoredome and wine and new wine took away their hearts: That is, their judgement and underſtanding, their conſcience and feeling, whereby they ſhould abhorre ſo diſpleaſing a life before the Lord. And what meaneth Solomon when hee ſaith, that The young man followeth the enticing harlot to her houſe as the Oxe to the ſlaughter, but even this, that by the ſubtill malice of Satan hee is deprived of ſenſe to diſcerne whither hee goeth, and what his fall will bee? So then I ſay one meanes whereby Satan in times paſt drew men from chaſtity the vertue of this Commandement, to luſt and impurity the breaches of the ſame, was by dulling their hearts in moſt fearefull manner, that they felt not ſinne to bee ſinne, no not even very great and grievous ſinnes to bee any at all. Another meanes was by inſtilling into their mindes an opinion of indifferency in theſe matters, and that God (ſo hee were ſerved in ſpirit of them) paſſed not for their bodies, but left them in ſome ſort to themſelves, to uſe to their pleaſures. This (to omit a multitude of heathen Hiſtories, as alſo Simon Magus whom Auſten noteth a defender of this doctrine) may appeare by that Decree of the Apoſtles, That the Gentiles ſhould abſtaine from fornication, and alſo moſt evidently by the Epiſtle of Paul to the Corinthians, who thought of this matter as of a meere naturall thing, ſo lawfull for them as either to eate or drinke, ſo they reſerved their ſoules and ſpirits to worſhip God. But the Apoſtle ſheweth it to bee farre otherwiſe, and with many vehement repetitions of the duties of their bodies, impugning ſo vile a conceit of liberty to uſe them unto luſt. Hee hath created your bodies, ſaith the Apoſtle, as wel as your ſoules, and therefore you muſt glorifie him as well in body as in ſoule. He preſerveth alſo the one as well as the other, the blood of Chriſt was ſhed as well for the one as the other to redeeme it from death, they are both indifferently the Temples of the Holy Ghoſt, they are both the members of Chriſt, and at the latter day they muſt both by Chriſt bee raiſed, the body then to bee joyned to the ſoule, which before lived ſeparated, and therefore as well in body as ſoule God muſt be glorified, and both of them from filthy luſt and pollution kept chaſte. Many moe are the reaſons of Paul in that Epiſtle to drive the Corinthians from this deteſtable conceit, that fornication was a matter indifferent, and chaſtity required not ſo much in body as in minde.

A third meanes wee reade of, which argueth not a little the dulneſſe of man and the boldneſſe of Satan, if once hee got any vantage, even the very Word of God abuſed to confirme that which neither God nor his Word could ever abide. In the Apocalyps, mention is made of the Nicolaitans ſinning in this reſpect moſt fearefully: and it is alſo by learned learned men recorded how Nicholas the firſt father of the filthineſſe fell into groſſe and moſt fearefull ſinne. Clemence and Euſebius ſay that hee did it of meere ſimplicity to remove from him the ſuſpition of jealouſie, and to give a teſtimony unto the world, that he was not, contrary to the profeſſion of a Chriſtian, too much addicted to any earthly thing, ſince it is written, That he which hateth not father or mother, wife or childe for Chriſt, cannot bee his Diſciple, and no man can ſerve two maſters, with ſuch other places moſt wickedly wreſted to bring in a moſt horrible concluſion. Carpocrates and his ſect through their abominable life was warranted by that ſpeech of Paul, that anger and tribulation ſhall bee upon every ſoule that ſinneth. See ſay they, how hee ſaith upon every ſoule, not upon every body, ſo that our bodies we may uſe as wee liſt. Others uſed theſe places: Wee are not under the Law, but under grace. Iuſto non eſt lex poſita. There is no law for the juſt, and ſuch other. By all which things it is apparent how mightily Satan hath bent his force to draw men to the pollution of their bodies, and to uncleanneſſe forbidden in this Commandement.

The Scriptures wreſted, another meanes. Chap. 2.

Now marke ſtill, I pray you, the courſe of this matter, and ſee how the Church of God ever withſtood this worke of Satan in meaſure, and ſought to eſtabliſh honeſt life and chaſte behaviour, as I have before ſhewed: ſo in the beginning of the Goſpell eſpecially (as moſt cauſe was given through the abundance of the contrary ſinne) very vehemently and ſharpely was condemned that liberty of luſt, and filthy affection, which then ruled, and on the contrary ſide was urged chaſtity, with reaſons laid downe for the excellency of it, and the Commandements of God for it. And indeed ſo zealouſly, ſo diligently, and ſo effectually was this done by the godly teachers of thoſe times, as that Satans ſubtilties prevailing ſo much before to the contrarie, beganne to loſe their ſtrength daily more and more. For the hardneſſe of mens hearts through which ſinne ſo greatly encreaſed, was turned into ſoftneſſe, and Chriſtian feeling, their ignorance which accounted ſo foule an one an indifferent matter, was daily diminiſhed and turned into knowledge: their judgements before abuſed with ſhew of Scriptures to confirme their evill, were bettered by the Spirit of light to perceive and ſee how fouly theſe Scriptures were wreſted to a wrong end, and how many apparently commanded the contrary. So that their conſciences being quickned, their eyes opened, and their underſtanding augmented by continuall and godly teaching, luſt waxed leſſe or at leaſt more orderly to the ſhew of man. For it brake not out in ſuch confuſed manner, as before, to all and every one that was liked, and might be obtained. Now then yet ſee a devill. When hee ſaw his kingdome in men thus every day fall to ruine through diligent exhortations unto chaſtity, ſo that hee was not able to deale with men as before, and to make them little account of actuall pollution as hee had done, what deviſeth he yet ſtill to continne his venome in mankind? Surely, even this (note it and wonder) he himſelfe falleth to preach and teach chaſtity alſo by his miniſters, and to extoll it to heaven. But how? Not as hee ſhould I warrant you, but as it beſt ſerved for his wicked intent. Hee doth not teach men to keepe body and minde pure from all uncleane actions or conceits, but hee laboureth to perſwade the outward continency of body (what broiles of ſcorching luſt ſoever the minde abideth) is an holy thing before God, of it ſelfe acceptable, and meritorious. Hee doth not teach men that there is an acceptable chaſtity in godly matrimony, if the gift of continencie bee not given, but unto certaine perſons hee flatly forbiddeth it, as not tolerable and generally in all he doth note it as culpable, preferring ſingle life in dignity, holineſſe, and merit before it in all men. Thus taught his ſcholer and inſtrument Marcion the heretike about the yeere of Chriſt 133. publiſhing, and teaching, that the conjunction of man and woman even in matrimony was ſinne, that it proceeded or was invented of a contrary god, that women wholly were the worke of the devill, and men alſo the one halfe of them. Hee would allow none to bee baptized, unleſſe they either were ſingle or would promiſe ever after to bee ſo, &c. To this end againe ſtepped up Tatianus and his crew about the yeere 142. And hee at the firſt as well as Marcion condemned matrimony altogether alſo, but afterward hee drew in his ſpeech from openly touching it any more, and under the high commendation of ſingle life privily pinched at the ſtained eſtate of wedlocke, and ſought to make it hatefull. Whereupon his followers were called Encratites.

After Tatianus came Montanus about the yeere 145. who ſuffered firſt mariages in ſuch as were weake, but condemned the ſecond as intolerable in any. Then followed Manicheus and his ſort, and they gave to the ruder ſort, as they called them, leave to marry, but for ſuch as were of any credit amongſt them, and growne as they ſay to any perfection, they might not in any wiſe marry but live chaſte. Thus began the opinon of ſingle life to excell the other even by theſe ſteps. From whence divers godly Fathers received infection, as Tertullian, Hierom, Origen, Clement, Nazianzene, with others, falling very farre with theſe heretikes into a miſliking of the ordinance of God againſt incontinencie, and into an over great opinion of ſingle life. Then from a thing commendable in all men, it was brought at laſt to bee a thing neceſſary in ſome men, and ſo grew more and more daily. Then did neceſſity to obſerve what infirmity could not obſerve, cauſe much ſecret and very often, even unnaturall and fearefull pollution, whereby it fell out, that by this ſubtill ſlight of his, to extoll chaſtity, and to place it onely in ſingle life, Satan brought as great an harveſt into hell, as before with his other named meanes.

Queſt. Thus then by this ſtory I ſee how this opinion beganne of ſingle life, and how ſubtilly Satan transformed himſelfe into an Angel of light; but yet I ſee nothing why ſingle life is not better than matrimony.

Anſw. That is ſtrange, ſeeing by the ſtory it is apparant, that during the time of the olde Teſtament, there was never ſuch a thought amongſt the children of God, but even the quite contrary: and ſecondly, even under the Goſpell it ſprung from ſuch Teachers as Marcion, Montanus, Tatianus, and other heretikes. But yet if we would more fully be ſetled, let us duly weigh what the Scripture ſaith of godly matrimony, and then ſhall wee ſee whether chaſtity bee onely in ſingle life, or whether wee can finde any greater praiſe of it and acceptance before God than of mariage or no. Firſt, then I pray you, let us conſider what in the Goſpell is Matt.19. ſaid in matrimony: to wit, that thoſe whom God hath joyned together no man ought to put aſunder.
1 Cor.7. Surely, if God joine them, then is the life accepted, and not unchaſte before him. Againe, every man hath his proper gift, ſaith the Apoſtle, ſpeaking of this matter, ſome to marry, and ſome to live unmarried. Whereof we may truely conclude, that if to marry be the gift of God as well as continency is, then is it as well accepted of him, and no way can it be unholy. Againe, in the Verſ.14. ſame place it is ſaid, that the unbeleeving husband is ſanctified by the beleeving wife, and contrariwiſe. But that could not be, if matrimony were either impure ſimply, or in compariſon to ſingle life. In the place above named to the Theſſalonians, it was generally ſaid unto all men, and
1 Theſ.4. not onely to unmarried men, that they ſhould poſſeſſe their veſſels in holineſſe and honour, and not in the concupiſcence of the fleſh. Therefore mariage is holineſſe, and not uncleanneſſe before God
1 Tim.4. any jot more than ſingle life is. In the Epiſtle to Timothy the forbidding of mariage is called a
1 Cor.7. doctrine of the Devill, which could not bee if it were a ſtaine to a Chriſtian man or woman. And art thou bound to a wife? ſaith the Apoſtle, ſeeke not to bee looſed. Which hee would never have ſaid, if in it ſelfe the ſingle life had been more holy and good before God than the maried. We know alſo what the Pſalme ſaith; for a bleſſing ſhall befall to him that feareth God, namely this: His wife ſhall bee like a fruitfull vine upon the wals of his houſe, &c. Whereby very evident it is how the Lord alloweth wedlocke, when hee vouchſafeth ſo to bleſſe it and ſpeake of it. How then dare we ſay that to be maried is to bee unchaſte, or any way to diſpleaſe the Lord? How dare wee ſay the ſingle life in it ſelfe is better, or more holy? What ever find wee in the Word of God more ſetting downe the praiſe of ſingle life, than theſe have done the true commendation of godly matrimony? It is noted of many even under the Goſpell, that they were maried, but not in all the world doe I remember either man or woman noted as liked the better for a ſingle life. Therefore to cut off this diſcourſe which might very greatly be encreaſed, apparent it is, that of thoſe two eſtates there is no preheminence of merit or holineſſe of either above the other, but both of them good and allowed of God in thoſe perſons for whom they are expedient. And it is alſo manifeſt, that albeit the commanded vertue in this Commandement bee chaſtity, yet is not that in ſingle life onely ſituated or in the body alone, but both in body and minde, both in ſingle eſtate and double, and as well in the one as in the other. For both of them are capable of the ſame.

Queſt. Yet am I troubled ſtill with the ſpeeches of Paul, two or three in one Chapter together, which evidently ſeeme to preferre ſingle life before mariage. You know the places I am ſure, and therefore I name them not, but expect your anſwer to them.

1 Cor.7. Anſw. Why, it is very true, and I deny it not, that Paul in that Chapter doth preferre ſingle life before mariage, but how I pray you? As more godly, more holy, or more meritorious before God than it? No I warrant you. And yet this is the queſtion.

Queſt. How then?

Verſe 16. Anſw. Altogether in worldly reſpects, as you may eaſily ſee, if you marke the places. For firſt, for thoſe words in the 26. verſe: that to live ſingle was better for the preſent neceſſity, you ſee that it is a worldly cauſe, and no matter of more holineſſe. For neceſſity there either ſignifieth the perils and perſecutions of the Goſpell, which in thoſe dayes it was ſubject unto, wherein it were better for a man to be ſingle, than tied to a charge that would both tronble him to keepe, and grieve him to part withall, or elſe it ſignifieth the ſcarcity of Chriſtian wives and husbands as then to bee had, the Goſpell being but young, in regard whereof if they had the gift to tary, without ſinne, it were better to bee ſingle than matched to an Infidell. So that I ſay this cauſe is altogether worldly. For the ſecond ſpeech of Paul in the ſame Chapter, that they which are maried ſhall have tribulation in the fleſh, that he would have all men as he was, and that he wiſhed them without care, &c. you ſee againe it is a worldly cauſe. For what ſignifieth tribulation in the fleſh there, but either thoſe griefes, cares, heart-breakes, and ſorrowes which are incident daily to maried folks, ſometimes about one thing, ſometimes about another, as about their children, about the government of their family, about getting or keeping theſe worldly matters, or by reaſon of contrary Religon, &c. in reſpect whereof, ſaith Paul, I ſpare you, that is, I doe wiſh you free and ſingle, that you might miſſe them all, if it might be, and that for the love I beare to you.

For his third ſpeech, that the maried woman taketh care to pleaſe her husband, but the unmaried to pleaſe the Lord: No way may it bee taken to prove that none that bee marſed either doe or can take care to pleaſe God, for the contrary of that hath beene evidently ſhewed in the places before: or yet to inferre that the unmaried doe ever ſeeke to pleaſe him, for experience too much teacheth the contrary: But it onely ſheweth thus much, that ſuch as bee unmaried, if they bee godlily diſpoſed, may more freely and readily, as it were, attend their devotion, than others that bee maried, having nothing to trouble them or to diſtract their cogitations withall. Which alſo as you ſee is but an outward reſpect. And therefore wee may now conclude, that far was it from the meaning of Paul to prefer ſingle life before matrimony, in reſpect of greater piety or merit before God, but onely in reſpect of outward incombrances, whereof indeed it is much freer than the other eſtate is. Which preheminence and dignity, if it would content our Papiſts, wee and they ſhould well agree: but they will needs have virginity and the vow of ſingle life to bee a ſatisfaction for ſinnes, a deſerving of remiſſion, of the grace of God, of ſalvation, and life everlaſting: As you may ſee in the Catholique confeſſion of one of their great Teachers Petrus a Soto, and may alſo note in the ſpeech of the Biſhop to them that made this vowe, who ever anſwered after they had promiſed in this manner: Et ego promitto tibi, ſi hæc obſervaveris, vitam æternam: That is, And I promiſe thee if thou keepe theſe things, life everlaſting: that is, if thou live ſingle,&c. Yet ſee we Paul who they ſay lived ever unmaried, not to dare once to exhibite his ſingle life to the Majeſty of God to merit any thing for him, or to purchaſe him any favour, but onely and wholly to depend upon the merits of Chriſt Jeſus. And wee ſee not Peter, Philip, or any in the New Teſtament, that were maried, to begge any pardon for it at Gods hand, or to inſinuate any way any impiety of theirs in ſo doing. Which yet aſſuredly they would have done, if the opinion of Popery had beene true concerning ſingle life and Matrimony.

Phil.3.

S. Auguſtine in his booke of Virginity, hath many words of the rewards of Matrimony, and concludeth thus, That eternall life is given of the Lord both to maried and unmaried indifferently.

*Lib.*10. *cap.*26.

The Councell of Gangren thought good to make this Canon, That if any living ſingle for the Lord, ſhould in arrogancy and pride contemne thoſe that were maried, they ſhould bee accurſed. Wherefore wee conclude this matter, and ſay as the Church of God ſaid in that time: Virginity we commend, Widowhood we praiſe, and the chaſt bond of goaly wedlocke wee honour and receive. But as for adultery, fornication, and uncleanneſſe whatſoever, either of body or mind, wee abhor it, and condemne it.

*Ann.*333.*can.*10

*Concil. Gangren. Epiph. tom.*1.*l.*2. *hæreſ.*48.

Thus then I hope you ſee how the opinon of chaſtity to conſiſt onely in living ſingle is ſprung up even by the Devill, who knew not otherwiſe how to draw men to uncleanneſſe, being robbed of his former meanes, than by making them to abridge themſelves of the ordinance of God againſt that evill. You have ſeene alſo how falſe this is, and that in godly Matrimony, as well as the ſingle life, there is liked chaſtity of the Lord. You have ſeene, that neither of theſe eſtates have any preheminencie above the other in reſpect of greater pietie or merit, but both of them alike acceptable to God, if for the parties they be expedient, onely in regard of outward incumbrances, the one is more free than the other.

Laſtly, you ſee the vertue of this Commandement oppoſed to adultery, to bee chaſtity: but how? Not to live unmaried, as the Papiſts dreame, but both in mariage and out of it, to keepe body and ſoule unſpotted of filthy luſt and concupiſcence.

The other points of Mariage it ſelfe, of ſecond mariages, of Poligamy, of divorſe, and ſuch like, which were in this place to bee handled, I thinke good to cut off, having taried already too long in this Commandement, and to reſerve them till ſome other occaſion.

Queſt. Yet adde ſomething concerning the puniſhment of them that breake this Commandement.

Anſw. The Law of God, as wee all may ſee, puniſhed Adultery with preſent death: Fornication with mariage of the party if the parents would, and if they would not, with a dowry to be given. The Athenians puniſhed it with death. This Land of ours, in the dayes of Canutus, had a law to cut off the noſes and eares of adulterous women. And for the ſpirituall puniſhment of it, it was ever, is, and ſhall bee, damnation of body and ſoule in the pit of hell without repentance.

The Application.

NOw then conſider what hath beene ſaid, and even as we deſire true fruit of the Word of God unto our ſoules, let us weigh our owne eſtate in every branch of this Commandement. The act of uncleanneſſe how it can accuſe us, that God doth know, who hath hell in his hand to caſt us into it, if wee have ſinned. And therefore if either with married or unmarried we have ever thus offended, let his power bee thought of, let hell bee feared, and ſo foule a fault from the very heart roote be earneſtly lamented. Excuſe it not with youth, or any circumſtance, cauſe or occaſion in the world, theſe ſcoffings of the Lord will not ever bee borne: in youth wee are Gods as well as in age, and in youth wee ſhould ſerve him as well as in age: if we doe not, even youth ſhall to hell as well as ſhall age. Sinne ſeene and ſorrowed for, left and forſaken, hath pardon promiſed: but ſin jeſted at, and plaied withall, hath vengeance threatned. It is the voice of a Chriſtian, to ſay I have ſinned, but it is the voice of a reprobate to ſay ſtill, I will ſinne without remorſe. The beſt may offend, but the beſt can never continue offending. And therefore take heed, and if act can accuſe us, let it never hereafter be able to blame us: for ſudden and fearefull is the vengeance from heaven that lighteth upon adulterers.

From the act, let us come to the inward thought, and as it is more privy, and wee all more prone unto it, ſo let it be more carefully weighed and ſearched out even of us all. Let us call to minde with a feeling heart, how fouly, how fearefully, and how even continually we offend the Lord by our hidden conceits. How quickly creepeth into us an evill thought, and how ſwelleth it within, when it once is there? It worketh within us, as a thing moſt ſtrong, and very fouly ſtaineth us often ere wee doe conſider it. Yea, our negligence in this behalfe doth condeme us before the Lord, and pronounceth againſt us that we feare more men than God. For our outward actions wee are carefull of, ſo neere as wee can to keepe the blots of them out of ſight, but our hearts being things hidden from the eyes of men, wee carry little care over them to keepe them cleane from impure conceits. What man may ſee, we are aſhamed that he ſhould ſee: but which God beholdeth, our ſecret thoughts, we feare not at all to have them foule, filthy, and wicked. O what a God ſerve we, that being able to ſet every thought we thinke viſible in our foreheads in great letters, that every one which runneth by might reade them, yet moſt mercifully ſpareth us, and is content our ſecret ſhame ſhould not appeare to men! Shall we ſtill provoke him, ſhall wee ſtill offend and grieve him? Surely then hot will bee the wrath at laſt, which ſo long his mercy hath with-holden. Wherefore to conclude this matter, even as we love the Lord and our own health, let us ſee and weigh how deepely the Law againſt impure thoughts is able to charge us: let us conſider the cauſe, if we can finde it out, that driveth us uſually into ſuch hidden ſinne, and hereafter as men touched with ſome Chriſtian remorſe, that ſo good a God ſhould ſo ſtill be offended, let us rid our hearts as wee can of the effect, by taking away, or at leſt ſtopping in ſome meaſure the courſe of the cauſe. The meanes and allurements either to the actuall offence, or the thought condemned in this Commandement, as we heard before, are many and divers. Sometimes the eyes diſorderly wander, and being not checked by a Chriſtian conſcience that feareth to give them liberty too long, they become the occaſions both of thoughts and acts, wicked and damnable. Sometimes behaviour unchaſt and unſeemely. Sometimes ſpeech wanton and light, ſtirre the heart up to conceive that thing, and the wicked fleſh to performe it fully, which God and nature abhorre as filthy. The dallying tattles of theſe courting dayes, the laſcivious Songs made by looſe minds, and the wanton greetings in every place now uſed, alas what thoughts procure they, never liked of the Lord, that I may ſay no worſe? Books written by unreformed hearts, and continually read to the griefe of God, are they not occaſions to fraile fleſh, both in thought and deed to offend againſt this Law? God knoweth, and experience teacheth ſuch ſoules as taſt of Chriſt, that very deadly poyſon under a falſe delight, doth this way creepe into us. An unchaſt looke makes an unchaſt heart, and a roving tongue beyond the liſts of godlineſſe ere ever we well know what we do. So ſubtil is the ſinne that this way creepeth into our ſoules. Apparell is next, a moſt fearefull allurement to the breach of this Commandement, both in thought and deed, if God once in mercy would open our eyes. So are theſe Stage playes and moſt horrible ſpectacles, ſo is our dancing, which at this day is uſed, ſo is drunkenneſſe, gluttony, and idleneſſe, with a number ſuch like, as can witneſſe each one in the world that will weigh them. Now what care we have had of theſe things the Lord knoweth, and to our profit if we liſt a little, we may conſider it. Our eyes O Lord, how doe they offend through our careleſſe beſtowing of them to their owne deſire? Where is the teſtimony of truth within us, that we doe reſtraine them ſo ſoone as ever we perceive any tickling motion ariſe by them? Where is the counterpane of that band wee have taken of them that they ſhall not cauſe us to offend? Iob did it, and yet we weaker than he ten thouſand times think it needleſs. Alas our folly, alas our ſecurity. By this meanes our ſoules ſucke in their bane, and yet we care not nor will be warned. The Lord of his mercy give us once the grace to deſire it with David, and very heartily to begge it, that our eyes may be ever turned away from beholding vanity. For the reſt which follow conſider them well, and let never ſatan or ſelfe love ſo ſtil bewitch us, that we cannot be brought to ſee our ſinne. In behaviour or ſpeech have we never offended? But ever in them both ſo uſed our ſelves as that neither we nor they whom we dealt withall may be charged of more lightneſſe, than became the profeſſors of Chriſt and his Word? Have we never tranſgreſſed in matter or forme of apparell? O that we could ſay it! But in truth we cannot. For the contraries abounding in the eyes of all men would give us the lie. Light behaviour and alluring dalliance is every where accounted comely boldnes, and good bringing up: diſcourſing ſpeech to a vaine end we count a quality commendable in us, and the want of it we eſteeme ſimplicity, whereſoever wee ſee it. And therefore by bookes to ſuch ends ſet out, we endeavour to attaine unto it, and having once polluted our ſpeech (for I will never call it poliſhing) wee are never better than when we have company to beſtow our tales and greetings upon. Our apparell in matter to our power we make ſumptuous, and in forme to allure the eye as much as we can. If this be true, in the name of Chriſt let us better think of it than we have done. Theſe are allurements to ſinfull luſt, and this law of God forbiddeth not only both act and thought, but even every allurement to either of them. What ſhould I ſpeake of Stage plaies and dancing? Can we ſay in truth before the Majeſtie of God that we carefully abſtaine from theſe things, becauſe they tickle us up either more or leſs to the breach of this Commandement? Alas we cannot a number of us. But we runne to the one continually to our coſt, when we will not be drawne to better exerciſes that are offered freely, we ſuck in the venome of them with great delight, and practiſe the ſpeeches and conveyances of love which there we ſee and learne. The other we uſe with eſpeciall pleaſure, and God being witneſs to many an one, they wiſh the fruit of their dancing to be this, even the fall of themſelves and others into the breach of this Law. What ſhould I ſay of gluttony and idleneſs? Do they not make us ſin? Good Lord give us eyes to ſee, and hearts to weigh the occaſions of our fall. The Spirit of God hath ſaid, that theſe pricked up the fleſh of the filthy Sodomites to that height of ſin, and yet we can imagine they will cauſe no ſin at all in us againſt this Law. And therefore profeſſing the Goſpell and integrity of life, yet dare we ſo pamper, ſo ſtuffe and cram this rebelling fleſh, as if we were Gods that could ſuffer no temptation: We dare gull in wine and hot drinks continually, being peradventure both ſtrong and yong, and every way needing rather pulling downe than ſetting up. We dare ſolace our ſelves in ſoft beds, too long for our conſtitutions, and all the day after betake our ſelves to nothing whereabout the mind might walke, and ſo eſcape impure conceits. We dare deferre the meanes which God hath appointed for our help to live undefiled, for every trifling cauſe, cauſe,and feeling the fleſh to ariſe in diſobedience againſt this Law even daily, yet neither faſt we,nor breake our ſleepe,nor labour, nor marry, nor any way ſtop the courſe of it. But certainly as unfeeling men paſs on the time,and heape up wrath againſt the day of wrath for our bold offending. And yet we hope to be ſaved,& yet we hope to have a joyfull reſurrection. But (O deare in the Lord) it will not be ſo. For is not this the Law of God, Thou ſhalt not commit adultery? doth it not forbid both act and thought as we have plainly ſeene,and even every allurement to either of them? and muſt not God judge us according to his Law? How then ſhould we live when we have witneſs within us that we offend his Law? Be not deceived,but as we feare the loſs of body and ſoule for evermore,let us be warned. Can nothing accuſe us that hath been ſaid? Did we never in act or in thought receive any ſtaine contrary to this Commandement? Have we ever had care and power to avoid all meanes? What mouth dare ſpeake it,what heart can thinke it, if it be not braſſe,or ſteele,and as void of feeling? Wherefore let us all awake from our former ſleep,let us ſtand up at laſt from the dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, and Chriſt our deare Savior ſhal give us light. Let us acknowledg what this Law requireth,and what we ſhould have done every one of us. Let us confeſs we have ſtraied from it many a time and way,and are no way able to offer up our ſelves righteous,cleare, & innocent to the Lord touching this Law,and for the time to come that we ſhall yet live here. O let us cary ſome greater care to obſerve his will. We now know,not our acts only,but our inward thoughts muſt ever be holy: we now know many meanes that leade to offence herein,& that even the meanes muſt alſo be eſchewed. Now then if we live as in ignorance we did,ſcorning at counſell, cleaving to our pleaſures,and rejecting the Lord and his law,ſhal we eſcape? He that knoweth his Maſters will and doth it not,ſhall he be unpuniſhed? Mark what I ſay,and pray ever to feele it. As the wrath of the King bad heat the furnace ſeven times hotter than ever it was, to conſume the men that withſtood him to his face for truth: ſo ſhall the wrath of God that made this law, cauſe hell to be heat ſeventy times ſeven times hotter for us,if wilfully after warning,and maliciouſly after knowledge we oppoſe our life againſt it. That is,he ſhall multiply the paines of hell upon us for theſe pleaſures of our fleſh, that ſweet ſin may have bitter and ſowre confuſion for evermore. Now the God of heaven give us ſence and feeling,the Lord of mercy touch us with a taſt of ſinne by the viewing of his law. For we cannot alwaies live and thus dally with our owne ſoules,neither ſtandeth it with the nature of our God, who is juſt,finally to forgive us,though he long forbeare us,unleſs we amend. But he muſt have his judgment,and we muſt have our torment,as ſure as we live. Now doth he wiſh us to conſider his waies,and to turne our feet into his teſtimonies, his warnings waſt,and his wrath increaſeth,if we ſettle our ſelves againſt him. Yet,O how I feare we will wilfully do it. For it is ſo ſweet and ſo incident to us which this law forbiddeth, that a thouſand to one we forſake the Lord. The allurements I have named, we will never withſtand,no,we will not heare of it,that they cauſe us to fall. But pleaſing this fleſh for the time we do uſe them,we will never eſpie the paine that will follow them. Yet why ſhould I feare ſince God is of power to pierce any heart, and hath promiſed to do it if we heartily beg it? O Lord I hope thou wilt worke with us,that by this law we may ſee how we have offended thee, and what hereafter we muſt more eſchew,the one with ſorrow and true remorſe, the other with faith and continuall care. Then ſhall thy Chriſt and our comfort (who in our fleſh fulfilled the law for us) cover with his righteouſneſs all our ſins againſt it. Then ſhall ſins paſt, in his blood be forgiven, and we by him ever hereafter ſtrengthened. Then we ſhall order our eyes with a carefull heart,we ſhall ſet a watch before our mouth,and keep the doore of our lips. All falſe inticements to forbid luſts we ſhall gladly refraine, and ſo eſcape the ſin it ſelfe the better. This I ſay good Lord we ſhall doe, if thou worke with us: that is, thou and thy power, and thou and thy mercy, ſhall doe it in us. Which vouchſafe, O Father of heaven,for thy unmeaſurable and unſearchable goodneſs ſake. Amen.

The eighth Commandement.

Queſtion.

How can this Commandement poſſibly ſtand with that opinion of community?

Anſw. Indeed no way: or it manifeſtly overthroweth ſo vile an imagination, and ſheweth the diſtinction, dominions and propriety in things, was and is the ordinance of the Lord. For every prohibition ſheweth an ordinance before eſtabliſhed, which ſhould bee obſerved either in Gods Lawes or mans, though not alwaies expreſſely. As forbidding of murder, ſheweth preſervation of life to be the will of God, and the deniall of adultery inferreth the liking of chaſtity, either in mariage or out. So the forbidding of ſtealth, which is an alienation of another mans goods to our ſelves, ſheweth that every thing is not our own to take at our pleaſure, but propriety in poſſeſſion is the will of the Lord. For if all things be common, there can bee no ſtealth, and this law frivolous and to no purpoſe, which God forbid wee ſhould affirme or thinke.

Queſt. Yet many have beene of this opinion, affirming that tyranny, and not Divinity, maketh this difference amongſt men.

Anſw. It is very true: Yet I hope you ſee how evidently this law of God, which I trow they will account Divinity, doth overthrow them and their folly, as doe alſo all other lawes, that may hereunto be reduced with many Scriptures moe. For as there can be no ſtealth if all things be common; and therefore this law of God, as I ſaid, in vaine given; ſo there can be no buying or ſelling, no borrowing or lending, no letting or leaſing, or any ſuch thing amongſt men, if every man have like intereſt to take at his pleaſure; and therefore the Lord God even in theſe alſo greatly overſeene, for that he would trouble himſelf to make laws touching theſe matters, when as no man hath or ought to have any propriety in any thing more than another. Againe, all the exhortations in the Scripture to almes-deeds and to mercy towards the poore, are frivolous; for they have as good right to take any thing they want from any man, as the other have to give them. But all theſe you ſee are abſurd, and therefore the opinion; and the contrary of it the will and ordinance of the Lord.

Queſt. What is then the very drift of this Commandement?

Anſw. The very end of it is this, to bind our love and care to our neighbours goods, as before it hath been to his life, and things deare unto him as his life. For it cannot be, that our hearts ſhould be right in affections towards our brethren, and we ſpoilers and waſters, or any way harmers of the commodities which they enjoy. Love cheriſheth and keepeth even every thing ſo neere as it can which he accounteth of whom we love, and eſpecially which he liveth by, and maintaineth both himſelfe and others by. And therefore, as I thinke, wee cannot take a better courſe, to lay before our owne eyes the wants of love in us towards the goods of our neighbours, and conſequently our breaches of this Commandement, than diligently to weigh ſome particular duties ſpecified in the Word, wherein the Lord God would have our love to ſhew it ſelfe. As for open rapine and plaine ſtealth, no man, I thinke, will excuſe it, or deny it to bee ſin, and therefore I ſtand not upon it, your booke hath evident places quoted againſt it. I come rather to thoſe other duties of borrowing and lending, of hiring and letting, of buying and ſelling, and ſuch like.

Queſt. Firſt then what is the law of borrowing and lending in the Word?

Anſw. If a man (ſaith the Law) borrow any thing of his neighbour, and it be hurt, or elſe die, the owner of it not being by, he ſhal ſurely make it good, If it be an hired thing, he ſhal not make it good, for it came for his hire. In which law, if we well weigh it, we may firſt ſee, that if we have that thing which our neighbour would borrow, and wee able, without our hurt, well to ſpare it him, wee are bound to doe it, or elſe we ſinne againſt this Law of God, and we even ſteale from our brother, that which in right is his. For God would not ever have made a Law for recompence of the lender, if his thing lent receive any harme, unleſſe it had beene a neceſſary duty of love to lend when we may. Therefore this narrowneſſe of heart, and unkind diſpoſition to grudge unto any that good which by lending we can poſſibly doe him, it is hatefull in the eyes of God, and a plaine breach of this Commandement. Secondly, in this law, as one very well hath noted, we may ſee a great light given to that hard controverſie concerning uſury of money. For marke

Vſury.

I pray you how he saith in plaine termes, That if the thing were hired, and though it perished in use, yet should it not be made good by him which hired it, for it came for his hire. The money which Usurers give out, is hired as you know. Therefore if it were a thing that might be hired, you see the sentence of God, though it perished.

Secondly, marke againe how the Lord saith, though a man lend of meere love freely without any hire, yet shall his recompence be nothing more than good will againe, unlesse it die, or bee hurt which he lendeth. Now money neither dyeth, neither commonly is any whit hurt, but returneth every way as good as it came. Thirdly, consider how the law will have an apparent hurt of the thing lent, or else it alloweth no recompence, but Usurers will have consideration for likely losse: For, say they, if I had had my money, possibly I could have gained thus much with it: Yet are they not sure they could have done it, for God could have crossed their expectation, and being not sure that they could have gained, it is not apparent that they have beene hindered, but this law of God provideth in equity onely for apparent harme, and therefore nothing for them. Fourthly, the equity of this law is onely this, that good will bee no loser, and therefore provision is made for recompence, if the thing lent received hurt: but Usurers will have their good will, as they call it, certaine and an excessive gainer. Fiftly, in this law of God the borrower is respected, that he should have helpe of his neighbour, and not pay for it, unlesse hee hurt the thing which he borrowed, but usury regardeth wholly the lender. Wherefore it seemeth that if this law of our God had ever any equity, this usury of money had ever plaine injury, and that this kinde of lending is void of love, and therefore apparently a breach of this Commandement. Thus therefore we see what light the equity of this law, of lending, giveth to this question of usury, which equity remaineth, and ever shall.

Quest. But I pray you what thinke you of giving usury, which many a good man is constrained to doe?

Answ. Truly, for mine owne part, I am satisfied to thinke it also evill, by the words of Ieremie, who saith, he hath neither given usury nor taken, and yet they hated him. Insinuating plainly, that if he had done either, he could have found just cause in himselfe why he should be evill thought of.

Quest. What is the law of pledges?

Exod.22.26. Answ. If thou takest thy neighbours rayment to pledge, saith the law, thou shalt restore it to him ere the Sun go downe: For that is his covering only, and this is his garment for his skin, wherein shall sleepe? Therefore when he crieth unto me, I will heare him, for I am mercifull.

Deut.24.6. 10. 11. And in another place: No man shall take the upper or nether milstone to pledge, for this gage is his living. And when thou shalt aske again of thy neighbour any thing lent, thou shalt not go unto his house to fetch his pledge, but thou shalt stand without, and the man which borrowed it of thee shall bring the pledge out of the doores unto thee.

12. 13. Furthermore, if he be a poore body, thou shalt not sleepe with his pledge, but shalt restore him the pledge when the Sunne goeth downe, that he may sleepe in his rayment, and blesse thee, and it shall bee righteousnesse to thee before the Lord thy God. The very end of all which lawes, as you see, is nothing but this mercy and kindnesse of man towards man, even in this matter of taking pawnes. And therefore if my dealing herein be sharpe, hard and cruell, laying aside, as it were, all regard of other mens needs, so that my selfe may be safe, it is not apparent that I faile in love towards the wealth and good estate of my brother outward, therefore have broken this Commandement. It must needs be granted.

Exod.22.10. 11. Answ. If a man deliver unto his neighbour (saith the Law) to keepe, asse, or oxe, or sheepe, or any beast, and it die or be hurt, or taken away by enemies, and no man see it, an oath of the Lord shall be betwixt them two, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbours goods, and the owner of it shall take the oath, and he shall not make it good. But if it be stollen from him, he shall make restitution unto the owner therof. If it be torn in peeces, he shall bring record, and shall not make it good which is devoured. By which lawes thus much we may note, that notwithstanding for things committed to their custodie, it might fall out that they might be brought before the Magistrate by oath to protest their truth and honesty, which corrupt flesh will lightly grudge at, or else to their cost to make that good, the keeping whereof never gained them peny: yet nevertheless would the Lord have man even herin to shew his love, & in no case for either of these respects, or any other to deny it.

Wherefore it followeth then, and both now and ever shall follow, that whosoever shall not willingly and readily take into his custody, that thing which he may keepe to the benefit of his neighbour, better than he that doth deliver it him, and so taken truly, keepe and faithfully restore it againe unto them, that of right should have it, that man or woman want in their hearts affection or love to their neighbours, they withhold the thing which is due unto them, namely, the fruit or their love; in this particular we stand upon, and therefore guilty they are before God of stealth, the breach of this Commandement.

Quest. What is the law of finding things lost?

Answ.

Anſw. Thou ſhalt not (ſaith the Law) ſee thy brothers oxe nor his ſheep go aſtray, and withd aw thy ſelfe from them, but ſhalt bring them againe unto thy brother: and if thy brother be not neere unto thee, or if thou know him not, then thou ſhalt bring it unto thy houſe, and it ſhall remaine with thee, untill thy brother ſeeke after it, then ſhalt thou deliver it to him againe. In like manner ſhalt thou do with his aſſe, and ſo ſhalt thou do with his rayment, and with all loſt things of thy brother, which he hath loſt, if thou haſt found them, thou ſhalt not withdraw thy ſelfe from them. See here the love of man to the goods of his brother, in what ſort the Lord requireth it. Now leſt the name of brother, uſed here in this place, ſhould deceive us, to thinke we are bound but to our friends in this dutie, it is profitable to note, how in another place, in ſtead of brother, is put enemie, and all theſe particulars nevertheleſſe named. If thou meet thine enemies oxe, or aſſe, going aſtray, thou ſhalt bring him againe, and ſo forth of the reſt. So that this being a fruit of love, which God requireth in us all towards the goods of all men, be they friends or foes, that we ſhould keepe them, and cheriſh them, and in ſafety reſtore them, if we finde them loſt, when once we know the owners of them: ſurely we muſt needs confeſſe, that to conceale, and retaine things found of us, after we know who ſhould have them, is plaine and flat theft: yea it is a breach of conſcience, no doubt, in this matter, to enjoy any thing found, without true teſtimonie in our ſelves, that we have uſed as many meanes as we could, to learne out the loſer, as by asking, by proclaming, and ſuch like. This well conſidered and weighed, ſhould a little more awake ſuch as be Lords of waifes and ſtrayes, as we ſay, that they carry an eye over their Bayliffes in that behalfe, ſo neere as they can, to ſee that they bring not ſin upon them, by making them unjuſt retainers of other mens goods, a complaint common in moſt places, and a theft not to be warranted in any place. Deut.22.1, Queſt. What is our duty in buying and ſelling?

Anſw. When thou ſelleſt ought to thy neighbour (ſaith the Law) or buyeſt at thy neighbours hand, you ſhall not oppreſs one another (meaning by deceit or any otherwiſe) but according to the number of yeeres after the Iubile thou ſhalt buy of thy neighbor, alſo according to the number of the yeers of the revenewes, he ſhall ſell unto thee. According to the multitude of yeeres thou ſhalt encreaſe the price thereof, and according to the fewneſs of yeeres thou ſhalt abate the price of it for the number of fruits doth he ſell unto thee. Oppreſſe not yee therefore any man his neighbour, but thou ſhalt feare thy God: For I am the Lord thy God. In which Law this I marke, that when I ſell or buy, I muſt ſhew even a love to my brother, and a tender affection in that my dealing with him. For ſo it is meant when it is ſaid, you ſhall not oppreſſe one another. Secondly, that then conſequently my greedie affection may not ſet the price, but the value of the thing, and the benefit which it is likely to yeeld. For how can I love him, and yet take more of him than I give him, that is, more money, than the thing is worth? Which things, if they be wanting, ſurely then our ſelling is deceit and guile, yea it is theft by this Commandement proved. For the very equity of this Law, as every one may plainly ſee, was this, that as good ſhould be given as taken, and taken as given. Even that commutative iuſtice, which Heathen men could ſee to bee ſo neceſſary in all contracts and bargaines, as that without it no trading could ſtand, or ſociety endure. Upon which Law well conſidered and ſoundly ſetled in our minds, a godly man draweth theſe concluſions, and let us thinke of them. Firſt, it condemneth all over-ſelling, I meane knowne and wilfull over-ſelling of any thing, for ſo ſay the words (according to the number of yeeres ſhalt thou ſell) that is, if the Iubile be farre off, thou ſhalt ſell dearer, by reaſon the buyer ſhall reape longer profit for it; but if it bee neere, then cheaper for the contrary reaſon. So that an equality of commodities preſent, is plainly ſhot at in this Law. How then can they warrant their dealingss to have requited loved in them, who in reſpect either of paſſed loſſe, or ſuppoſed poſſible in time to come, doe inhaunce the price of the things they ſell, above the value of the things? This dealing, if you marke the words well, could not be allowed amongſt the Iewes. And as yet I am ignorant of any larger commiſſion granted to us to wrecke our ſelves upon our brethren, and to rob them becauſe God in his pleaſure hath croſſed us with loſſe, or may doe hereafter. Secondly, it condemneth all uttering of naughty and counterfeit coyne or wares. For firſt for the ſeller, if hee raiſe the price to the value of good wares, and then deliver evill or counterfeit, how doth hee obſerve an equality of commoditie? and then for the buyer, if he beate it downe to as low a price as he may, till he conſent to give ſo much for it, and then deliver counterfeit and evill coine, where is againe the equity of this law on his part, who is bound by it to give as much and as good as he taketh, ſo neere as iudgement can any way ſerve him? Thirdly, it condemneth all lying in waite to prey upon one that muſt needs ſell for preſent money; to get his commodity for halfe the value if I can, when as rather I ſhould for pity give him equality. For what love is this to the goods of my neighbour, when I can be content even to rob him in his neceſſity, by taking that for a penny, that is worth in mine owne conſcience three, and not to be bought under, were his need not ſo great? Now ſee and note then how commonly, yet fearefully for want of love and conſcience to give as good as we take; our buying and ſelling one with another is ſpotted and ſtained with great and grievous theft. For moſt aſſuredly, even as in the time of the Law, if they obſerved not a proportion betwixt the Iubile yeere and their price, they offended againſt Levit.25.14, 15, 16, 17.

againſt the Commandement of theft: ſo now the Law being gone, if the equity of it be not obſerved, to wit, the equality of commoditie given and taken, the ſame ſin is committed, in the day of the Lord we ſhall find the burthen of it.

Queſt. Thus then how our love ſhould ſhew it ſelf in theſe commodities we may eaſily ſee, now I pray you go forward with other branches of this Law.

Anſw. Oppreſſion generally all, is contrary to that love, which the Lord by this law ſeeketh to draw out of us, and therefore, no doubt, forbidden in the ſame: And if in particulars wee liſt to lay it out.

Deut.22.14. Firſt, ſaith the Word, Thou ſhalt not oppreſs an hired ſervant, That is needy and poore, &c. But thou ſhalt give him his hire for the day, neither ſhall the Sun goe downe upon it, for he is poore, and therewith ſuſtaineth his life, leſt he cry againſt thee unto the Lord, and it be ſin unto thee.

Exod.22.21. Levit.19.33. Secondly, it forbiddeth to doe injury to any ſtrangers, or to oppreſſe them, and addeth this reaſon to the Iewes, becauſe they were once ſtrangers.

Exod.22.12. Thirdly, you ſhall not trouble or oppreſs any widow, ſaith the law, nor any fatherleſs child: for if you do, he ſhall crie unto me, ſaith the Lord, and then mine anger ſhall burne, and I will kill you with the ſword, and your wives ſhall be widdowes, and your children fatherleſſe.

Where by the way marke the vehemency of this ſpeech, and ſee what comfort to the godly, and terror to the wicked it may juſtly exhibite. For the former, God knowes and the world ſees, how often they are wrecked and wronged and ſet to the wall by cruell, ungodly, and hard hearted men, how often they faile of friends to maintaine their right, and defend their cauſe againſt the evill. But yet ſee here a comfort, though all forſake us, if wee cry to the Lord, the cauſe ſhall be his, and he will helpe us, the Lord will awake and ſtir up his wrath, till the wrong we have ſuffered be revenged fully. And for the ſecond, what knowes the oppreſſing and mercileſs man, whether any cries paſſe from the grieved hearts of ſuch as he hurteth, or no? If they doe, as it cannot be but they ſhould, why trembleth not he to conſider what hangeth over his head, even ready to light upon him every houre, if God be God, and true of his word? O that our hearts then may cleave to the Lord if we be oppreſſed, and tremble at his judgements if we uſe it to others.

But to returne to the matter againe, if all oppreſſion be ſtealth before God, what I pray you ſhal we think for the fountaine of much oppreſſion, to wit, acceptance of perſons in judgment? Surely it muſt needs alſo be evill before the Lord. Reaſon doth teach it, and yet God for more aſſurance expreſſely forbiddeth it as a miſchiefe in a Common-wealth: The Lord your God (ſaith Moſes) is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, mighty and terrible, which accepteth no perſons, nor taketh reward. Which doth right to the fatherleſs and widdow, and loveth the ſtranger, and giveth him food and rayment.

What alſo ſhall we thinke of one cauſe of acceptation of perſons, to wit, of bribes and rewards, but even alſo as the very poyſon of iuſtice abhorre them and condemne them, and the rather, for that ſo expreſly they are forbidden in the Word? Wreſt not the Law (ſaith the Lord) nor reſpect any perſon, neither take reward. For the reward blindeth the eyes of the wiſe, and perverteth the words of the juſt. That which is juſt and right, ſhalt thou follow, that thou maiſt live, and poſſeſs the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. Thus then as branches of this Commandement, we ſee not onely oppreſſion generally, and particularly, but even alſo the cauſes of it, acceptance of perſons, bribes and rewards forbidden.

Liveries are often meanes and covers of oppreſſion.

And I will yet adde one thing over unto all theſe, which muſt needs be included in this head of oppreſſion, becauſe it is a common and a dangerous cloake of the ſame, to wit, Liveries of Princes or Subiects, Noble-men, Gentlemen, or whoſoever. Which if they maintaine and beare out the uniuſt and wrongfull dealings of any man with the knowledge of the Lord, not onely the deed doer, but the giver of that cloath and coate, whatſoever he be, ſtandeth guilty of that oppreſſion before Almighty God. The conſideration whereof being ſo true and ſure, ſhould iuſtly cauſe in all the eſtates, that deale their cloath to others, a more vigilant eye and eare to ſee and heare the converſation of their followers, and a reſtraining hand of ſuch countenance, credit, or cover to them (all worldly reaſons ſet apart) whenſoever they ſhall underſtand the ſame to be abuſed. For why ſhould any earthly reſpect ever ſtand ſo great in mens eyes, as that for it they dare take upon them the guilt of other mens ſins, and ſpoyling oppreſſion? But alas, great is the unfeelingneſſe of many mens hearts in this matter in theſe daies. Either Pope, profit or policy do make us deale our cloath too liberally, and regard our mens behaviour too negligently. But a word is enough.

Queſt. Yet ſtill proceed on.

Anſw. Another branch of this Commandement of ſtealth, is idleneſſe. For ſince the fall of our firſt Parents, whatſoever we enioy iuſtly and truly as our owne, wee muſt get it by labour. And whenſoever I labour not for, and yet enioy, I ſteale it, and the uſe of it belongeth not unto me. For then was it ſaid to Adam and his poſterity for ever, that in the ſweate of their browes they ſhould eate their meate. The meaning whereof bindeth not all eſtates to a like bodily labour, labour, but it enjoyneth every one ſome lawfull calling; the Magiſtrate muſt governe, cheriſh and defend; the Judges determine the cauſes of the people; the Miniſters deliver their gifts to the Church; and every one in ſome ſort of ſweat, that is, in ſome godly endevour of body or minde, derive unto himſelfe the uſe of theſe outward things. Otherwiſe if idly he live by the labour of others, having no teſtimonies that hee deſerveth his hire; bee that man or woman whatſoever aſſured, that they make a breach of this Commandement. For, if any worke not, let him not eate, ſaith the Apoſtle: as if we ſhould ſay, if he doe, he doth more than he hath right to. The labourer is worthy of his wages, but not the loyterer. The Ox that treadeth out the corn muſt not be muſled, but the idle Aſſe, if he be pined, is but well ſerved. Idleneſſe what miſchiefe it hatcheth in towne and country, what tongue is able to lay downe? It cauſeth contention and ſtrife by pratling ſpeeches, it nurſeth and nouriſheth whoredome and filth, it pulleth on poverty, and loſeth honor, it hindereth vertue, and maintaineth vice, and by name, to the breach of this Commandement it mightily moveth. For, let him that ſtole, ſteale no more (ſaith the Apoſtle) but let him rather labour and work with his own hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give him that needeth. Noting, as it were very plainly, that the cauſe why the ſtealer ſtole, was want of labouring in his calling. Many goodly lawes and cuſtomes have heathen men made, and had againſt idleneſſe. Some have puniſhed it with very death, as did Draco the Law-giver of the Athenians, others have admitted none to dwell in their Townes with them, unleſſe he had ſome art, and carefully followed it alſo. All Countries and all people, to conclude, that have lived under any good government, have abhorred it. Solomon ſendeth the idle belly to learne his duty of the very vileſt creature the Piſmire, who laboureth in Summer to live in Winter, and whoſe many little cariages, as you ſee, make a great heap at laſt. And in another place he ſaith, that he which will not plow becauſe it is cold, ſhall beg his bread, when it is warm, and no man ſhall give him, which is worſe, even puniſhing juſtly his great ſloth. There was a little tittle tattle, when time was, they ſay, betwixt the Graſhopper and the Piſmire, and we may laugh at it, and yet looke better about us, as admoniſhed by it. The Graſhopper having paſſed the Summer over merrily, as her cuſtome is, ſinging and tuning the notes of a thoughtleſſe minde under every leafe; at laſt when winter came on, began to ſhake, and to goe to bed with an empty belly many a night, to the great weakning of her lively limbes, and the quite marring of all her muſicke: To ſteale, ſhe refuſeth of her honeſt nature, and to begge ſhe is aſhamed, for feare to be mocked: Yet need maketh the old wife trotte, they ſay, and modeſty in this hungry creature muſt yeeld to neceſſity. To it therefore ſhe goeth, and having a wealthy neighbour not far off, that had laboured ſore all Summer, and laid up much good victuall; to her ſhe commeth, and craveth ſome ſuccour at her hand: Who by and by demanded of her what ſhe did all Summer? Alas (ſaith the Graſhopper) I ſung and little remembred this change. Did you ſo (ſaith the Ant) indeed did you ſing all Summer? Now truſt me, for me you ſhall dance all Winter, for I live by my labour, and I will never maintaine idleneſſe in any. Thus received ſloth a check, when it looked for help, and wee warned by it, may learne this morall, to labour leſt we lack. Optimum opſonium ſenectuti labor, (ſaith one) They are good refreſhings in our age, the well beſtowed travels in our youth. Yeares paſſe, and ſtrength failes, get nothing in youth, and have nothing in age. But O careleſſe hearts of ours, and heady will, who can perſwade this, or beate it into the heads of yong men and maides, of ſervants, and ſuch as are comming on? No, no, we will hop and dance, tiple and drinke, banquet and revell, what counſell ſoever is given us to the contrary, with that little wee have, and ſing care away: And a little gay apparell on the backe, is worth much money in the cheſt. But wiſe is he whom other mens harmes can cauſe to take heed. Sickneſſe may come, and every maſter will not keep a ſick ſervant: a maime may fall to us, and we then may heare it, I have no wages unleſſe you could work; many things may happen, and a mans own is his owne, and great is Gods bleſſing to faithfull labour, as truly his plagues are not little or rare to idleneſſe and ſloth.

Prov. 6. Chap. 20.

Queſt. Well ſir, then ſince labour we muſt and ſo live, I pray you is not every labour commendable?

Anſw. No indeed: For the Apoſtle in the place I named before, maketh a diſtinction, which I pray you marke, and ſaith, Let him labour with his owne hands the thing that is good: as if hee ſhould have ſaid, there are labours which are naught, and yet labours too. Wherefore, it is not enough to make us guiltleſſe of this Commandement to ſay, We get that we have by labour, but it muſt be good labour (ſaith Paul) juſt labour, and lawfull labour. The which diſtinction overthroweth all maintenance gotten by maſſing, by jugling, by charming, by playing interludes, by fidling and piping up and downe the Countrey, by carying about Beares and Apes, by telling of Fortunes, and ſuch like trades, mentioned in the ſtatute of this Land, touching vagabonds. For though they be labours, and make them ſweate often, ſome of them, yet want they warrant in the Word to prove them good, and lawfull labours. And therefore ſubject to the penalty of this law before God.

Epheſ. 4. 28.

Queſt. And I pray you let me adde one thing more, becauſe you ſay all labours muſt be lawfull: what if a man in the purſuite of a Pirate, or any enemy in the field, get a ſpoile, whether it is lawfull to retaine it, and conceale it, or it is ſtealth ſo to doe? The labour is juſt, honeſt and lawfull.

Anſw. Truly I muſt needs anſwer you, that albeit the labour in reſiſting, and repelling any enemy, be commendable and good, and therefore goods ſo gotten lawfully poſſeſſed of the Prince, the Lieutenant, the Generall, or Chiefe whoſoever: yet is there no warrant that every ſouldier ſhould be his owne carver, and take what he can get. But the cuſtome of law of all well ordered warres is this, or ſhould bee, that what ſpoile ſo ever is got, and not given before hand by the Captaine to the ſouldiers, ought by them to be brought unto him, and by him to be diſpoſed to every man Geometrically, that is, according to every mans ſervice and worthineſſe, not Arithmetically, that is, to every man alike. And if any man of his own greedineſſe alienate to himſelfe any thing, or otherwiſe than thus, that is, either with generall gift of the Captaine, to take what he can, or a particular gift, to take this and thus much; ſurely that poſſeſſion is not warranted by Gods Law, but lighteth under this Commandement. For as for a mans labour, firſt he oweth it both to God and to his Country, and then he hath his ſet pay for it, which he agreeth to as ſufficient, and therefore he ſhould not ſerve his greedy affection diſorderly. As for the caſe of Pirates, if upon any coaſt they be taken and impriſoned, ſurely it is very barbarous cruelty to leave them utterly uncomforted, with any portion of that which was taken about them, and with them, even ſo that for food they ſtarve ere ever their cauſe be heard. This ſpoile to ſpeed our ſelves. and ſpill our brethren, in this lamentable and unmercifull manner, what defence ſoever it may have by law of man, ſurely it ſavoureth not of that compaſſion and tender bowels of pitie, which is required by the Law of God. And therefore I include it, where, no doubt, the day of Judgement will finde it, even within the forbidden branches of this Commandement.

Gen. 14.

1 Sam. 30. 20, &c.

Queſt. I take your anſwer, and therefore now follow your owne courſe againe.

Anſw. It is now time to draw to an end, and there yet remaineth to be ſomewhat touched the theft of the heart through greedy covetouſneſſe, and the theft of the tongue by falſe and filthy flattery, wherefore a little of theſe alſo as of the other. That this Commandement then doth reach unto the thoughts and inward conceits of the heart, it is firſt proved by that reaſon, that often before hath beene alledged, namely, becauſe the Law-giver is ſpirituall, and therefore his Lawes not reſting onely in outward actions, as mens lawes doe.

Secondly, by that ſpeech concerning Adultery, which is true in all the Commandements, He that looketh, and luſteth, or coveteth, hath ſinned. And by the teſtimony of our Saviour Chriſt, who reckoneth covetouſneſſe amongſt thoſe things that proceeding out, and not going in, defile a man. To all which Chryſoſtome ſubſcribeth, and ſaith, Avarus fur, & latro eſt, A covetous man is a theefe.

In Theſſ. Hom. 11.

Now, what covetouſneſſe is, albeit every man for the acquaintance hee hath with it, may know, yet doe I thus define it, to be a damnable vice of the minde, pricking and provoking us to follow after filthy lucre. Which thing without the name, and even under the name, is marvellouſly enveighed againſt in the Scripture. The Prophet Habacuck cryeth out againſt the heart that enlargeth his deſire as the hell, and is as death, and cannot be ſatisfied, but gathereth unto him all Nations, and heapeth unto him all people. He, he that coveteth an evill covetouſneſſe to his houſe, that he may ſet his neſt on high to eſcape from the power of evill. Thou haſt conſulted ſhame to thine owne houſe by deſtroying many people, and haſt ſinned againſt thine own ſoule: The ſtone ſhall crie out of the wall, and the beame of the timber ſhall anſwer it, woe to him that buildeth a towne by blood, and erecteth a citie by iniquitie, &c. It is cryed out againſt in the Goſpell, called the roote of all evill, Idolatry, and a thing not to be named among Chriſtians. There is no ſpeciall calling amongſt men, whereunto by name this vice is not forbidden, as a venome of all vertue, in every degree, in Princes, in Judges, in Miniſters, in all it is forbidden, and ſurely this is no ſmall argument to a Chriſtian man againſt it: Fearfully puniſhed was it in Gehezi the Prophets man, in Achan, and a number moe.

And to conclude our Scriptures, Iob the ſervant of the Lord moſt notably ſheweth, how hee ſhunned it, and David with all the heate of his heart prayeth againſt it: O Lord let my heart bee never inclined to covetouſneſſe. I might recite the Lawes of God againſt raking their lands too cleane in the time of harveſt, and againſt gathering ſo cleane their Grapes in the time of vintage, as that nothing was left for the poore. All which directly ſhoot at the ſhame of this ſinne in a profeſſor of godlineſſe. And I might alſo heape up hereunto a thouſand teſtimonies of men, Heathen and Chriſtian, uttered in deteſtation of this foule ſinne. But whom the Word fears not, men ſhall hardly move. Onely a ſpeech or two I cannot paſſe over, which prettily deſcribe the corruption of our nature: Omnia tanquam mortales timemus, omnia tanquam immortales concupiſcimus, (ſaith Seneca) That is, We ſtand in feare of divers things, as though we thought we could die, but we covet ſo, as though we thought we ſhould never die. Fortune (ſaith another) hath given too much to many, but enough to none. Againe, Non ſolum avarus eſt, qui rapit aliena, ſed qui cupidè ſervat ſua: He is not onely covetous which greedily catcheth at more, but he alſo which pinchingly chingly ſpareth that which he hath. Whereof very excellently ſpeaketh both Solomon and Syrach, painting out the filth of this folly to have the bleſſings of God, and yet to want nothing more, through a miſerable minde, than the bleſſings of God. Eccleſ.6.1. Syrach.14.3.

But I will follow no further this common place: this little which I have ſpoken, I have done it to give us a taſte of this ſubtill ſin, which with griefe we may marke, thoſe men and women very grievouſly aſſaulted withall, and fearefully overcome after their profeſſion made of Gods truth, and his glorious Goſpell, who in the dayes of their vanity before their calling, never felt any ſuch temptation. So ſeeketh Satan to ſlander the Word, and to hinder the credit of the Goſpell. When he cannot longer detaine us in ſwearing, in exceſſe of dyet or apparell, in adultery and uncleanneſſe, in ſpoyling and ſpending waſtfully Gods given graces, and in other fruits of ignorance, and of an unreformed ſoule; then creepeth he in, and draweth us ſubtilly, ere ever wee eſpie him, to the other extremity, even greater care to get, and nearer ſeeking how to ſave, than can or may ſtand with the credit of the truth which wee profeſſe, or calling often which we have in the Common-wealth. This is too true, wee ſee examples daily, and mens owne hearts being well examined ſhall confeſſe it. The Lord then give us judgement to ſee, and hearts to abhorre ſo foule an evill. For what a derogation from Gods promiſes, and damnable miſtruſt is this, when we doe feare God, and ſerve him, attend to his Word, uſe his Sacraments, forbid ſin in others, and forbeare it our ſelves, than ſo to looke at wife and children, and other expences, as that we feare to want, who living before in a farre looſer ſort, never doubted yet any ſuch defect? Will God be worſe to men when they follow him, than hee was when they forſooke him? Surely an eye muſt be had unto this thing, and very deare unto us muſt be the credit of the Goſpell, that others by us may be wonne unto it, or at leaſt none deterred from it. God ſtrengthen us, for Satan is ſubtill, and we are ſoone deceived. And truly better we had never given our names to Chriſt, than by any faithleſſe greedineſſe, or unſeemly hardneſſe to overthrow all againe, and hinder by offence others that are yet without. The earth is the Lords, and the Lord is ours, if we ſerve him, with all that either heaven or earth hath to doe us good withall.

Queſt. And what of the ſtealth of the eye?

Anſw. The eye is ſaid to ſteale, becauſe it maketh the heart to covet. For by our eyes creepe in deſires into our hearts, both in this behalfe which now we meane, and in other alſo, as before hath been ſaid. By the eye firſt did Achab ſteale Naboths Vineyard, and then by his eye the deſire of it crept into his heart. And the Prophet ſaith, They covet fields, meaning no doubt, which they ſaw to lie commodious for them. Wherefore Gods children muſt ſtop the very firſt beginning, and looke to their eyes and eares, that they make no flame, which God or charity doth miſlike: and let us learne to thinke as an Heathen ſaid, Turpe eſt, non ſolum pedes ſed & oculos in alienas poſſeſſiones immittere: It is a foule thing, not only to let our feet, but even our eyes walke into other mens poſſeſſions, any further than becommeth us as we are Chriſtians. 1 Kings 21. Mach.2.2.

Queſt. What ſtealth committeth the tongue?

Anſw. By fraud and ſubtilty, by ſmoothing and flattery, and ſuch like: For thus ſtole falſe Ziba his Maſter Mephiboſheths goods from him. Thus ſtole many crafty pleaders in publike places, and make no conſcience of it. Thus is it ſaid in expreſſe words, that Abſolon ſtole the hearts of all Iſrael, to wit, by his ſhameleſſe flattery. Thus ſteale men the hearts of ſubjects, even in theſe dayes from their Princes and lawfull Governours; the hearts of the people from their Miniſters, of ſervants from their Maſters, of children from their Parents, Et hoc magnum furtum eſt, ſaith one, And this is a great theft. A kinde of this tongue-ſtealth it is for a Gentleman or a greater eſtate, to caſt out a word to his inferiour in way of begging what hee conveniently may not ſpare, and yet dare not deny, but bringeth and delivereth in faire words, what God knowes, his heart grudgeth, and peradventure his wife weepeth to ſee him part withall. And unto this head is referred all ungodly counſell whatſoever, and all lewd vanity, or babiſh ſervility to make men delight more in us, and leſſe in the feare of God. Is it not lamentable to ſee, that a Popiſh, or an Atheiſticall ſpirit ſhall doe more hurt at a table, or ſuch like place, with one peeviſh jeſt, and girding ſcoffe in the heart of the hearers, than twenty good men can recover with much good counſell? and yet what ſay wee? O he is a merry greeke, a pleaſant companion, and in faith a good fellow. Hee cannot flatter, his words muſt bee borne, and ſo forth. But marke, mark what effect this mirth hath in us, and whereto it tendeth. And if it increaſe our knowledge, increaſe our zeale, and increaſe good graces in us, then like it, and ſpare not, and cheriſh ſuch an one. But if it poyſon the profit of the Word unto us, decay our diligence and liking of good exerciſes, and decreaſe all that I have named, then know him for a theefe, though his hands be true, for he ſtealeth our ſoules from the living God, and both body and ſoule from eternall life. It is pretily ſaid of a flatterer, that as the wood maintaines the fire, to the conſuming of it ſelfe, ſo riches doth him, till he eat up our wealths, and I apply it to this caſe with no leſſe truth, that countenance beares out many an evill counſeller, till he and his counſell have brought his maintainers to carry but a ſmall port. Such greekes make griefe in a Chri- 2 Sam.16.

ſtian heart to heare them, and if ſin be ſweet to us, the Lord in mercy rowze us from ſo dead a ſleep. But I goe no further in this matter; I wiſh what I would, and I would what might kindle in every man and woman more faith and obedience towards God and man: for we need no cooling cards, our hearts are dull and evill enough by nature of themſelves.

Queſt. Yet muſt I once againe make bold, and crave your opinion concerning goods got by play. For in truth me thinke the poſſeſſion of them hath no ſound warrant. And if you will joyn a little concerning corrupt Patrons, I thinke it will not be unfit.

Anſw. Surely you doe moſt juſtly doubt of the former, and I dare avouch it, you may as fitly doubt of the latter. For neither play nor patronage will ever beare out, when our conſciences ſhall awake, what at this day is done by the title of them. Of the latter I purpoſe ſome other ſpeech, and therefore will not here intreate of it, but only ſay thus much, that in truth, as you have well noted, this Commandement of ſtealth is his ſtall wherein he muſt be placed, that ſtealeth to himſelfe the reward of the Miniſter. Lamentable are our dayes, wherein ſuch wickedneſſe is wiſdome; and thrice dead are thoſe hearts, that daily dare enjoy, what neither before God nor man, they may openly ſtand to. But of the latter a few more words at your requeſt. A matter, as you know, greatly liked, and therfore hardly blamed without great miſliking. For what we have to doe, we love not to be letted to doe, and untoothſome is that truth ever, that treadeth down my liking. But be it as it will be. To this was I borne, I doe willingly acknowledge, and to this am I called, as I am a Miniſter, even plainly to ſpeak what I ſee a truth, when the place requireth it, or elſe to cary the brand of an evill conſcience to my grave. And whether miſlikers of any truth here, ſhall finde a day of miſliking elſewhere before the God of truth, let them now betimes, in love admoniſhed, well conſider and weigh.

Concerning then playing and gaming in generall, divers you ſhall finde both in writing and ſpeaking very ſtrait, who hardly will be perſwaded to allow unto Chriſtians almoſt any play at all. For, ſay they, wee muſt give account in the day of Judgement of every action, of every word, and of every jot of time, how wee have beſtowed it, and therefore wee ſhould not play.

1 Cor. 10. Secondly, the Apoſtle ſaith, Whatſoever you doe, doe all to the glory of God; but our idle ſports rather diſhonour God, and therefore we ſhould not play.

1 Pet. 4. 3. Thirdly, Peter ſaith, It is ſufficient that we have ſpent the time paſt of the life after the luſts of the Gentiles, walking in wantonneſſe, drunkenneſſe, in gluttony, and ſuch like; therefore now we ſhould not play.

Fourthly, by the multitude of Chriſtian exerciſes and duties that we are bound unto, cry unto us to ſpend no time in play.

Ambroſ. 1. offic. 23. Chryſoſt. hom. 6. in Matth. And laſt of all, by the ſentences of grave and godly Fathers, who have and doe condemne all idle ſports, and ſay the devill, not God, was the author of them, they prove, and wiſh to profit, that we ſhould not play. The meaning of theſe our brethren, no doubt, is good, and willingly would draw us to our God. And theſe reaſons of theirs ought to have this effect in us, even to abridge that exceſſe which all may ſee in our playing and our ſports, and to bring us home to a greater ſtrictneſſe of life, in heeding what we ſhould. But to cut us off from all recreation by any play (be it without offence of any ſpoken) indeed they cannot. For wee are men, and no Angels, and as men in this world we muſt walke our courſe, ſubject to dulneſſe and wearineſſe, even in good things; and we muſt refreſh that feeble weakneſſe of ours, by lawfull and allowed comforts: Which I ſo terme, becauſe I am aſſured that the word of God condemneth not all our play, and the corrupt conſtitution of our bodies, together with the dulneſſe of our minds require ſome play. Sparing in truth is the word in giving, becauſe well knew the Lord we would not be ſparing in taking liberty for to play: Yet is it plaine enough. Notwithſtanding fitly may it be ſaid of play, as he ſaid of ſtudying Philoſophy: Philoſophandum paucis, We muſt play but little.

Zach. 8. 5. Exod. 13. 2 Sam. 8. Levit. 23. The appointing of feſtivall dayes.

But now the ſecond ſtep is more hard than this, namely, to know what games wee may uſe, and at what we may play. Wherein not purpoſing any ſet and curious Treatiſe, I anſwer briefely, that of thoſe many and differing kindes of ſports, that are deviſed and uſed in every place; I condemne none which make for the quickning of body or minde, which ſerve to activity, and prepare men for better ſervice another day, unleſſe they have joyned to them any ungodlineſſe, or are by law of that particular place forbidden: no, not Cards, or Tables in all reſpects, and to every perſon at all times, and in all places: Nevertheleſſe, I am fully aſſured, and doe willingly affirme, that they ought not, of Chriſtians profeſſing the Goſpell, to bee ſo much uſed as they are: I have joyning with me that godly Father, Maſter Peter Martyr: whoſe judgement it is in plaine termes, That, Non ſtatim damnandus eſt ſi quis dum egrotat, aut debilitatur, eo genere ludi ſe recreat, quod à fortuna vel caſu pendeat, modo ibi pecuniæ non periclitentur. It is not by and by to be miſliked, if one that is ſick or weakned in body, whereby hee cannot uſe other exerciſe, do recreate himſelfe with thoſe kindes of play, which depend of Chance and Fortune, as Tables and Cards (for againſt Dice he hath flatly ſpoken before.) Let us therefore rather enter to conſider another point, which is harder than this, namely, whether wee ſhould play for money, or no? And firſt, I reaſon thus: If it be lawfull to play for money, then is it lawfull to win money in this ſort, and the money lawfully poſſeſſed: But this ſecond is falſe, therefore the former alſo: that the ſecond is falſe, the end and firſt invention of play proveth, which as every one can well witneſſe, was never invented to this end, but only to refreſh either body or minde, and corruption afterward brought in money, as wee ſee daily before our eyes. For ſo long as a game is ſtrange or new to us, we can take great delight to play for nothing: but when once wee are perfectly acquainted, and ſee the courſe of it, then forſooth, unleſſe we may pervert the end of it, and make it a way to gaine or loſe by it, we cannot like any more to uſe it. Therefore I ſay ſince it is apparent, that the firſt beginning of play, and the true uſe of it, was never any ſuch matter, we ought not thereby to gaine any goods.

Secondly, I ſay, that as play in the beginning was not made for it, neither is it yet allowed a meanes to alienate our goods to another, either by Gods Law, or mans Law. For marke the heads of any lawfull Conveiance, and it is either buying, ſelling, letting, hiring, or ſuch like, amongſt them all you finde not gaming. Wherefore the looſer is unjuſtly diſpoſſeſſed, and the winner is wrongfully poſſeſſed. Daneus handling both this matter and this reaſon, added this, which I pray you marke, that albeit ſome private Law or Cuſtome of ſome private place ſhould allow it, yet is the Law of Nature againſt it, and the former ought to give place to the latter. But ſaith he, I have not reade ever any private law of any private place publiſhed in writing, that money won and loſt by play could either be retained, or recovered, if it were denyed, by vertue of any ſuch title or right. And hee bringeth Ottoman a famous Lawyer to confirme as much. Auguſtine would have all things gotten by play taken from the winner, and never reſtored to the loſer, but given to the poore, that both the winner might want what ſo greedily hee gaped for, and the loſer not to recover what ſo fooliſhly he parted with. Daneus beſide would have them both puniſhed with a further mulct of money.

Lib. 2. de uſuris cap. 2. epiſt. 54. ad Maced.

Thirdly, I reaſon from the multitude of miſerable creatures that are the ſame fleſh that wee are, and yet pittifully cry for want of ſuccour: from the multitude of godly and Chriſtian uſes to employ that which wee may ſpare upon, and even from the want of many neceſſities for our ſelves, that is not lawfull nor tolerable to play for money. For is it not lamentable, and moſt fearfull, that any Chriſtian man ſhould carry about in his conſcience day and night a witneſſe, that this ſeven yeares he hath not given ſeven ſhillings to the naked, needy, and comfortleſſe members of Jeſus Chriſt, and yet hee hath loſt at vaine play, in a vaine manner, twenty times as much? Can a man be ſo dull, as to thinke this thing will never prick him, or never have a juſt reward of puniſhment at Gods hands? Is it not lamentable, that a man can ſee no Chriſtian uſe to give of his abundance to, but thinke all that ever he can get, little enough to conſume in play? Are we exempted out of the number of them that are bound to workes of love, and deeds of mercy, ſo that we need to doe none of theſe, and yet ſhall be ſaved too? Nay, is it not wonderfull, and a thing that heaven and earth are aſhamed of, and even all the creatures in both of them ſtand aſtoniſhed at, to conſider that a man ſhould not either doe the former duties, or himſelfe have either any good apparell to weare, any bookes to benefit his ſoule by, no not ſo much as a Bible, or a Prayer Booke; any meate at home for his wife and children, any wages to pay his ſervants, or his other debts, or a number moe ſuch neceſſaries, and yet thinke his playing, yea, his coſtly playing lawfull, and not to be ſpoken againſt? Is it I ſay poſſible that ever a Chriſtian man, that thinkes he hath Gods Spirit, ſhould thus have his conſcience ſeared up? Truly, for mine owne part, I profeſſe I have ſtood in my heart amazed at it, and I beſeech the Lord to drive away from us ſuch groſſe ſecurity. For elſe as we live, wee ſhall know we have deceived our ſelves, and others, we were never any thing leſſe than Chriſtians. Theſe duties therefore due to others, ſo many, and great, and theſe wants of neceſſaries for our ſelves, improve our playing for money.

Laſtly, the judgements of men, both grave, godly, and wiſe, who have ever condemned it, ought in very right to make all men learne it. To thoſe that I named before wee may adde P. Martyr, who giveth not leave to the ſicke and weake in their houſes to play, but with this condition, that they play for no money. And we may reaſon from Auguſtines fact, that if hee thought it evill to give money to a Jugler, or a Stage-player, which to their paine, doe ſerve our ſenſes: much worſe is the warrant to give to a gameſter, that playeth with us, ſince hee laboureth no more to make us ſport, than we doe to make him. Much have many men writ, whence larger ſpeech may be fetched, and of me for a taſte let this ſuffice to be ſaid.

Queſt. Why, but doe you thinke it ſimply unlawfull to play for money?

Anſw. Surely no: For when either ſo little is plaid as no way enableth me to any duty of my calling, or the money (not much) is beſtowed in ſome meeting, for the increaſe of love, or that which is wonne, is a reward appointed to that exerciſe, then thinke I with others, that is lawfull. And thus much of theſe three queſtions, whether we may play or no, at what games, and whether for money.

Queſt. Nay one thing more I pray you, and that is this: Whether make you that like account of dicing, that you doe of other games, and thinke it as tolerable?

Anſw. No ſurely doe I not, to ſpeake plaine, but judge it moſt unſeeming for a Chriſtian man or woman, and a very ſhame to the place where it is uſed. For of all games, it hath neither wit in it, memory in it, nor art in it, (but falſe art) nor exerciſe of any thing, except it bee the elbow, nor any thing to commend it. And yet if this were all, it were not in ſo evill eſtate, howbeit, ſurely this is not a little againſt it. But ſee (which is far more) even of all men by a generall conſent as it were, this vile game as moſt vile detected and deteſted. For if you caſt your eyes to the Heathen, they ever hated it: if you looke at Chriſtians, they ever abhorred it, the Scripture hath forbidden it, the Councels have condemned it, the Lawes of every good Common-wealth, and eſpecially of our owne, have ſeverally puniſhed it, and what kinde of argument of miſliking is there not againſt it? This have they not dealt with other exerciſes, and therefore ſurely there is in it more ſhame to the uſer, and more hurt to the place where it is uſed, than in the other. But let us weigh the named heads in order. And firſt for the Heathen, do we not ſee how Tully layeth it to the ſhame of Catiline and his company, that they were dicers? and when he would have even ſpit fire in Anthonies face, and ganled him as greatly as he could, this comes in for one great diſhonour to him, and diſhoneſty in him, he is (ſaith Tully) a dicer, and his houſe a receptacle of ſuch men.

Suetonius in his life. cap. 71. Auguſtus Cæſar, a worthy man as we know in many reſpects, and greatly renowned, yet got by his dicing a reproach never dying, even to be accounted a diſſolute man.

Publius. Gobylon an Embaſſadour of the Lacedemonians, being ſent to make a League with the Corinthians, when he came and ſaw they uſed dicing, counterfeited ſome other cauſe, and went home againe, and would not make it, anſwering when he came home againe, that they were a vile people, and unworthy to be cared for, they were dicers. The King of Perſia ſent to Demetrius King of Aſia dice of gold in reproach to him, becauſe he uſed dicing. And another ſaith flatly thus, that Quanto aleator eſt in arte melior, tanto nequior eſt, The cunninger that a dicer is in his art, the worſe man aſſuredly he is. The Poet layeth it downe amongſt the Cankers that conſume men and make them beggers, Dice, Wine, and Women. What ſhould I ſay? Take any Booke in hand of an Heathen man, and it is a wonder, if you finde not ſome thing againſt dicing.

De civit. Dei l. 4. In præceptorio. Now come from the Heathens to Chriſtians, and ſee even a great miſliking. Auſtin beginneth, and is not afraid to ſay plainly, Aleam invenit dæmon, The devill firſt found out the game of dicing. Lyra deteſting it ſeeketh to make other men doe as much by divers reaſons. It coveteth (ſaith he) another mans goods greatly, it is a mighty meanes of deceit, it paſſeth uſury, it cauſeth lying, ſwearing, brauling, and many idle words, it is an offence to the godly, it breaketh the Lawes, it miſpendeth the time, and what not? Old Chaucer ſo long agoe ſet his ſentence downe againſt this exerciſe, and ſpares not to diſplay the vertues of it in this manner:

Dicing (ſaith he) is very mother of leaſings,
And of deceit and curſed forſwearings,
Blaſphemy of God, manſlaughter, and waſt alſo,
Of battaile, naughtineſſe, and other moe.
It is reproofe and contrary to honour,
For to behold a common dicer.
And ever the higher he is in eſtate,
The more he is holden deſolate.
If thou a Prince doeſt uſe hazardy
In all governance and policy,
He is by a common opinion,
Holden leſſe in reputation.
Lords might finde other manner of play,
Honeſt enough to drive the day away.

But of all other ſpeeches mee thinkes it is a marvellous ſaying of Sir Thomas Eliot, and ought very greatly to move us, who affirmeth that if a man heare one to be a dicer, and knoweth him not, by and by he judgeth him to be a light and vaine perſon, and of no credit or account. Conſider againe the decrees of Councels, and ſee how with one heart they have hated it. The firſt Councell of Conſtantinople determined thus, that no man whether hee be clarke or lay-man from that time forward ſhould play at dice. If hee did, being a Clergy man, hee was deprived, and if a lay-man, he was excommunicated. Can. 50. The Councell of Eliberis concluded, that if a Chriſtian man did play at Dice, hee ſhould be forbidden the Communion, and never admitted againe till he left it, and not under a yeare then alſo. Two godly Synods at Rochel and Nimanx in France, by the Paſtors, Elders, and Deacons of the reformed Churches in that Kingdome, Kingdome, utterly condemned it. Amongſt the Canons called the Apoſtles Canons, this is one, that if a Miniſter, Elder or Deacon, give himſelfe to Dice, Cards, or drunkenneſſe, if hee did not (admoniſhed) ceaſe from it, he ſhould be deprived. The Civill and Canon Lawes they ſay are ſo againſt it, as that if a man ſhould be beaten of him that he played withall, or robbed at home whileſt he were a playing, he may have no benefit of Law or juſtice in that caſe. And if any man conſtrained or allured another to play with him, hee ſhould be impriſoned or caſt into the quarries to digge. Geneva condemneth the very making of Dice in their City.

Laſt of all, peruſe the Statutes of this our owne Countrey, and I beſeech you marke the liking they have ſhewed of dicing.

In the twelfth yeare of Richard the ſecond all unlawfull games were forbidden, and by name dicing generally.

In the twenty one yeare of Henry the fourth, dicers taken were impriſoned ſixe dayes. And if any head Magiſtrate, as Major, or Sheriffe, made not diligent ſearch for them, they forfeited xl.s. If the Conſtable were negligent, he loſt vj.s. viii.d.

In the ſeventeenth yeare of Edward the fourth, they that kept dicing houſes, were to have three yeares impriſonment, and xx.li. fine. Players at dice in thoſe houſes two yeares impriſonment, and x.li. fine.

In the eleventh yeare of Henry the ſeventh, dicers ſhould be openly ſet in the Stockes, by the ſpace of one whole day, and the houſe-keepers that ſuffered him to play, forfeited a noble, and be bound to their good behaviour.

In the thirty three yeare of Henry the eight, dicing houſes forfeited xl. s. every one time, and dicers vj. s. viij.d. and bound in recogniſance never to play againe. And yet more may you ſee in Pultons Abridgement.

Now is it wonderfull, that notwithſtanding all this, yet ſo foule a thing ſhould ſeeme ſo faire, and that a man ſhould not thinke himſelfe uſed as a gentleman, or almoſt as a man, unleſſe hee may have liberty in this looſneſſe, and a large reine to ſo great an evill. And yet wee be Chriſtians, and that of the better ſort too, or you doe us wrong.

The Heathen hated it, and wee hatch it up in every houſe, and yet wee bee Chriſtians. The godly write againſt it, wee waite for it, and yet we bee Chriſtians. The Councels have condemned it in the Spirit of Chriſt, and Chriſtian Lawes have moſt ſharply puniſhed it; wee day and night uſe it, and cannot bee bereaved of it, and yet wee bee Chriſtians. But alas, alas, the day of underſtanding, or the day of damnation for our ignorance ſhall teach us another thing. We ſweare, we lie, wee revile, and wee runne into the field with murthering mindes (for ſuch anger is murther) moved by play, and yet wee will not leave it. And if I doe not thus in ſhew, yet inwardly I fret, I chafe, I gnaſh with my teeth, and teare the Cards, burne the Dice, throw away the Tables, and ſuch like, and yet I am religious. The Lord forbiddeth all apparance of evill, all occaſions of ſinne, and yet we are the Lords, and doe neither. The Lord ſaith, If thy right hand cauſe thee to offend, or thy right eye, cut it off, plucke it out, and caſt it away: wee will be the Lords, and not reſtraine a little play, that mine owne ſoule being witneſſe, moſt grievouſly maketh me offend. Fie, fie, what deadneſſe is this? Where is either love of God, or feare in us? Love maketh us burne, with deſire to doe well, feare makes us ſhake to thinke of any ſinne, we continually ſinne in our greedy gaming, and yet we bee godly. But this either makes us ſee it, or wee will never I feare ſee the miſchiefe of playing, and by name of dicing. The Lord for Chriſt his ſake awake us, and ſo I end. 1 Theſ.5.

Queſt. What is now contained in the affirmative part of this Commandement?

Anſw. Even as all theſe former Branches are forbidden, ſo the contraries of them are commanded: as in generall, all helpe, all ſuccour, all care and providence for the ſafty and the benefit of the goods of our neighbour that poſſibly wee can ſhew. And againe, the right uſe of our owne goods, as to the maintenance of the knowledge of God amongſt us, to the defence of the Common-wealth, and the Magiſtrate, to the nouriſhing of our family, and to the reliefe of the poore.

Laſtly, as diffidence and miſtruſt in Gods providence for us, the root of ſtealth and unlawfull proviſion for our ſelves was in the negative part forbidden, ſo here contrariwiſe is faith and full perſwaſion, that if we ſeeke his Kingdome and the righteouſneſſe thereof, theſe outward things ſhall be caſt unto us commanded. Mat.6.

The puniſhment of this Commandement, temporall or worldly, was ever divers in divers places, ſomewhere death, ſomewhere but fourefold, &c. The Spirituall puniſhment, as of all Commandements was, and is everlaſting damnation. 1 Cor.6. Zach.5.

The

The Application.

NOw, now my beloved to the worke of further fruit in our ſoules, let us lay this rule to them, and them to it, and let us even heartily I beſeech you every man ſecretly, betwixt God and us, ſee how we have anſwered in obedience this Law of our God and Father, mercifull and Almighty. We are bound by it generally to ſhew all love and carefull regard to our neighbours goods that we poſſibly can, and to doe him with our own goods what benefit we may. In particular if we will ſpeak we are bound to lend. We ſee both when and what we may, not hurting our ſelves, profit our neighbours withall, and to take no recompence, unleſſe it be hurt which we lend. Now, looke I ſay, if you have ever obſerved this thing without any want. Have you done it? Nay, have you not refuſed of a meere pinching and an unneighbourly mind, even ſmall matters, when you have been very earneſtly intreated, adding often a lie to mend the matter withall, and ſaying that you either had not that which indeed you had, or occupyed it your ſelfe, when indeed you did not. And have you not often contrary to the Law of God made in this behalfe, taken reward when the thing you lent received no harme? Surely your money & many things elſe doe witneſſe againſt you. For the Law of pledges and taking of pawnes, have you never paſſed the bounds of love, or the limits of mercy in that reſpect? Have you never gone in to take what you could, but ſtood at the dore to receive what he might ſpare you? O that our haſty hands, and hard hearts deſerved not the wrath which in truth they doe in this one thing. Many a time doe I greatly feare have we little regarded the caſe of the party whoſe pawne wee tooke, ſo wee might be ſafe our ſelves from our feared loſſe. And if it were ſo, ſurely we wanted love, and we have ſinned. Againe, in the things commended to our keeping, let us look alſo a little how we have ſatisfied the Law of God. We ſhould neither deny for any feare of harme thereby to keep for our neighbour, which we may better than he defend, neither conceale, hurt, purloyne, or convey away what ever any truſt repoſed in us, hath brought into our cuſtodie. But many a dogged nature denyeth the former, and many a covetous heart offendeth the later.

Pledges.

Cuſtody.

What ſay you of things which you have found being loſt? Have you ever regarded even as your owne to keepe it, to cheriſh it, and to find out the owner of it, the ſtraying beaſt of your neighbour, and even of your very enemy? Have you never either of negligence, or of malice & ſpite, or by a pinching mind tranſgreſſed herein? Conſider it well. And have you never even in the true teſtimony of a good conſcience retained any thing that ever you found, from the true owner, if you knew him, neither ever neglected any means to find him out, if you knew him not? Well were it with you if a privy witneſſe within you did not crie and ſay, that a greedie covetous heart hath made you often to offend in this duty. Alas, we ſee it not, we know it not, we feele it not to be a ſinne to retaine what we finde, or almoſt to finde before it be loſt, and ſo to conceale it. So gapeth each man after worldly gaine, and ſo ſeeke we to have, how ſo ever we have it, if it happen into our hands, and we well like of it. But ſinne will bee ſinne, when ſuch gotten goods will no where be ſeene, and the Lord give us feeling of it now betimes.

Next, let us looke of our buying and ſelling, wherin alſo all love is to be ſhewed to our brethren, and an equalitie kept ſo near as we can of commoditie given & taken. But how many of us do this, there is a God that knoweth, & a conſcience within us, that if it were wakned would crie I feare me a loud, we are grievouſly guilty. For where is that mā or woman of trade almoſt to be found, that taking up a ſtanding in Fayre or Market, doth once thinke with themſelves, that there they ſtand to ſhew their love to their brethren, as to themſelves, and ſo to interchange their commodities with them, as that in the teſtimonie of a good conſcience, and even God being witneſſe, ſo neare as they can, they keepe an equalitie, giving as good as they take, & taking no more thā they give value & worth. Now alas it is too wel known, and too much amongſt us daily ſeene, that wee thinke wee have our ſtanding there to pray upon all that come to us ſo much as we can, to deceive them, to ſpoile and robbe them in a ſort, and to get for our wares what poſſibly we may, with an utter neglect and refuſall of equalitie.

And therefore we ſell as we may be ſafe though we never be paid above halfe, we ſell to day with a pinching price, wee make account God may ſend us ſome loſſe, and therefore betimes we wrecke our ſelves upon our brethren, and ſo take of them for that which we doe ſell, and that if it happen that God doe ſo deale with us, we may be revenged before hand, and able to abide it if it be not great. To conclude, we are merrieſt when we have robbed moſt, and then goe wee ſinging home when we have given occaſion to the moſt to cry. So dul and dead are our hearts within us, and ſo hath a greedy minde to rake up riches ſpoiled us of love or any thought thereof towards our brethren. And as little conſcience there is often in the buyer, who if hee might have for a penny that is worth a pound, could well enough digeſt it.

And therefore if one in his need come unto us for preſent money, we will none of his commoditie, we want it not, we eſteeme it not, we looke lightly both of the man and the matter, till we have brought him to our owne price, and God knowes farre farre under the value of the thing. So that he which of charity in his need ſhould be helped, is of us commonly by reaſon of his need, preyed upon, and moſt cruelly robbed; And yet we be no theeves. Ah, God be mercifull to us and awake us, and never deale with us according to our iniquities for his Chriſts ſake. But paſſe we now on to other branches of this Commandement, and ſo ſhall we further ſee what manner of men and women wee are in obedience to the Lord. Who ſeeth not, who knoweth not, that all oppreſſion of my brother in his goods is contrary to that love that I ought to beare to him and his goods? And how ſtand we in this matter? Have we never detained the poor ſervants wages, and wrecked our anger upon him to his harme, further than a mercifull heart ſhould have done? Have we not taken even the flower of his youth, the ſtrength of his yeares, and the very juyce and ſappe of his body to ſerve our turns withall, and then either turned him off unrewarded, or taken from him, or diminiſhed without cauſe other than our own covetouſneſſe, the reward that our Anceſtor gave to his ſervice before? If we have done it, alas it is a great oppreſſion, a great wrong, and it ſtandeth not with that love that I am charged withall towards him in this Commandement. But man muſt firſt know ſinne before he can flie it, and now we know it, I truſt we hate it.

Oppreſſion.

Of ſervants.

Have we never againe dealt unkindly with a ſtranger, but even ſo as if GOD ſhould baniſh us from our warme home to a forraigne coaſt, we would be glad to feele our ſelves at their hands? If we have, this is oppreſſion, and we ſhould not doe it for any thing. Have we not hurt the deſolate widow, the fatherleſſe childe, or any whoſe might was leſſe than ours to beare off the hardneſſe of our hands? Have we not lift up our force againſt them, when we ſaw wee might have helped them in the gate? If we have, what can we ſay why we ſhould not rott in pieces for it, and our armes be broken from the bones, as Iob wiſhed to him in ſuch a caſe? Have we never reſpected the perſon more of one than another in cauſe of juſtice, a ſtrong meanes to draw us to oppreſſion? Have wee never ſuffered theſe hands to feele the weight of a bribers gift to draw us to oppreſſion? O ſpare not to ſpie your ſinne even to the full, if you have offended, and yet accuſe not your ſelves if you dare boaſt of innocency. Happy were our Countrey, and a thouſand comforts were it to every one of us, if the dulneſſe of our hearts in theſe deadly ſinnes pulled not upon us the often offending in them, and then ſuch ſinne, ſuch wrath againe from Heaven above, as is moſt due unto it. Alas, we ſee not, neither ever will be made to ſee, what love by this Law we owe to all men in their goods, but we robbe them, we ſpoyle them, and we take gifts to doe it, and yet wee be no theeves. But God is God as he was ever, ſinne is ſinne though we will not ſee it, and a juſt day of a juſt reward to every man for every matter muſt there be. We beleeve it, we ſay it in our Articles often, and yet we deale as if we never thought it.

it. What ſhould I ſay of that cloake and cover, and cauſe of much oppreſſion, the cloath and liveries of Superiours? Am I the giver or the taker? If I be the giver, have I never bluſtred my cogniſance out to doe the thing that God forbiddeth? Have I hearkened about to ſee and learne how they uſe the credit that is given them? God knowes we have little need to bee charged with other mens ſinnes, no doubt ſuch a Maſter ſhall with ſuch a mans offences. For we ſhall never be able to beare in our ſelves the burthen of our owne. Am I the taker? what then ſaith my conſcience, have I ſought it and ſued for it for affection, and true duty in my heart to him that gives it? Doe I weare it and wiſh to weare it to have my heart knowne to him or her the better whom with heart and hand, body and goods, power and might, till my death in right I honour and ſerve, and wiſh and will doe ever? Or rather a falſe faith ſeeketh a faire ſhew, and a powling hand of many a ſilly weak wretch ſeeketh a ſtrength to eſtabliſh my wickedneſſe, and a backer to beare out my foule oppreſſions? If it be ſo, conſider betimes how little love ſuch a ſervant deſerveth when he ſhall be found out, and feare leſt either the wrath of God to thee or love to thy maſter, that is ſo abuſed and little ſuſpecteth it, cauſe ſuch a falſe hypocrite and a trecherous Ziba come to light. Next let us conſider what our hearts will ſay concerning idleneſſe. For it hath beene proved before, that what is not enjoyed by the benefit of ſome lawfull labour, is but ſtolne and we have no right to it. If then my heart anſwer that I live all of other mens labours, doing nothing my ſelfe, I neither governe with the gifts of mind the quiet peace of my countrey, neither yet with bodily labour and true faithfull ſervice ſeeke to eate the meate of my maſter whom I ſerve; feele it, and ſee it, hate it, and abhorre it. For ſuch life is looſneſſe, ſuch a liver is a robber, and we ſhould not take any ſure comfort till we have changed ſo naughty a courſe, and altered quite ſo loathed a life. Too full, too full is every houſe and towne of ſuch idle bellies. Neither here muſt I onely examine my ſelfe whether by labour I live, but alſo as narrowly by what labour I live, and if it be ſuch as the word condemneth, the laws of man puniſheth, and each good man miſliketh, I ſin, I ſin, for ſuch labor is no life. But I referre you to what I have ſaid before, looke wee alſo even as wee love our ſoules, I beſeech you, at our hearts, eyes and tongues, whereby wee may ſteale as well as by the hand, as before in the Commandement hath beene proved. The heart by coveting and catching, or by too neare and niggardly keeping, tranſgreſſeth againſt this Law of God. The eye by looking beyond his limits, and ſending in word to the heart within to make it in love and ſet it in longing for other mens goods. The tongue by falſe flattery and filed forgery committeth a ſtealth which is called a great ſtealth, as hath bin ſhewed and proved before. All which or any whereof how they touch us and ſtaine us, the Lord knowes that knows all, and we with profit may well now thinke and weigh. Doe our hearts, and have our hearts ever reſted upon Gods promiſes for all neceſſary proviſion while we live, for us & ours, not caring, not carking, not wiſhing, not willing above that which the Lord alloweth, and we may juſtifie? No no, we ſuffer our hearts to goe too farre, and for want either of knowledge or care to live according to our knowledge, wee boldly looke of every mans commodities. As we goe and ride, we ſtraight way covet, and that which is worſe, preſently we deviſe to obtain our will to the impairing of our brothers wealth, and the fearfull breaking of this Commandement. And would God the rage of our luſt were not ſometime ſo vehement, as that miſſing to get what it greedily ſeeketh, it caſteth us downe ſicke in our bed, or cauſeth us to hurt him who hindereth our wiſh, as we ſee fell out in Ahab to Naboths vineyard. But of this hereafter more againe in the tenth Commandement. For the tongue, alas, what ſhould I ſay? I wil never bid you enquire whether you be guilty or no. For whither ſhould a man flie in theſe dayes from flattery, or where may we live, and not light on falſe forgers ſeeking by filed phraſe to bleare the eyes of ſuch as leaſt ſuſpect them? Rather looke in what meaſure you have or doe ſinne in this behalfe. For I feare not to ſay, you doe offend. And if your conſcience tell you your ſinne is great, great, runne not headlong into hell without returne. Curſed is that tongue that flattereth any man in his ſinne for any commodity, or that cooleth ſuch heate as Gods Spirit hath wrought to grace and good amendment. Well may I reape a reward with him for feeding his humour, but as I live, I ſhall loſe my reward with God for ſtealing away his honour. Let them joyne hereunto, whoſe calling is ſuch a true view of the drift and ſucceſſe of their pleas, whether they have not often endeavoured by their ſpeech the wrongfull alienation of mens right from them to other men. And is not this a theft? might not he even as well have robbed him with his hands, as to bee a meanes by ſpeech of wrong perſwaſion that others doe it? But alas what words can I uſe or any man elſe this day alive to make men feele, that neither golden gaine, nor any regard to be named whatſoever ſhould make them ſpeake untruly againſt the good eſtate of their brethren in any cauſes? Surely, if this will nothing move, that it is in nature theft which in name of theſe ſo abhorre, I will aſſay no further. The day will come, let them well remember, that ſin will be ſifted both by name and nature, and reape for reward at a juſt Judge ſuch torment as ſhall twitch above any conceit which can now be had of it, and ſo continue for evermore.

Lawyers.

To draw to an end of this Application, are wee all cleare of that theft of thefts committed in conveying of the Church livings to our owne uſe from them that ought to have them and doe the duty for them, to the diſhonour of God, the ruine of the Church, and the fearfull caſting away of many a ſoule into the pit of hell for want of knowledge? If we have theſe livings in our diſpoſition, & are able to make a good account of the beſtowing of them to our power, thrice happy wee in eſchewing ſo carefully the wrath of God, and regarding ſo tenderly the health of others. But if either corruption in taking ſome, or looſe negligence in unworthily beſtowing all, may juſtly ſtand and give to the Lord a witneſſe againſt us, how ſhould we eſcape for ſo great a ſinne? Shall the Lord ſo loudly crie that he will require of every watchmans hand the blood of the ſoule that dyeth in his ſinne without his warning, and ſhall that patron eſcape ſcot-free by whoſe greedy hand and cruell heart they have all beene robbed of one that ſhould have warned them? Shall the Lord cry woe upon woe, wrath upon wrath, vengeance upon vengeance to the careleſſe ſhepherds that feed themſelves, and not the flocke, and ſhall hee ſo quietly paſſe them over, that put in, and place ſuch dumbe dogs, and unable drones to doe any duty for their owne lucre? It is a token of love to feed his ſheepe, to feed his lambes, and is it not a want of love both to God and his lambes, to put in for my gaine ſuch a drie nurſe as can give no milke nor feed at all, except it bee with folly and a foule example of drinking, ſwearing, carding, tabling, bowling, ſleeping, and ſuch like? Thinke we if Ieremy were now alive to ſurvey the Pariſhes of this our countrey, and ſhould ſee the fearefull eſtate of ſo many ſoules not able to tell how they ſhall be ſaved, or to prove any one principle of religion, not flying ſinne, becauſe they feele it not to be ſinne, not loving light, becauſe they know it not to be light, thinke wee, I ſay, that hee would not wiſh his head full of water, and his eyes a fountaine of teares, that he might weepe day and night for the ſlame of England through theſe powling Patrons? Aſſuredly he would. For the heart that harboureth any portion of pitie to the Lords people, or hath any care what become of the price of Chriſts blood, could never abide untouched deepe, to ſee ſo great a ſpoyle for worldly wealth, of that which all the world cannot redeeme, when it is loſt.

Ier. 9. 1.

The Lord, the Lord looke upon his Church for his mercies ſake, and either alter the hearts of theſe Church-robbers by giving them to ſee what hangeth over them and their poſterity moſt juſtly for ſuch a ſinne, or elſe pluck out of their hands by reſtoring diſcipline the beſtowing of them any longer.

Next, let us weigh what goods we have ever gotten by unlawfull gaming, or by falſe deceit in the ſame, and remember it hath beene proved before a grievous ſtealth. Let us alſo conſider how wee ſtand touching the affirmative part of this

Commandement which wee are as well bound to performe, as wee are to flie the contrary, as how wee have ever to the uttermoſt of our ability, preſerved and cared for the goods of our neighbours, that they might be ſafe, how wee have uſed our owne wealth to the glory of God, the maintenance of the Magiſtrate, the defence of our Countrey, the comfort of our family, the reliefe of the poore, and the eſtabliſhing of the knowledge of God amongſt all. How wee have abhorred diſtruſt in Gods providence, the roote of ſtealth, and reſted aſſured of his goodneſſe if we ſerved him, with ſuch like. Are we cleare, and have done them all without reproofe or blemiſh? If we have, let us boaſt and looke for life for our workes, but if any thing touch us, and ſtaine us, know and remember what Saint Iames ſaith, He that is guilty of one is guilty of all. And doth nothing touch us, that hath beene ſaid? Hath neither hand by deed, nor heart by thought ever ſtrayed in any degree? O beloved, he that ſaith even in this Commandement he hath no ſinne, deceiveth himſelfe, and there is no truth in him. Let us therefore rather ſee our ſinne, know our ſinne, bewaile our ſinne, and crie to the Lord for his grace, to clappe hold of Jeſus Chriſt his Sonne, who hath fulfilled this and every Law for us, to the end, that we beleeving might be ſaved by his righteouſneſſe. The Lord give us pardon, the Lord give us faith, the Lord change our lives to a better courſe, for his bleſſed name and mercies ſake. Amen.

The ninth Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not beare falſe witneſſe againſt thy neighbour. A Commandement teaching us our duties towards the good name and credit of our Brethren, in ſpeaking never any thing of them which is untrue, as the former have towards their lives and goods.

Queſtion.

Then by this it ſeemeth it ſhould have gone before the other in order, becauſe a mans name is dearer than either life or goods.

Anſw. It is true, to ſome it is ſo, but not to all, and rather doth the Lord reſpect the multitude than a few, and the common nature of the vulgar ſort, rather than the diſpoſition of the better, but farre leſſer ſort. And firſt and formoſt, could the wiſe Orator ſay, by nature is it given to every kinde of creature, to maintaine himſelfe, his life, and body, and to avoid whatſoever may be any way hurtfull to the ſame. Noting in effect the other to follow, but in a ſecond degree.

Queſt. What right is there to eſtabliſh this Law?

Anſw. Even a three-fold right as you have heard and ſeene in the former. For firſt the Lord himſelfe is true and truth it ſelfe, hating ever and abhorring falſhood, and therefore very meet that he ſhould ſeeke the eſtabliſhing of the ſame amongſt his children, and the carefull avoyding of the contrary.

Secondly, the very light of nature hath ever taught it to men, that lying is to be loathed and hath made them crie, Socrates is my friend, and Plato is my friend, but truth before and above them both. Wherefore very meet it was and right that this Law of nature ſhould be ſtrengthned and maintained by the Lord.

Laſtly, without truth there is no ſafety in mens councels, bargaines, meetings, conferences, and ſuch like, and therefore moſt fit and neceſſary that for the ſtay of truth amongſt us, and the avoiding of the contrary, the Lord ſhould make one law at the leaſt. The equity of it then you ſee is great. And now to the particular branches of it, as they lie in your book. Where the firſt named hurt and annoyance of my brothers credit, as falſe witneſſe bearing, when in open place of juſtice and judgement or any where elſe any man ſhall of evill will and malice, or for lucre, or favour of others, teſtifie or depoſe that which is untrue againſt his Neighbour. Which thing how horrible it is may firſt appeare by due conſidering the price of an honeſt man, and good report in the world amongſt our brethren; Which (as the Wiſe man ſaith) is to be choſen above great riches, and loving favour above gold and ſilver. And in another place, A goood name is better than a good oyntment: Becauſe that therby we ſmell as it were ſweetly unto many to the edifying edifying of them, and working many things in them by our perſwaſions, which others could not, of whom they have or doe not thinke and heare ſo well. The Apoſtle Paul alſo in that excellent ſpeech of his to the Philippians, which I often very willingly remember unto you, noteth effectually how deare unto a Chriſtian any thing ſhould be that belongeth to a good name, and the working of a good report amongſt men of us. For whatſoever things, my brethren (ſaith he) are true, whatſoever things are honeſt, whatſoever things are juſt, whatſoever things are pure, whatſoever things are worthy love, whatſoever things are of good report, if there be any vertue, or if there be any praiſe, thinke of theſe things, &c. Again, Saint Peter in his Epiſtle, I beſeech you, dearely beloved, as Pilgrims and ſtrangers abſtain from fleſhly luſts which fight againſt the ſoule, and have your converſation honeſt among the Gentiles, that they which ſpeak of you as of evill doers, may by your good works, which they ſhall ſee, glorifie God in the day of viſitation. Phil.4.8. 1 P.t.2.12.

What is this, but even plainly enough, Have a care of your doings that your good name may never juſtly be touched and ſtained of any? And a number moe ſuch pithy perſwaſions in this behalfe hath the word. But I paſſe them over, and remember unto you that pretty ſaying of the godly Father S. Chryſoſtome, ſo fitly at this time confirming my perſwaſion. There are two things (ſaith he) neceſſary for thee as thou art a Chriſtian man and woman, to wit, a good conſcience and a good name, the former for thy ſelfe, the latter for thy neighbour. But alas (ſaith another) Plures famam, pauci conſcientiam verentur: Many are afraid of the touch of their fame, but few of the hidden breach of their conſcience. Adde unto theſe if you liſt, alſo the judgements of the Heathen, and firſt of him whoſe words be theſe; There is nothing ſo great, neither any commodity in the world ſo of thee to be eſteemed and deſired, as that for it thou ſhouldeſt blemiſh the beauty and brightneſſe of the good name of a good man. For deſire ever, ſaith another, rather to heare well, than to be rich: yea, prefer it in thy heart to leave unto thy poſterity an honeſt report and name, before heaps of any riches whatſoever, for riches are fickle and ſoone diſperſed, but a good report is permanent and never dyeth. Againe, by a good name may wealth be gotten, but not againe by wealth a good name. Laſtly, riches are common to the good and bad, but a good report is proper only to the good. Chryſoſt. de communi ſermone. Plin. lib. 3. Cic. offic. 3.

Queſt. And how may a man or woman beſt breed a good report of them?

Anſw. Ageſilaus was once asked the ſame queſtion, and he made this anſwer: If thou ſpeakeſt ever what is the beſt, and doſt the thing which is moſt honeſt. Socrates thus; If from thy heart thou endeavour in all truth to be, as thou deſireſt ever to bee thought to bee. For a fame that is gotten by gifts or hypocriſie, will never endure, but periſh. Wherefore now if the word of God, the teſtimonies of his children, and the very light of nature in heathens have ever ſo commended a good name, judge we hereby, if we will be taught what a ſinne it is to be a falſe witneſſe againſt this precious treaſure and jewell of my neighbour, his good name. Judge wee what a monſter before the face of God he is, that for the ſatisfaction either of his owne or other mens natures ſeeketh to deprive, to bite, and ſlander any man wrongfully, be the diſcredit he worketh never ſo ſmall. And thus much for my firſt reaſon.

The ſecond I draw from the puniſhment which hath uſually happened unto this vice either by Gods expreſſe commandement amongſt the Jewes, or ſecret working in the hearts of Magiſtrates in other places. For very effectually have I ever thought bewrayed by theſe things the foulneſſe of falſe witneſſe-bearing. The law of God ſaith thus: If a falſe witneſſe riſe againſt a man to accuſe him of treſpaſſe: Then both the men which ſtrive together ſhall ſtand before the Lord, even before the Prieſts and the Iudges which ſhall be in thoſe dayes. And the Iudges ſhall make diligent inquiſition, and if the witneſſe be found falſe, and hath given falſe witneſſe againſt his brother, then ſhall ye do unto him as he had thought to do unto his brother. ſo thou ſhalt take evill away forth of the midſt of thee. And the reſt ſhall heare this and feare, and ſhall henceforth commit no more any ſuch wickedneſſe amongſt you. Therefore thine eye ſhall have no compaſſion, but life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot. A marvellous law, if the ſpirit of feeling worke withall to print in us for ever a true conceit of the perfect hatred wherewith God abhorreth falſe witneſs bearing. Deut.19.16.

Beſide which law, marke what Solomon ſaith: A falſe witneſſe ſhall not be unpuniſhed, and hee that ſpeaketh lies ſhall not eſcape. For howſoever the hand of the Lord which is ever full of mercy and long ſuffering even towards the wicked, may ſpare them for a time, yet in the end with ſharpneſſe of his rod will he recompence the long deferring of it. And what marvell, if wee marke the nature of ſinne? For doth not a falſe witneſſe abuſe the Judge, hurt his neighbour, make the place of juſtice and right, the nurſery of ſin and grievous wrongs? doth he not cauſe the Lord to ſet in the eyes of men the crowne of innocency, upon the offenders head, and to put the halter about the juſt mans neck? than the which diſhonour what can be greater againſt the Lord of life, and lover of right, to pull upon us his heavy hand? Pericles an Heathen man could ſay, we muſt be a friend to our friend no further than the Altar; that is, no further than God and a good conſcience, guided by his word, may warrant unto us. But we in theſe dayes eſteem not a ſtraw of that man or woman, that will not ſtick to lend us an oath at any time when Prov.19.5.

we ſtand in need,be the matter never ſo falſe and foule. For he is no friend,which is not ever a friend to feed our filthy humour with all wicked and wrongfull uſage of himſelfe. But woe unto us wicked wretches for ſo great and grievous ſinne againſt the Lord and alſo our ſelves. For doe I not tremble and ſhake every joynt of me to prefer any mortall man in love before my God,and ſo to become unworthy of him for ever ? Yet this I doe, when I dare doe for him what God forbiddeth me to doe for him, and I thinke not of it. Should an earthly bond of earthly mindes together work a fearefull finall confuſion, both of body and ſoule, in that flaſhing flame of bottomleſſe hell for evermore without regard ? Yet this it doth to ſpeake untruth for my friends favour when committed ſin ſhould reape a juſt puniſhment in this world, that body and ſoule might both remaine in comfort hereafter. I ſtay the reſt of Gods revenging judgement upon falſe witneſſes, till I come to the end of the Commandement, and thus for the time paſſe over this point.

Scripture, Epheſ.4.25. Pſal.15.12.

Exod.18. Pſal.12.1. Pſal.101. Apoc.21.8. 22.15.

The next thing that your booke layeth downe is lying, another foule breach of this Commandement, condemned of God, improved by reaſon, and eſchewed ever of all Gods children in ſome meaſure. Caſt off (ſaith the Apoſtle) lying, and ſpeake the truth every man to his neighbour, for we are one anothers members. Lord who ſhall dwell in thy Tabernacle, (ſaith David) and who ſhall reſt upon thy holy hill ? even he that walketh uprightly, and ſpeaketh the truth from his heart. In the Law this was one property,that was ever regarded in the choice of a judge,namely,that he was a true lover of truth. Help Lord (again in another place ſaith David) for faith and truth are periſhed from amongſt men. Again, He that telleth lies ſhall not tarry in my ſight. For this is a ſin that ſhall ſhut a man out of the heavenly City,the new Jeruſalem as we may ſee in S. Iohn, and couples him companion to whoremaſters,theeves,ſorcerers,and ſuch like. The reaſons that improve it are theſe. God is truth,and therefore if we looke ever for any fellowſhip with him, we muſt frame our ſelves in meaſure like unto his nature. Secondly,our tongues are given us to expreſſe,in truth what our hearts doe thinke,and therefore to lie in any matter or for any cauſe, it is to abuſe the good gift of God,my tongue and ſpeech to a quite contrary end. Thirdly, it is a perillous enemy to peace and quietneſſe. For of lies commeth debate, contention and ſtrife. Fourthly, it breaketh,and in time taketh quite away that affiance and truſt which is requiſite to be in one man to another, and maketh them hang alooſe, ſuſpect, and be ſtrange one to another.

Reaſons. 1 2 Abuſus ſigni. 3 4

And laſtly,it impaireth a mans owne good name and credit greatly and mightily as any thing he can uſe. All which ſhould deeply ſinke into a Chriſtian heart, and make it hate ſo foule a vice. All lying is iniquity ſaith a godly father. All untruth is ſin ſaith another. And it is not lawfull to lie though it could be for the praiſe of God.

Greg.17. Moral. Aug Enchyrid. Epiſt.8.

Queſt. But I have often heard a diſtinction of lies, as ſome to be merry lies made in jeſt, ſome to be lies of duty made to doe my friend a pleaſure in his danger, and ſome to be lies of ſpite made to hurt others thereby, I pray you what thinke you of it ?

Anſw. For the firſt ſort many goe about to excuſe them and to diminiſh the fault of them, becauſe they intend no evill to the parties to whom they are told. But we heard before what Auguſtine and Gregory ſaid,namely,that all lying is ſin, and yet it hath a ſtronger check than this. For if we make the beſt of it we can, it is but an idle and fruitleſſe ſpeech, whereof wee know we muſt give account. And againe, The Lord ſhall deſtroy them all (ſaith the Pſalme) that ſpeakes lies, adding no diſtinction of merry lies from the reſt: and where the Law diſtinguiſheth not, we may not diſtinguiſh. The ſecond ſort many goe about to allow and juſtifie, bringing in for warrant the lie of Rahab, of Abraham, of the midwives and ſuch like, made for the ſafety of life. But touching them all and how many moe ſoever as may be brought like unto theſe, I anſwer as one ſpeaketh particularly of Abraham, Non videtur mihi laborandum, omnino ut Abrahamum defendamus: homo enim fuit & nimio timore potuit labi, &c. That is, I thinke it altogether needleſſe to goe about to defend Abrahams lie, for he was a man, and through too much feare he might offend. And ſo I ſay of all the reſt, they were faults in them and blemiſhes, and offended God. And concerning the Midwives lie Auguſtine plainly ſaith,that their feare of God and tender care mercifully to ſpare the infants pleaſed God,but not their lie. If this doe not content us,then remẽber the ſame Auguſtines judgment before in generality that it is not lawfull to lie, though it could be to the praiſe of God, ſurely then not for any mans helpe. Remember the words of Iob, who checked in his friends a falſe ſpeech although it tended to defend the Lord. And remember the words of Chriſt himſelf how he maketh the devil the father & author of all lies whatſoever without diſtinction. If we feare to bewray the man or matter, which we ſhould not, then hide the truth (ſaith S. Auſten) but in no caſe ſpeak an untruth. For the laſt ſort of lies nothing is ſaid of any to excuſe it, for every conſcience cryeth it is a ſin. And therefore now I conclude, one kinde of lie is worſe than another, but al naught, and of a Chriſtian man & woman ever to be forborne to their powers. The hyperbolicall ſpeeches in the Scripture are ever truths in matter and meaning, though not in words and forme, as I may ſay. For modeſty ſake neither may we lie in any caſe. But as Ariſtotle pretily ſaith: Declinet veritas nonnihil ad defectũ, cum de ſe quis quis loquitur. That is as I interpret it, When a man ſpeaketh of himſelfe, let him ſpeake ſparingly, but not falſely.

Queſt. What ſay you of flatterie and diſſimulation the next things in this booke?

Anſw. I ſay, I have touched them before ſufficiently, and therefore now I adde no more but this, they are both breaches of this Commandement. Inough to terrifie a feeling heart, and a dead ſoule what can move? From theſe then I follow your booke, ſetting downe next the unlawfulneſſe of telling falſe tales, hearing them, and beleeving them of others. And firſt to ſpeake of the firſt, do we not ſee the direct law of God in theſe words, Thou ſhalt not walke about with tales amongſt thy brethren? Do we not heare the Lord by his Prophet crie out againſt Ieruſalem, for that in her were men that carried tales up and downe to ſhed blood? Doth not the Apoſtle ſay, He feareth he ſhall find amongſt them backbiting, whiſpering, and ſuch like? Is it not the perſwaſion of Iames, that wee ſpeake no evill one of another? Is it not expreſſely named as one of the things, that may not be in man or woman elected to dwell in the Lords Tabernacle, to falſe report and ſlander any man behind his backe? Than the which things what may be more ſaid in deteſtation of ſo foule a vice? certainely what God ſo plainely diſcovereth to us to offend him, it will as plainely be puniſhed when God ſhall thinke it good in any graceleſſe wretch whatſoever that will not be warned. To be a taleteller and falſe witneſſe, why, it is a hammer, a ſword, and a ſharp arrow, (ſaith Salomon) Et quid intereſt utrum Deum neges, an infames, (ſaith Seneca) what difference is there betwixt denying of God, and falſe reporting thy brethren? Nothing, but a man may even as well doe the one as the other thought he. And in truth it is a notable ſaying of Hierom. Vilium eſt hominum, alios viles facere, & qui ſuo merito placere non poſſunt, placere velle aliorum comparatione. It is the property of a vile nature to ſeeke by tales to make others vile, or by a compariſon with others (whom they preſſe with their prattles) come to be accounted of, when ſimply and truly there is nothing in themſelves worthy of commendation. Filthy therefore and foule it is to be a falſe reporter: and what better is it to be a willing hearer of all detractions brought unto me of others? Doth not even the ſame God and Law condemne this alſo as well as the other? Thou ſhalt not receive a falſe tale (ſaith the Law) no, not receive it I ſay, and marke it well. Iudge not (ſaith Chriſt) and ye ſhall not be judged, for with what judgement ye judge, ye ſhall be judged, and with what meaſure yee meete, it ſhall be meaſured to you againe. He that hath itching eares to heare of others, ſhall reape for reward himſelfe as privie ſpeeches to his owne diſcredit. Take heed therefore (ſaith a godly Father) that thou neither deprave thy ſelfe nor any man, neither yet willingly heare others doe it. But flye to heare as thou wouldeſt flye to ſpeake what tendenth unto ſlander. For as he that ſpeaketh evill hath the devill in his tongue, ſo he that heareth evill hath him in his eare. It is the poyſon of friendſhip, and the very curthroate of all amitie betwixt man and man, to love to heare what peeviſh tongues ſhall ſeek to ſpeake. For ſoone creeps it in mine eare that will never creepe out againe whileſt the breath is in me. Let no proofe be brought for it, and never ſo much againſt it, yet ſticks the ſcarre of ſuſpition ſtill, and ſomething I think to the blot of my brother, though I can be content not to credit all. This open eare ſo greedy to heare, and not wiſely weighing, who telleth it, of whom, in what maner, to what end, with ſuch like circumſtances, what loſſe hath it laid full many a time upon both men and women? What hatred, what envie, what iealouſie, what ſuſpition, what diſquiet thoughts, and grinding griefe hath it ſetled ſoundly in many an one? How ſtealeth it the love of man from his wife, of father from his childe, and a friend from his long and liked acquaintance? How alienateth it the heart of a true ſervant from his Maſter, if he will yeeld to what his fraile fleſh will aſſuredly pricke him? And how many a maſter hath ſhaken off through ſpeech of hate light pick-thankes, ſuch truth and love, ſuch ſervice and ſtrength, as never after could in like manner, be gained againe with gold? But what ſhould we ſay? There is no miſchiefe to the tongue: and therefore no queſtion but a danger great to attend unto it without good diſcretion.

Hieron. ad Nepotian.

Then to proceede to the third. If telling, and hearing the depravings of the wicked bee forbidden, muſt it not alſo needs be evill to beleeve them? Certainly much more. For it is a degree further to beleeve the report that is made unto us, than to heare it. And if a man ought to bee ſlow to ſpeake when he is not certaine, much more ſhould hee be ſlow to beleeve what may be falſe before he knowes it. See therefore how the Lord ſpeaketh to ſuch among the Iſraelites as were to puniſh the offenders. If thou heare (ſaith he) concerning any of the Cities which the Lord thy God hath given thee to dwell in, wicked men are gone out from among you, and have drawne away the inhabitants of their Citie, ſaying, let us go and ſerve other gods, which you have not known, then thou ſhalt ſeeke and make ſearch, and inquire diligently if it be true, and ſo forth. What I pray you might meane this repetition of words, to ſeeke, to ſearch, to inquire, and that diligently, but to admoniſh us what a fault it is to condemne before we know, and to beleeve what ever we heare by and by? Likewiſe againe, if an Idolater were accuſed, and had but one witneſſe againſt him, he might not be put to death upon the teſtimony of that one, but at the mouth of two or three witneſſes ſhall he that is worthy of death, dye, (ſaith the law) all to teach us that wee may not be light of beleefe, when we are whiſpered in the eare againſt a man, and by and by kill him in our hearts by ceaſing to thinke well of him any more upon the reporters ſpeech. For to robbe him of that credit in my heart, that he had before me, unleſſe he deſerve it, is a branch of murther, as hath been proved. Againe, as Solomon ſaith of anſwering a matter before a man heare it, that it is folly and a ſhame to him that doth it: ſo ſay we and thinke we of beleeving a matter before we know it, for it it is as true. Is it not regiſtred of Putiphar, Ioſephs maſter to his blemiſh as long as ever the world endureth, that he was too credulous? Was it not a blot in David, and ſo by Gods ſpeciall wiſdome left unto us to conſider of it, that he would beleeve ſo quickly a falſe flattering Ziba againſt his truſty and moſt true hearted ſervant Mephiboſheth? But what ſhould I heape up examples? May not even every mans conſcience tell him, that the fault is not little, the diſcredit whereof God hath left unto us but in one example? I conclude therefore this matter of light beleeving ſuch tales as ungodlily and falſely are made unto us with the ſpeech of wiſe and experienced Syrach in his booke. Blame no man (ſaith he) before thou haſt enquired the matter, underſtand firſt, and then reforme righteouſly, give no ſentence before thou haſt heard the cauſe, neither interrupt men in the midſt of their tales. God give us the uſe of it. For great is the hurt of light beleefe both towards body and alſo ſoule.

Syrac. 11. 7.

Queſt. Yet there remaineth one thing more in the booke.

Anſw. It is true, and that is this. In private offences to ſpeake any thing (although it bee true) to the hurt of our brothers good name, if by private admonitions he may be wonne, is a branch and a breach of this Commandement. The Apoſtle Peter proveth it, when he ſaith thus. But above all things have fervent love among you. For love covereth a multitude of ſins. Paul proveth it in like words alſo: Love ſuffereth all things, it beleeveth all things, it hopeth all things, it indureth all things. If therefore we love our brother, there will be a care we plainly ſee, that we utter nothing to the hurting of his good name.

1 Pet. 4. 8.
1 Cor. 13. 7.

And if there be but any wiſdome in us (ſaith Solomon) we will be carefull of it alſo. For hee that deſpiſeth his neighbour is deſtitute of wiſdome, but a man of underſtanding will keep ſilence. But to ſtrike up the matter fully we ſee the words of our Saviour Chriſt in the Goſpell plaine: If thy brother treſpaſſe againſt thee go and tell him his fault betwixt him and thee alone: if he heare thee, thou haſt won thy brother: But if he heare thee not, take yet with thee one or two, that by the mouth of two or three witneſſes every word may be confirmed. And if he will not vouchſafe to heare them, tell it unto the Church: and if he refuſe to heare the Church alſo, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican. Here we plainly ſee, that private offences are not to be made openly known, ſo long as there is hope of amendment: But remember, I ſay, that we ſpeake of private offences, for in publike faults there is quite another courſe, even openly to rebuke them that have openly ſinned that others may ſee and feare.

Prov. 11. 12.

Mat. 18. 15, 16, 17.

1 Tim. 5. 20.

Queſt. Thus then of the negative part of this Commandement, now I pray you adde ſomething alſo of the affirmative.

Anſw. Eaſily may we gather one contrary by another, for who ſeeth not, that if all falſhood be forbidden in generall, likewiſe all truth by the ſame words is commanded? As therefore no way we ought to doe the former, ſo by all meanes we ſhould maintaine the latter. And namely, in the delivery of any doctrine, in place of juſtice and judgement, in contracts, covenants, and bargaines, in our ſpeeches, in our actions, and every where and way is truth to bee maintained and ſhewed of us. For man is borne to truth, and by nature we have to enquire after it. Man is borne to know God, to conſider the creatures, to perceive the difference betwixt honeſty and diſhoneſty, and what is this but truth? Man is borne to learne and know ſuch arts, as God hath brought into our practice, and every art ſeeketh a truth. Therefore a ſhame and a diſcredit we ſhould ever thinke it to be found untrue, yea, even ſo farre wee ſhould thinke wee are degenerated from the nature of man, as we are led with any liking of falſhood and untruth. It is a notable place of Zachary to ſhew us the great liking which the Lord hath of truth, and how he deſireth it in godly men and women ever. For theſe are the things that yee ſhall doe (ſaith the Lord) Speak ye every man the truth unto his neighbour, execute judgement truly and uprightly in your gates, and let none of you imagine evill in your hearts againſt his neighbour, and love no falſe oath, for all theſe are the things that I hate (ſaith the Lord) Zach. 8. 16. And if we weigh with this againe and many ſuch other teſtimonies that might bee brought, the ſentences of the godly Fathers, even thereby alſo may we gather greatly the excellency and precious account that all good men ſhould make of ſpeaking truth. For if any man be offended for a truth (ſaith Auguſtine) Vtilius ſcandalum permittitur, quam veritas amittitur. That offence were better ſtill to be, than that to remove it any loſſe ſhould be made of the truth. And in another place againe, To ſtrive or fight againſt a known truth, paſſeth in evill even Idolatry, not much differing herein from the words of Syrach. In no wiſe ſpeak againſt the word of truth, but be aſhamed of the lies of thine own ignorance. And moſt excellently Hierome if thou mark it: Tantus ſit in te veritatis amor, ut quid dixeris juratum putes: That is, Carry ever ſuch a love in thy ſoule of truth, that whatſoever thou imagineſt thou ſweareſt it. And again in another place. If a man for the feare of death be not licenced to conceale a truth that is asked of him, how ſhould it not be a farre greater impiety for the belly, or vaine hope of worldly honour to doe it? Wherefore we plainly ſee that if either God or his Children earry any credit with us, great ſhould be our regard of truth, and no leſſe hearty and unfained our hatred of falſhood.

Queſtiòn. What then might that be which ſome Philoſophers maintained touching a generall uncertainty in all things, and that there is no truth that can be attained unto, or knowne of us?

Anſw. Their ſenſeleſſe folly is very well diſcovered by another Philoſopher of another ſect: firſt, by examples, then by abſurdity, laſtly, by experiences and practice. For, ſaith he, do wee not know whether the ſnow be white or blacke, doe we not know whether the fire be hot or cold, is it uncertaine whether the ice will melt againſt the fire or no? If then theſe and a thouſand things moe be aſſuredly knowne, what abſurd opinion and unworthy of learned men might this be, that no certaine truth can be attained unto? Secondly (ſaith he) if I were one of their ſervants, and my maſter bade me fetch him bread, I would fetch him a ſtone; if hee called for wine, I would give him water, and what elſe ſoever he ſhould bid me doe, I would doe the contrary. Then if he asked me what I meant, I would anſwer, How ſhould I know that I brought him a ſtone and not bread, or ſo of any of the reſt which I named? Or how knew he himſelfe that I did not fulfill his Commandement, ſeeing there is no truth, by their opinion, that can be knowne. Thus doth he merily deride their folly, by ſhewing what abſurdity followeth of it. Laſtly (ſaith he) by their owne practice they confute themſelves. For when they are cold, they goe to the fire, and not to the water to warme them, and can they not tell which doth warm, and which doth coole? If they be dry they take water, and yet can they not tell whether it quencheth thirſt or no? Fooliſh therefore and moſt abſurd is that opinion, wee know no truth For both by experience, by certaine principles that nature hath ſet in us by order of a good conſequence, and by teſtimony of Gods certaine word wee know and doe attaine to many truths.

Queſt. But becauſe you ſay ever and in all things truth ought to be maintained, I pray you what ſay you of Davids diſſembling when he fained himſelfe mad before Achiſh?

1 Sam. 21.

Anſw. I may anſwer with good authority of learned men, that it was a weakneſſe in David not to be imitated. Or I may with others make a diſtinction, and ſay thus: That if hee did it upon any diſtruſt, doubt or feare, that God would not, or could not deliver him in that diſtreſſe from the danger that was imminent, then did he ſin no queſtion very greatly, but if his heart reſted upon God in aſſurance of his mercifull eye and hand, watching over him, and defending him ever, and did uſe that diſſimulation, but as the meanes that then he could, becauſe he would not tempt God, then did he well, and yet that his doing is no warrant to breake this Commandement, by rejection of truth and following a falſhood in any of our particular dealings above named.

Danæus.
P. Martyr.

Queſt. And what ſay you of the Stratagems and policies in wars, whereby the one party diſſembling, faining and counterfeiting with other, ſeeketh his overthrow? Is not this a kinde of falſe witneſſe?

Anſw. Firſt, I anſwer that it cannot fitly be called any diſſembling, becauſe the one party ever preſuppoſeth and expecteth what device and conveyance ſoever the other can make. But rather it is a concealing from him of a truth. And then doe we rightly diſſemble, lie and exhibit a falſe teſtimony, when as one thing is expected at our hands, which alſo we ought to doe, and yet we performe a contrary.

Dolus an virtus, quis in hoſte requirat.
P. M. in Jud. cap. 3.

Secondly, I anſwer that it is the Law of juſt war, juſt I ſay againe and not wrongfull, that it may be made either openly or privily, by force or by policy, with a good conſcience. And for warrant hereof we have the Commandement of God to his people and their practice of the ſame. For Ioſua intrapped the men of Ai by an ambuſh and ſlew them downe right, ſuffering none to eſcape. So did the Iſraelites vanquiſh and overcome the Benjamites, David the Philiſtimes, and many examples moe hath the Scripture of Stratagems and policies uſed in the warres, when the cauſe thereof was lawfull and warrantable, but theſe may ſuffice now.

Queſt. Will you then allow no little pretty gloſſe or colour at no time, but muſt we ever turne the right ſide outward?

Anſw. No indeed, no colour of honeſty, pitty, friendſhip and love, or any good thing, unleſſe indeed it be there. For both God and man abhorreth all ſuch colours. And it ſhould ever be the ſpeech of any Chriſtian man or woman whilſt they live, and that in truth that their rejoycing is this; the teſtimony of their conſcience, that in ſimplicity and godly pureneſſe, and not in fleſhly wiſdome, but by the grace of God they have had their converſation in the world, as Paul ſaid to the Corinthians of himſelfe.

2 Cor. 1. 11.

Queſt. What if I ſet no falſe colour on, but only conceale a truth and ſay nothing?

Anſw. It hath been ſhewed before that in ſome caſes and times it is lawfull ſo to doe, as by name, when it may ſtand both with my love to God and my brother. But if it be contrary to both theſe, or to either of theſe, then is it wicked and ungodly. And then (ſaith the holy Ghoſt) The fearefull ſhall have their portion in the lake that burneth with fire and brimſtone, which is the ſecond death. And Hieroms compariſon is good; if we may not for our life deny any way a truth, much leſſe aſſuredly for leſſer cauſes. Yea, be ready ever (ſaith Peter) in matters of faith to give an account of the hope that is within you, to any that ſhall aske you a reaſon thereof.

Queſt. You promiſed before to adjoyne in the end, more examples of Gods juſtice upon this ſinne of falſe witneſſe bearing, and now if you will, you may performe it, and ſo conclude this Commandement; for in all things elſe, I am ſufficiently ſatisfied.

Anſw. Firſt, conſider the puniſhment allotted to it by expreſſe word of the Lord, in this world even to reape by juſt ſentence of the judge, whatſoever hee by his falſe witneſſe had thought to have brought upon another, life for life, hand for hand, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, foote for foote, without any pitty or ſparing, and in the world to come everlaſting death. Then if you will remember alſo what Euſebius writeth of the accuſers of Narciſſus Biſhop of Hieruſalem: How three evill diſpoſed perſons that ſeeing the ſoundneſſe and grave conſtancy of his vertuous life, and fearing their owne puniſhment (as a conſcience that is guilty, is alwayes fearefull) thought to prevent his accuſations with a great oath; one wiſhing to be deſtroyed with fire if he ſaid not true, the other to be conſumed with grievous ſickneſſe, the third, to loſe both his eyes if they did lie. Narciſſus, although having his conſcience cleere, yet not able being but one man to withſtand the accuſation bound with ſuch oathes, gave place and removed himſelf from the multitude into a ſolitary deſert by himſelfe, where he continued by the ſpace of many years. In the meane time to them which ſo willingly and wickedly forſware themſelves this hapned. The firſt by caſualty of one little ſparke of fire, was burnt with all his goods and family: The ſecond was taken with a great ſickneſſe from the top to the toe, and devoured with the ſame. The third hearing and ſeeing the puniſhment of the other confeſſed his fault, but through great repentance powred out ſuch teares, that he loſt both his eyes. And thus was their falſe perjury and witneſſe-bearing puniſhed. Narciſſus after long abſence returning home againe was by this meanes both cleered of his fact, and reſtored to his Biſhoprick againe. Another good ſtory to this end is that of King Canutus the Dane, who being eſtabliſhed in the Kingdome, cauſed a Parliament at London, where (among other things there debated) it was propounded unto the Biſhops, Barons, and Lords of the Parliament there preſent, whether that in the compoſition made betwixt Edmond and Canutus any ſpeciall remembrance was made for the children or brethren of Edmond for any partition of any part of the land. Whereunto the Engliſh Lords falſely flattering with the King, and ſpeaking againſt their owne mindes, as alſo againſt their native countrey, anſwered and ſaid, nay: Affirming moreover with an oath and for the Kings pleaſure, that they to the uttermoſt of their powers would put off the blood of Edmond in all that they might. By reaſon of which anſwer and promiſe, they thought (many of them) to have purchaſed with the King great favour. But by the juſt retribution of God it chanced far otherwiſe. For many of them, or the moſt part, ſuch ſpecially as Canutus did perceive to bee ſworne before time to Edmond and his heires, and alſo conſidering that they were native Engliſh men, he miſtruſted and diſdained ever after. In ſo much that ſome he exiled, and a great ſort he beheaded, ſome by Gods puniſhment dyed ſuddenly. See therefore the heart and hand of the Lord againſt a falſe witneſſe. Many Hiſtories are there to this end, and many experiences even now adayes of Gods juſt plagues upon this ſinne. But I will not runne over them now. Eaſily may they be turned to in our owne Church ſtory. Only theſe two I cannot omit. Firſt, how Hamelton the Scot being brought unto his death by the falſe accuſation of a falſe Frier called Campbel, when he was in the fire, cited and ſummoned the ſaid Frier to appeare before the high God as generall judge of all men, to anſwer to the innocency of his death, and whether his accuſation was juſt or not, betwixt that and a certain day of the next moneth, which he there named, and ere that day came, the Frier dyed without any remorſe of conſcience, that he had perſecuted the innocent. And ſecondly, how Calice men in the dayes of King Henry the eighth being falſely accuſed, eſcaped ſafe from the danger of ſuch witneſſes, and they themſelves (a juſt plague upon their iniquity) hanged, drawne, and quartered ere they went home. Therefore let us tremble to provoke the Lord by this ſinne, let us ſpeake a truth if we doe ſpeak at all, and ſhame to lie even of the devill. The daily beggeries, diſcredits, ſhames and deaths, ſtrange and fearefull of ſuch as have made no conſcience by falſe-witneſſe bearing, to pollute their conſciences ought mightily to move us, and very effectually to perſwade us never to doe it. For God to us, as hath been to others, will moſt aſſuredly ſhew himſelfe either at firſt or at laſt, at one time or other, when our ſinne is the ſame, and he no changeling in his nature at all. And thus much of this Commandement.

The Application.

NOw let us weigh the guilt or innocency of our ſoules, if the Lord ſhould call us to an account for this his Law. Generally wee ſee the care that ſhould be in us to preſerve the credit, and good name of all men, and what heart ſo dull or dead, and paſt all feeling, that it doth not eſpie even a generall want in it ſelfe, concerning the ſame? Generally all truth would the Lord by his Law have loved, cheriſhed, and maintained, and the contrary hated, ſhunned and avoided, but what eye ſo blinde, that cannot ſee the courſe we commonly take, and the race we runne to the maintenance of the vice, and rooting out almoſt of the vertue from amongſt us? But conſider the particulars one by one, and ſo ſhall we reape moſt profit.

Have you never in all your life teſtified of your neighbour an untruth publikely, for favour, or gaine, or hatred, or any cauſe whatſoever? Have you never ſlipped neither in your owne behalfe, or your friends, nor your towne and liberties, nor any way? But have ever dealt in all the teſtimonies that ever you gave, as you dare abide Gods ſearching eye to judge you? Conſider well the matters that you have dealt in, remember the times paſt, remember the ſutes that have been made unto you, and peradventure the rewards that have beene offered you alſo, and if you be cleare and no way to be touched, though God ſift you never ſo narrowly, be glad and give God praiſe. But if you cannot, if you may not, if you dare not cleare your ſelfe, both becauſe a guilty conſcience accuſeth you within, and becauſe both men and matters may be produced and named, for whom and wherein affection hath led you, gifts corrupted you, malice incenſed you, and ſinne ſtained you, then ſee it, ſee it in the feare of God, and thinke of it, confeſſe it was naught, acknowledge your blemiſh, conſider this Law that ſo flatly forbiddeth it, tremble under the hand of the God of heaven, that hath ever plagued it, either by one way or another, in a mans ſelfe or his ſeed, in this world or the other. And ſo by the grace of God ſhall fight breed ſorrow, and amendment of life hereafter. Fie of that affection that damneth our ſoules, woe worth the gaine that getteth us hell.

And accurſed is that Juror and witneſſe, that ſo reſpecteth his preſent purpoſe, as that he caſteth away the care of God, of life, of hell, of death, of civill honeſty, fame and good name in his countrey and dwelling, never able after to come in company where he may not feare the touch in talke of his ill dealing. Certainly, certainly, if a good name be above gold and ſilver, a falſe witneſſe in the droſſe and dregs of the world that the Lord hateth & every honeſt hart very perfectly lotheth.

Lying.

The next branch that breaketh our obedience and duty to the Lord in this Law, is lying, the foule filth whereof hath in part before beene diſplayed and opened. And now it remaineth but to conſider our courſe and how grievouſly guilty wee are before God of this ugly vice.

Where is that man, that woman, that aged or yonger, that will cleare themſelves from all blot or ſtaine in this behalfe? Doth not every Maſter in his man, every Miſtris in her maid finde it, miſlike it, hate and abhorre it? Doth not every eſtate finde it in another? And God in us all to the juſt incenſing of his wrath and fury againſt us? If we can clear our ſelves let us, if we cannot, where is our righteouſneſſe, where is our perfection, where are our merits? Nay, why dread we not the death that is the deſert of lying lips? O ſift and ſearch the guilt of guilefull tongue, cover it not, excuſe it not, remember what I have ſaid of it before, mocke not God, dally not with your damnation, hate to be the child of the foule fiend, and with ſorrow in truth for paſſed ſecurity, flie with perſeverance for ever hereafter ſo ſinfull iniquity. Truth may be blamed, but it can never be aſhamed, yea even man in the end ſhall like it, and God for ever bleſſe it and crowne it. There follow then in the Booke the particulars of this generall flattering and diſſembling, and telling falſe tales behind our neighbours back.

Flattery.

Concerning the firſt, what ſhould I ſay? Should I aske whether you have, or doe offend? ſhould I make a queſtion of it, or bring you into doubt with your ſelfe ſelfe whether you have herein faulted? not, alas how want I rather words to move us to repentance, than proofes of daily practice to convict us of tranſgreſſion? Helpe Lord, helpe may I truly ſay with David, for good and godly men doe periſh and decay, and faith and truth from worldly men, is parted cleane away. Who ſo doth with his neighbour talke, his talke is all but vaine, for every one bethinketh how to flatter, lie, and faine. But what followeth? Certainly even that which we ſhall finde, if God by his grace change not our hearts to more ſincerity. For we make no conſcience to lie, to flatter, to fawne, to halt, to cogge, to gloſe, and diſſemble honeſty, piety, friendſhip, and favour, love and obedience, faithfulneſſe and truſt, and whatſoever may be profitable to us, even from morning to night, from wee riſe till we goe to bed, and then how ſhould we eſcape, and yet God be juſt too? It is even the wiſedome we extoll in others, and that wee ſtrive continually to attaine unto our ſelves, to have neither true eye, true heart, nor true tongue, but onely to ſeeme to have all to every one, whoſe word, wealth, or authority, may gaine us any thing in this curſed world. And ſo man is our ſtrength, our policy is our God, fleſh is our arme, and what Paul ſo rejoyceth in, we laugh at, as vile and too ſilly ſimplicity. David aſſureth himſelfe the Lord will defend them that are true of heart, we verily thinke if we be true of heart we cannot, nor ſhall not be able to live in the world, we muſt Cretizare cum Cretenſibus, that is, we muſt ſmooth it, and ſooth it, and carry two faces under one hood, or elſe we are not ſo wiſe as we might be.

Thus ſinne we, I am ſure of it, ſome more and ſome leſſe, and the reward of the leaſt ſinne is eternall death. But it is the Lords great mercy to move us from any ſinne. For dull are our hearts to feare any judgement till it be upon us. And therefore to him I commend us to open our eyes, that wee may even earneſtly ſee and conſider effectually, how impoſſible any fellowſhip is ever to be had for me hollow, ſubtle, guilefull, hypocriticall, and ſo forth, with a God all truth, ſincerity, ſimplicity, and open aſſured faithfulneſſe it ſelfe.

1 Iohn 1.7.

For the ſecond, which was telling of tales, we have heard it before ſhewed, and our owne knowledge doth aſſure us it is a branch of that breach of this Commandement, which ſhall burne both body and ſoule in the fire of hell. And yet ſee, doe we feare it, or flie it? Alas we know, I am ſure of it, we have beene too ſecure in this point, and our ſecurity not ſeeing and weighing, the wickednesſe of the vice, hath ſtained both heart and tongue horribly.

Looke about the world and view the generall courſe of all. Feareth any man to diſcredit his neighbour privily, and to whiſper upon heare-ſay or his owne imagination, what tendeth to the blemiſh of his name whom hee ſpeaketh of? Feareth any woman when ſhe hath met with her goſſip, to tittle tattle, to the ſlander of another, this thing and that thing, which yet hath no certainty, and which full loath ſhe would have ſaid of her ſelfe upon like conjectures? No, no, wee ſee too much the curſed courſe of lawleſſe tongues in every place, though the Lord in mercy giveth ſome conſciences, and a thouſand times I begge that we would ſee our ſinne, confeſſe our ſinne, and rip up our guilt in this reſpect. Why ſhould wee be ſo dull and without feeling? If it be a vertue thus to prittle and prattle of every body uncertaine tales, but moſt certaine diſcredits, then prove it ſo and uſe it: but if it be a branch of falſe witneſſe that doth truly witneſſe Gods wrath to hang over us for it, good Lord, ſhall we ſtill be polluted with it? Shall hell have us without any help? will not the dread of dolefull day ſtrike ſuch a filthy fault into the waining, and by little and little cut quite the throat of it, and make it bleed to death in us? I hope the beſt, and I wiſh the beſt, the Lord in his mercy ſet a watch before our mouthes, and keep the dore of our lips for ever hereafter.

Next commeth hearing and beleeving to bee conſidered of faults in neceſſity alſo, if telling falſe tales hath before beene juſtly blamed. For there is nothing that ſo nurſeth and nouriſheth up a tale-teller, as doth the credulous heart, and attending willing eare of the hearer. And therefore if the one bee a vice, the other other certainly is no vertue. Now how guilty are wee in this againe, how ſtained, how blotted before our blemiſhleſſe God, if hee ſhould enter into judgement with us? For Chriſt his ſake let us weigh it, let us view it, and even earneſtly thinke of it, and fearing to be damned, let us feare to ſleep ſoundly in the ſinne that leadeth to damnation. We doe not diſcountenance the whiſpering carper, we doe not eſchew the reports of peeviſh pratlers, but we itch to heare, and take pleaſure in hearing what true charity in our hearts towards our brother ſhould make us abhorre to heare, and weep to have it true. And for beleeving, marke and conſider, if you dwell amongſt neighbours, whether you have not grievouſly offended toward many of them in this reſpect? How have you ſuffered a falſe tongue to fire your hearts with the beliefe of your neighbour, that could never yet bee extinguiſhed ſince you heard it, and yet you doe not know it? Alas, is this charity, which who ſo wanteth, wanteth God? Is this to love your neighbour as your ſelf? When full ſore it offendeth me that any man ſhould credit a ſurmiſe of me, if it be not true? O eyes, O hearts, where is their ſight and feeling? What love can my neighbour beare me, or with what heart can a ſervant ſerve me, when he ſeeth whiſperers ſtill about me, and findeth my nature ſo credulous of them, as that all his faith and truth, all his travell and labor, all his affection and love, were it never ſo ſincere and upright, and even flowing from the rootes of his heart, in the very bottome of his ſoule, yet is in hazard every houre of unjuſt condemnation, of unkinde regard, and moſt undeſerved reproofe? Truly, as I have ſaid before, it is the very tryed cutthroat of all amity, friendſhip, or faithfull loving ſervice to have a liſtening eare, and a credulous heart without marvellous good diſcretion. And I am moſt aſſured of it, there is no plague nor infection grievous in the world comparable to this poyſon, in eſtranging, alienating, and in the end quite driving away from me thoſe hearts that were mine owne, with body and all worldly abilitie, in truth, in honeneſty, in allegeance, in God, in Chriſt, and in all good meaning to the death. Who loveth for gaine, and ſerveth for hire, he is a ſlave to the thing that he gapeth for, and to make up his mouth, he will carry any thing: but to whom love is gain, and due regard of his poore true heart an abundant reward, the denyall of it diſcourageth his meaning, grindeth his ſoule in ſunder, and raketh him up in duſt, by untimely death. And therefore ſince it offendeth God, hurteth our brother, and very greatly endamageth our ſelves: O that we would ſee it, conſider it, and as God by grace ſhall ſtrengthen our fraile natures, ſcoule upon the ſpeech that practiſeth manyes harme, and covenant with our hearts to know before we credit; ſo would God bleſſe us, many report well of us, and true hearts of neighbour, friend, ſervant, or whoſoever never leave us. Paſſing then on in this examination further, we may not forget the publiſhing of our brethrens private offences, a diſpleaſing thing unto the Lord, and a grievous breach of this Commandement. Wee ſhould cover in charity what no body knoweth but wee, if the party will be reformed even as willingly and readily as ever we would our ſelves findefavour for our infirmities. But doe we it? Is my brothers ſhame my griefe, is his credit deare unto me as my life? Goe I backward with a cloak on my back to caſt upon his offence, loath that either others or I my ſelfe ſhould ſee it, as good Sem and Iapheth did to their bared Father in his drunkenneſſe? No, no, we grinne and laugh rather with curſed Cham, and blab it out to others. Good beloved, let us weigh our wants, and never make our vices vertues. God asketh but our confeſſion in griefe and ſorrow, and he will heale us. It is a branch, and a breach of this Commandement, and therefore nothing to be continued in. But I dwell too long in this ſpeech unto you. Many things moe might yet be rehearſed, but ſee them your ſelves, and let my ſilence paſſe them. Theſe few bewray our want of perfect obedience to the Law, and ſo conſequently of any life and ſafety by the workes of the ſame. And therefore I hope we clearly perceive, that without a Saviour we were but loſt, make what diſtinctions we can of obedience, of juſtification, or ſuch like. Faſt cleaveth to us, and cannot be denyed, grievous guilt againſt both this Law, and all the former, and curſed curſed is he which abideth not in all to doe them (ſaith the Lord) He that is guilty of one, is guilty of all, and by the workes of the Law can no fleſh living be juſtified. For the juſt ſhall live by faith. We have not done all, but we have broken much, and therfore the concluſion lighteth upon us, and all the ſubtilties of all the wits in the world, cannot remove it from us, if the Lord ſhould marke what we have done amiſſe, but in this one Law of his, and judge us thereunto and by, we are not able to abide it, we are caſt away. Therefore let us flie from the Law as faſt as ever wee can, and take the right uſe of it, thereby to be led unto Chriſt, and let this be our firme comfort, that When the fulneſſe of time was come, God ſent forth his Sonne made of a woman, and made under the Law, that hee might redeeme us from the curſe thereof, and ſo by him we might retaine the adoption of ſonnes, which without him we could never attaine to. This is ſure, and this is comfortable to hold by, and the Lord encreaſe this faith in us ever.

Deut.27. Iames 2.10. Gal.3.11.

The tenth Commandement.

Thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbours houſe, thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbours wife, nor his, &c. Wherein (ſaith your Booke) the Lord plainly forbiddeth all inward deſire of any thing unlawfull to be done, although we never conſent unto it, as the rebellion of the fleſh, all corruption of the old man, all blot of originall ſinne: ſo that by this Commandement moſt clearely we may ſee the image of that man that pleaſeth God, even ſuch an one in whom nothing is impure, neither in will nor nature.

Queſtion.

YET plainer I pray you, if you can, ſet downe the difference of this Commandement from the other, for as I have heard, ſome have halfe thought it ſuperfluous, ſeeing as the former did alſo forbid the inward thought as well as the outward act.

Anſw. It is as plaine as may be already, yet to content you, thus over againe. The former Commandements did forbid the act and the ſetled or conſenting thought of the heart, though the deed were not done; as for example, the precept of killing forbiddeth the deed, and withall once to thinke in heart to doe ſuch a deed, with a reſolution verily to accompliſh it if I can. But now this Commandement commeth nearer, and condemneth not onely that thought that is ſetled, and lacketh but opportunity to doe the deed, but even the very thinking alſo of any thing contrary to the love of God, or my neighbour, though I doe never conſent to it, but ſnub it, miſlike it, and reject it. For even that having of an evill thought in my minde is a fruit of my corruption, ſuch as in innocency if we had ſtood we ſhould never have had, and therefore naught. So there are two degrees of thoughts, the one with conſent to accompliſh in deed what we doe thinke, if we can, and the other without conſent repulſed away, when we awake and ſee it. The former in the former Commandement was forbidden, and the latter in this. A ſtrange doctrine in ſhew, no doubt, to many that thinke this their thought is free. But we muſt not marvell, ſince even the Apoſtle Paul himſelf would never have ſuſpected any danger in concupiſcence, luſts, and deſires, if the Law had not ſaid, Thou ſhalt not luſt or deſire. Nay it appeareth very plainly in that place (ſaith a godly man) that he thought marvellous well of himſelfe before he came to this Commandement. Hee tooke himſelfe before to be living, and in good liking towards God and godlineſſe, but when he had looked upon this Law, and beheld himſelfe a while in this part of the glaſſe, he ſaw himſelfe plainly to be no body, but a dead man ſold unto ſinne. And therefore a thouſand times needfull, that the Lord ſhould adde this Law to all the reſt to humble us throughly, ſeeing ſo ſingular a man was not fully caſt downe before he had wreſtled with the Juſtice of God in the ſame. Let us therefore thinke of this thing that ſeemeth ſo little in our eyes. For we heare what the Apoſtle ſaith, it is ſinne to deſire, and we may joyne unto it the words of the Lord himſelfe, affirming plainly, that the very imagination of mans heart is evill, even from his youth. God hath made the heart as well as the body, to ſeeke his glory, and therefore good reaſon the cogitations of the heart ſhould no more ſtray from their true end, than the actions of the body. Neither may our rejection of ſuch thoughts in the end, and not conſenting unto them to accompliſh them in act, bleare our eyes with any imagination, that we have not offended in them, in going ſo farre as we went. For it is a blemiſh, a want, an impietie, and a degree of unchaſtity in a woman, to ſuffer the cogitations of any forren friend beſide her husband, to tickle her with conceit unlawfull, though in the end ſhee repulſe it, and abhorre to accompliſh it, and how can it then bee faultleſſe faultleſſe in theſe hearts of ours, the Spouſe of the Lord to dally with ſuch delights, and to purſue in minde, by thinking of them, the pleaſures that ſuch conceits doe plead before us, though in the concluſion we give the denyall, and doe not conſent. O it is a greater matter to love the Lord with all the heart, than that it may abide any light licentious wandring from the ſame for any time. For they are oppoſed to love the Lord ever, and to thinke evill at any time: to love the Lord with all my heart, and to thinke now and then of vaine follies or flat impieties with my heart. And if it be a certaine truth, as we know it is, which I ſaid before, that if we had ſtood in our innocency firme and immoveable, we ſhould never have conceived in our time any evill thought at all, or vaine fooliſh conceit for any moment or point of ſpace, but ſhould ever have been able to have juſtified our thoughts before God, whatſoever they were, as agreeing with the love of him and our brother, then is this tickling delight, that now and then will take us and poſſeſſe us for a time to enjoy our neighbours houſe, his wife, his child, his man, maide, or any thing that he hath, otherwiſe than we ſhould, wicked, vile, and againſt that rule of right, wherein we were created, and whereto our regeneration daily tendeth, if we be the Lords. And therefore let this argument convict us, and this conſideration ever aſſure our ſoules within, that it is unlawfull for the childe of God once to conceive an ill thought, although we never conſent unto it. And conſequently let it ſtirre us up to pray with David againſt our corruption, that the Lord in mercy would vouchſafe to make us cleane hearts, and to renue a right ſpirit within us evermore. Let it be ſtill the property of a Popiſh ſpirit to extenuate ſinne, and exalt fleſh and blood and corruption above truth and right, ſaying, concupiſcence is no ſinne, but onely bringeth forth ſinne after it hath conceived. But let the child of God ſchooled up in the truth of the Goſpell, preſſe fleſh and blood and his corrupt nature, ſo far as Gods Word, and Law preſſeth it, and let him know that firſt very concupiſcence in it ſelfe is a damnable degree of vice, yet not the higheſt degree, but upon the conception thereof followeth actuall accompliſhment of wickedneſſe before: but thought in heart, is an higher and further ſtep of evill in us, which is the meaning of Iames. For if concupiſcence were not evill, then muſt it needs be either good or indifferent. But neither of theſe it can bee, and therefore it is evill. Good is it not, for the whole ſeventh Chapter to the Romanes denyeth it. And S. Auguſtine prettily againſt Iulian, gathering upon his words, that concupiſcence remained in them that are regenerated, though not the guilt of it, that therefore it was good, anſwereth, Si hoc ſentirem, non dicerem eam malam eſſe, ſed fuiſſe: Nos autem malam eam dicimus, & manere tamen in baptizatis: That is, If I had thought ſo (to wit, that it was good) then would I not have ſaid it is evill, but it was evill. But we ſay it is evill, and yet remaineth in them that have been baptized. And when Iulian goeth on and urgeth his aſſertion, that nevertheleſſe the guilt was taken away, yet (ſaith he) Reatus quo hominem reum facit, non quo ipſa rea eſt, ut homicidii reatus tollitur in aliquo, non tamen ideo bonũ eſt. That is, That guilt is taken away wherewith ſhe ſtaineth man, not wherewith it is ſtained it ſelfe, in it ſelfe. As the guilt, and the deſert of murther a man may be quit of, and freed from, and yet not the wickedneſſe it ſelfe in it nature changed for that cauſe, but remaineth ever ſtill. Good therefore you ſee concupiſcence is not. And indifferent it is not: For the Apoſt. flatly giveth it an harder name, ſaying, That when he would have done good, he was ſo yoaked, that evill was preſent with him. If the Spirit of God call it evill, beware wee preſume not to call it indifferent, and beware more how we play with the pleaſure of it, and take delight to doe it. Againe, what concluſion carry all thoſe exhortations to crucifie, Crucifie the old man with all his luſts, & that piercing plaint of an Apoſtles mouth, O wretched man that I am, who ſhall deliver me from this body of death? I know, I know that in me, that is, in my fleſh dwelleth no good: I ſay, what concluſion carry they all, but this, that concupiſcence is neither good nor indifferent, but flatly evill.

Rom.7.21.

Queſt. How then falleth it out, that it condemneth us not?

Anſw. The Apoſtle anſwereth in the five and twentieth verſe, I thanke God through Ieſus Chriſt our Lord: and in the next Chapter, There is no condemnation to them that are in Chriſt Ieſus, which walke not after the fleſh, but after the ſpirit. For the law of the Spirit of life which is in Chriſt Ieſus hath freed me from the law of ſinne and of death. So that we ſee it in Chriſt, in whom, and by whom, and for whom we are not charged with the condemnation due to the concupiſcence and corruption ingrafted and growing in us.

Rom.7.25. Chap.8.1.

Queſt. But is then all deſire and affection and all coveting unlawfull by this Commandement?

Anſw. No indeed, for God hath created affections and deſires in men, as mirth, joy, hunger, thirſt, &c. And they would have been in man, though he had never fallen, they ſhould have loved their children, their parents, and friends even ſtanding and abiding in innocency, and therefore theſe things are not evill: Nay, the want of them maketh a monſtrous abſurdity in nature, and therefore not to be maintained. The inſtruments of affection, and delight, and dolor, created by the Lord, prove them allowed, the Law of God commandeth them, and reproveth their want, Chriſt our Saviour, untouched by ſinne, ſhewed them in great meaſure, they are ſpurres, and prickes unto vertue in us, and therefore allowed. Beſides numbers of other reaſons that might be alledged.

Queſt. What elſe doe you obſerve in this Commandement?

Anſw. I doe truly weigh the particulars that God reſtraineth our coveting in, and I ſee them to be ſuch as moſt commonly, and moſt without checke, men ſuffer themſelves to be carryed away withall. As the houſe of my neighbour that is his inheritance, lands and poſſeſſions, which we ſo greedily often behold and marke, wiſhing and willing them farre otherwiſe than a Chriſtian heart ſhould. We can flatter our ſelves with our offering of money for them, not remembring that ſo did Achab for Naboths vineyard, and yet grievouſly offended. Our neighbours wife, or any other wives husband, God knowes the ſinfull thoughts they cauſe within us. For coveting the childe againſt Parents liking, and inticing away the ſervant of another againſt their good, they be things wherein few of our hearts have any feeling. And for their cattell, with ſuch ſinfull eyes we looke upon them, that we ever thinke our neighbours bullocke hath a fairer yowre than our owne hath, as the Poet ſpeaketh: and therefore, wiſely in the naming of theſe particulars hath the Lord taught us wherein commonly our thoughts offend, and what moſt carefully we are to take heed of. Alſo I further conſider the marvellous care and ſtrict regard, that every Chriſtian man and woman ought to have of their ſenſes, ſeeing all evill thoughts are forbidden. For it is the eye and the eare that ſendeth in ſinne in ſtore into our hearts, and never ſhall we have the one reformed, unleſſe there be a ſtable covenant made with the other. The heart will conceive wickedly, if the eyes freely behold vanities. But checke the one, and ye ſtay the other marvellouſly. And no more quench you the fire by withdrawing the wood, than aſſuredly you ſtay the courſe of wicked conceits, when you watch and ward well over your ſenſes.

Queſt. But I pray you what ſhall we thinke of dreames, which ſeeme to be ſinfull, and we cannot amend them?

Anſw. We muſt conſider the cauſes of them, and thereby, as well as we can, grow to ſome right conceit of our offending by them, and in them. The cauſes are either inward or outward: and of inward, either the minde it ſelfe or the body. For often doth the minde, the body ſleeping, and the ſenſes reſting, remember thoſe things which it waking conceived, and either deſired or feared. Alſo the divers complexion and temperature of the body occaſioneth divers kindes of dreames, whereby the Phyſitian will gueſſe the nature of the body, and cauſes of diſeaſe in the ſicke. Cholerick men will dreame of fires and down-fals. Melancholick men of monſtrous and horrible things. The phlegmaticke of waters and dull matters: and the ſanguine of pleaſant and confortable events. The outward cauſes are alſo divers, as the influence of the heavens, the circumſtance of Elements, neceſſity and want, ſome hapning chance, and ſuch like. Thus doe hungry men dreame of meate, drunken men of moiſture, &c. Quæ vigilantes cogitavimus, ea ſolent poſtea dormientibus obſervari, (ſaith one) that is, Such things as waking we earneſtly thought of, even ſuch things often we ſleeping dreame of.

Aucupibus volucres, aurigæ ſomnia currus.
The Fowler dreames that birds he takes,
And Carters Cart his viſion makes.

Therefore theſe things thus knowne and weighed, if we dreame wickedly, (to name no particulars) let every one conſider well what occaſion in himſelfe he can finde of the ſame, and if his own diſorder either in dyet or ſpeech, or meditation, or any way hath done it, then needeth he none to tell him, his conſcience is a thouſand witneſſes hee hath offended. Thus anſwered Gregory Biſhop of Rome, when he was writ unto for his judgement of this matter, and if I can finde in my ſelfe none of all theſe to procure it in me, yet know if it be evill, it is a fruit of corruption, and weigh well the Law of the Lord in this behalfe laid downe. Plutarch ſaith, Honeſt dreames are an argument of vertue in a man, and then wee thinke in reaſon a contrary effect ſhould bewray a contrary cauſe. The ſame man ſaith, Perverſorum ſomnia ſemper turbata. Evill mens dreames are commonly trouble ſome. But I referre you for more of this to others. And this onely I ſay againe, the body well ordered, and the minde well occupyed, hardly ſhall our dreame feare us from evill.

Levit. 15.

De virt. & vit. Plutarch.

Queſt. What now then might be the affirmative part of this Commandement?

Anſ. If thus we ſee all wandring wayes from upright integrity, be they but even in thought, and that alſo in the leaſt degree without any conſent, to bee by this Law condemned as impure, what ſhould wee ſee on the contrary part to be commanded, but even a full, perfect and abſolute conformitie, both of minde, will, appetite, and whatſoever is in man to the Law of God? That which Moſes in theſe words deſcribeth, Thou ſhalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy ſoule, and with all thy might: and our Saviour Chriſt doth adde unto it for plainneſſe ſake, with all thy thought: That alſo which Saint Paul deſcribeth thus: This is the will of God, even your ſanctification, and that ye ſhould abſtain from fornication, that every one of you ſhould know how to poſſeſſe your veſſel in holineſſe and honor, and not in the luſts of concupiſcence, &c. From which which exact perfection, looke how farre our conſcience truely awaked doth tell us we are wanting, even ſo far accurſed ſtand we before the Lord, for not fulfilling all, if we had not a Saviour.

Queſt. Is there any puniſhment outward appointed to this Law?

Anſw. No, and that becauſe man cannot judge the guilt of hidden heart. But it ſufficeth to feare any man that feareth any thing, to conſider that the ſpirituall puniſhment allotted unto it, as to the reſt, is eternall death, and endleſſe torture both of body and ſoule for evermore in flame of laſting fire. Onely one ſtory, that I remember, there is recorded of ſome outward execution upon an inward thought, and that is of Glaucus King of Sparta, who for conceiving but a thought to retaine Mileſius his pledge committed to his keeping, yet not doing it, was utterly deſtroyed both he and his, and ſo foretold by the Oracle, whereat he asked counſell. Herodotus.

The Application.

LEt us weigh now well what hath beene ſaid, I beſeech you, and never ſpare to ſpeake, or feare to confeſſe, if not openly before the world, yet ſecretly in our hearts to the Lord, what due regard of paſſed courſe, compared with this Law, ſhall make us ſee. Though we were able (which yet never any could but Jeſus Chriſt) to ſtand clear before the Lord in al the former precepts, either for deed or thought, yet are we never able to ſay wee are cleare of this. For conſider, hath there never thought, but good, crept into that heart of yours within, at no time ſince the day that you were firſt able to thinke a thought, till this preſent houre? Weigh it well. And what though you have never conſented to it (yet wo, wo unto us for conſent) we ſee nevertheleſs, by this law of God, that we are but gone. For here is condemned the very entrance and being of any vile conceit within us for any time, though upon ſome better wakening, we repell it, and abhorre it, and thruſt it away without his act. And who is able to ſay he never thought awry in the leaſt manner or meaſure that might be? Nay what conſcience crieth not, if it be a little rowſed, that in very fearefull manner and meaſure wee have all herein tranſgreſſed and offended? Call out our houſes and chambers, wherein and under which we have lived, aske the fields, the gardens, the wals and hedges, where we have often walked, ſummon the ſeats where we have ſate, examine the pillowes whereon our heads could take no reſt, what guilt againſt our hearts in this behalfe they well can witneſſe every one of them. Shall they not ſpeake firſt one by one, and then all with one conſent cry in the eares of the Lord with ſhriking ſound, that houres and dayes, moneths and yeeres, have we ſpent in toſſing and turning, in debating and ſcanning ſuch conceits and thoughts, as we would not for all that we enjoy were written in our foreheads? Fie, fie, the pleaſures that we have felt in this folly, nay in this impiety, how have they tickled us within, and made us laugh to our ſelves, rub our hands together, forget our meat, not heare what was ſaid about us, and ſuch like? How have wee longed to be at an end peradventure of ſome buſineſſe, that wee have been about, that wee might even fully debate the matter you know of, and play with the conceit thereof to our fuller pleaſure? Can we excuſe our ſelves, beloved? Doe I depaint out unknowne diſpoſitions unto you? O I ſay againe, beſide greater impieties, the follies, the toies, the trifles, the very babiſh fancies, that will and do ſteale upon us, will we, nill we, even when we are beſt occupied, and would not bee ſolicited in ſuch ſort. All which are breaches leſſer and greater, of this Law of our God, which requireth exact obedience and conjunction of all the motions of our minde, to his good will and liking. And if we had never fallen, wee ſhould never have felt them. Therefore to ſhut up this matter, for one whom I know better than I know any of you, I confeſſe a guilt, and a grievous guilt againſt this precept of my God, and I acknowledge damnation due if I ſhould be rejected: but the Lord I thanke, I feare it not, not that I have not ſinned, but becauſe my Chriſt hath not ſinned, and He is my juſtification, ſanctification and redemption, he is my ſtrength and my ſtony rock, both againſt the curſe of this Law, and all the reſt, He is my defence and my Saviour, my God, and my might, in whom I do truſt, my buckler, and the horne of my health, and my refuge. And to him in the true ſenſe of my weakneſſe, and with the knees of my heart bowed downe to the duſt, I ſay for my caſe, as David ſaid for his, Turne 1 Cor. 1. Pſal. 18. 2.

away my heart, O Lord, that it may never feed upon the follies of vaine conceits, or grieve the ſweet ſpirit, that I ſometime feele by ungodly wandring from his ſugred motions. Yea ſet a watch before my ſoule, moſt gracious Father, and keep the dore of my ſtrengthleſſe heart, that I may leſſe offend, and more obey in this behalfe, than ever I have done heretofore. And now paſſe we unto particulars mentioned to our hands by the Lord himſelfe in this his Law. O my beloved, how often have we coveted our neighbours houſe, that is, his earthly poſſeſſion and inheritance, if not in whole, yet in part? How often have wee toſſed our heads from the one end of the pillow to the other, not able to ſleep, for thinking how to compaſſe that peece and this peece, not weighing how well hee might ſpare it, but how well it would fit us? Yea this houſe muſt be had, and that garden, and the other cloſe, to the wringing out of teares from the man, the wife, and all their poore children that part from it, to the grieving of their hearts, and the very utter undoing of them all. Wee ſtop not our eyes that they gaze no further upon our neighbours helps, than a Chriſtian ſoule may warrant. We ſhut not our eares, neither take regard of the ſinne that may enſue, when we are whiſpered in the eare, that this thing is fit for us, and that thing, and thus and thus may be had. No, alas, we account them the beſt members about us, whoſe godleſſe counſell ſhall worke our endleſſe woe. Whereas a Chriſtian, as ſoone as he heareth ſuch a motion, ſhould by and by think in himſelfe, O Lord thou haſt dealt mercifully with me ever, let not me now deale unmercifully with any: thou haſt made me a maſter of much, this man a maſter but of a little. O Lord let not my much eat him out of his little ungodlily, let not my power oppreſſe his weakneſſe, &c. And then talke with the informer, be it either a man, or mine owne greedy eye, that hath ſpied it, and ſee whether what I may get I may well get, and well take into my hands, ſo as I may not be ſtinged for it another day before my God, nor exclaimed upon juſtly in the world. This doth your owne conſcience tell you, you ſhould do, and the other you ſhould not do, yet the other have you done, and this have you not done; and are you not guilty? Good beloved, go with me in this triall of our ſelves, and let us ſee ſinne to be ſin. The looking eye, and the luſting heart further after our neighbours wife, than they ſhould, would God they accuſed us not. What ſhould I ſay of his ſervant, man or maid? You know it as well as my ſelfe, there is almoſt no conſcience any where ſhewed in this behalfe, no feare of God, no love of man, but only of our ſelves: For if we like another mans ſervant, for any quality that we deſire to be ſerved withall, what enticements, what allurements dare wee uſe to draw him to us? What offers make we, what practiſes deviſe wee, till we have them? Yet (ſaith this Law) Thou ſhalt not covet thy neighbours ſervant, man or maid: And that is, as now wee know, not once think of it, although I conſent not to it. The like is ſaid of his Oxe, his Aſſe or any thing that is his. And yet wee ſee the world, ever in our eye, Vicinum pecus grandius uber habet: Our neighbours Cow doth give more milke than ours. His horſe we muſt have there is no remedy, his hawke, his hound, his pleaſure or profit muſt bee ours, and that which is worſe, often without any conſideration any way, either by favour or value, yea it muſt be given out, that wee covet our neighbours goods, and we our ſelves have twenty pretty indirect and figurative kinds of begging, and if wee either are not underſtood, or will not bee underſtood by him that hath it, becauſe he is loth to loſe it, then we fret and are offended highly, and as our calling, might and power is, we fit upon his skirts. Thus ſin we may, deare beloved, againſt this Law of God, and yet we ſee it not. Now would God have us open our eyes, to encline our eares, and to forget this old fathers houſe of our corruption. Now would the Lord have us reconciled to him by repentance, and offended no more. And therefore I cry unto you in the name of the Lord, and to this ſoule within me, Thou ſhalt not covet. If we will heare his voice, & yet harden our hearts, if wee will not reſtraine our ſenſes, the common carriers of conceits into us, if wee will not even every way we can hereafter ſeeke to let and leſſen our diſobedience in this thing againſt the Lord, the day of our viſitation is paſt, and our deſtruction is at hand.

hand. The Lyon is come up from his den, and the deſtroyer of the Gentiles is departed and gone forth from his place to lay our Land waſte, and our Cities ſhall bee deſtroyed without an inhabitant. Yet ſo neare is our deſolation aſſuredly, my beloved, that even, as it were, preſently my ſoule heareth the ſound of the trumpet, and the alarm of the battell. Deſtruction upon deſtruction is cried even at our doores, if we could heare it, and ſuddenly ſhall our tents be deſtroyed, and our curtainees in a moment. But I hope for what I wiſh, and I wiſh what ſhall bee our ſure ſafety, if wee will be perſwaded, even that wee would now ſee how farre we are from ability to fulfill theſe ten Commandements of our God, either all, or any one of them, deviſe what diſtinction wee can, horrible ſinners and tranſgreſſors we are, and ſo wee ſhall bee found: and therefore that we would acknowledge it, lament it, fly to the propitiation appointed of our gracious God for our ſinnes, and onely cleave to him, onely truſt in him, and claſpe him in our armes, ſo as all the world, nor the power of hell can looſe our hold, carry him ſo to his Father, and there offer him to him for all our miſdeeds, as the ſalvation which hee hath prepared before the face of all people, and in whom hee is perfectly pleaſed. This wiſh I, this beg I, this crave I with all the bowels of my affection, my fleſh ſhaking, mine eyes watering, my ſoule groning, and all the ſtrings of my heart enlarged, as you feare God, as you love your ſelves, as my calling is regarded, as my affection eſteemed, or as hell trembled at, that Jeſus Chriſt may be our onely hold, and our owne obedience no hold, and yet performed as a fruit of faith, daily more and more, but not with hope of ſafety by the ſame, either in part or in whole: and this, O my God grant unto us as thy mercie is unmeaſurable, and thy goodneſſe and loving kindneſſe unſearchable: what paſſed is, good Lord forgive, and make us better ever live. Amen, Amen.

O how ſweet are thy words unto my throat, yea ſweeter than hony unto my mouth.

LONDON,
Printed by M. FLESHER.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE, HIS VERY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD, HENRY, EARLE OF PEMBROKE, LORD HARBERT of Cardiffe, Marmion, and S. Quintine, Lord Preſident of Wales, and of the Marches thereof, and of the moſt Honourable Order of the Garter, Knight : And to the Right Honorable and vertuous Lady, the Counteſs his Wife. G. B. wiſheth all Mercie and Comfort in CHRIST JESUS, both here now, and for ever.

CONſider the old generations of men, yee children, ſaid that wiſe Son of Syrach (Right Honourable, and my very ſingular good Lord) in his time, and marke them well. Was there ever any confounded, that put his truſt in the Lord? Or who hath continued in his feare, and was forſaken? Or whom did he ever deſpiſe, that called upon him? Agreeable truly to all Scriptures, and Experiences ever, if they were ſearched. For ſuch a thing is it to cleave unto the Lord with a faithfull heart, that the Bride may forget to trim her ſelfe the day ſhe is maried, and the Mother her Infant ſhe bare of her body, and eſteemeth full deare, before the Lord of Heaven can forget ſuch. The Lord knoweth the dayes of the upright men, and their inheritance ſhall be perpetuall. They ſhall not be confounded in perilous times, and in the dayes of famin they ſhall have enough. Though he fall, he ſhall not be caſt off, for the Lord putteth under his hand. The Lord ſhall exalt them, as themſelves ſhall ſee, and their end (ſaith the Prophet) ſhall be peace. Thouſands of comforts hath the Word mo, and yet theſe are both many and great ones, if we marke them. Gaine is not godlineſs (ſaith the Apoſtle) but Godlineſs is great gaine, and hath the promiſe both of this life, and that to come. Wherefore (Right Honourable) more joy in this, than in all the Earth, if it might be your owne. For the Earth muſt periſh, and all the gliſtering glory of it paſſe away as a tale that is told, burnt and conſumed, and melted with heat, but the feare of the Lord ſhall ſet her ſervants before the Higheſt, for ever and ever. Now did the Apoſtle ſay to King Agrippa before ſo many, O King Agrippa I know thou beleeveſt: Surely, I may ſay it before as many, I know (Right Honorable) your Lordſhip beleeveth both the Prophets and Apoſtles, and whatſoever the child of God is bound to beleeve unto ſalvation. I ſay I know it, and yet know I it not alone, but others with me, as well as I, attending your Lordſhip both in like and other places. And if we ſhould all deny it, yet would the world ſtep in and ſay, it knew what we denyed. God have the glory, to whom it is due, of his free election manifeſted both to your ſelfe and others, by a true Calling unto ſanctification. And it remaineth (Right Honourable) that with a ſpirit flaming with the thankfull love to ſo gratious a God, you let your light ſhine further to a greater glory to the Lord, and a fuller comfort to your owne ſoule. Performe your ſelfe therefore in all truth of heart, before the judging eyes of a mighty GOD ſtill more and more, as you doe already, an honorable maintainer and and furtherer of his truth. A ſhield and defence to all the godly in their griefes and diſtreſſes, carefull to have both your ſelfe and your family governed by the pretious and holy Word of God, maintaining and countenancing to that end, as moſt honourably you doe, both at home and abroad, the Lords poore ſervants, appointed to that miniſtery. Be a rare example ſtill, both worthy honouring and following of carefull beſtowing of thoſe livings whereof God hath made your Lordſhip Patron. Multiply as the Lord ſhall aſſiſt thoſe your Honors Zealous prayers, which ſome can witneſs for the peace of Hieruſalem, that her righteouſneſs may breake forth as the light, and ſalvation as a burning Lamp. And ſtill ſay with the Prophet David, we wiſh you good lucke, yee that be of the houſe of the Lord. Your Honorable ſervices for a moſt gracious Soveraigne as ever the earth had any, and for your deare Country, let them ſtill, as they are, bee moſt ſweet and joyfull to you. In your honourable place and government, carry your zeale as your L. doth, even more and more againſt the incorrigible adverſaries of Judah and Benjamin, to note their doings, to obſerve their drift, and to overthrow their plots. Cut off ſtill with your ſword of holy Iuſtice, as with exceeding travell your Lordſhip moſt honourably doth, thoſe contentions, diſorders and offences, that corruption both breedeth and feedeth overmuch. And finally, as the Apoſtle ſaith, if there be any vertue, if there be any praiſe, to God or to Prince, to Countrey, or to any, Right Honourable, thinke of that. For ſo ſhall your Lordſhip eſtabliſh your ſelfe both in earth and in heaven, both here and for ever. Yee your ſelfe and your ſeed, as the former promiſes have given aſſurance. And ſo ſhall you to your God and your ſelfe, and as many as know your vertues, ſtand approved ever, whatſoever either ignorance or unkindneſs may effect in ſome. Without this courſe and care in a meaſure as the Lord ſhall give, well may a world continue a while flattering and fawning with many delights, God being patient and forbearing long, but the end is deſtruction, death and confuſion, God being juſt and paying at laſt. Your ſelfe Madam ſtill more and more, as your Ladiſhip doth, partake with your owne, what your place permitteth in theſe Honourable actions, and make them alſo your owne. Let it ſtill be your honourable, juſt, and true praiſe, that you feare the Lord, that you love his truth, favour his followers, and abhorre his foes. For there is no praiſe ſhall continue as this, there is no wiſdome that may be compared to it. The feare of God is the beginning of wiſdome, a good underſtanding have all they that do thereafter, the praiſe of it endureth for ever. Againe, let this be your wiſdome, ſaid the Lord of heaven to that people once, even to heare my words, and worke my will with a carefull heart. For then ſhall all Nations ſay, you onely are wiſe, and you onely have knowledge of the beſt courſe. Let it be your Poſie (Right Honourable) as pleaſant as ever it was: And now Lord what is my hope truly, my hope is even in thee: Though the Lord ſhould kill me, yet will I put my truſt in him. And let the plaine Prophet ſtrengthen your Ladiſhip ſtill by his words to King Aſa and all Iudah. The Lord is with you, while yee be with him, and if you ſeeke him, he will bee found of you, but if you forſake him, he will forſake you. The like hath dying David to his deere Sonne to be left behind him: And thou Salomon my Sonne, know the God of thy father, and ſerve him with a perfect heart, and a willing minde. For the Lord ſearcheth all hearts, and underſtandeth all the imaginations of thoughts. If thou ſeeke him he will be found of thee, but if thou forſake him he will caſt thee away for ever. But what ſpend I ſpeech, I know it well. Then ſtay I ſo, and to you both (Right H.) I adde but this, that as duty bindeth, and many great and honourable favours both to me and mine require and charge me, I reſt before my God in Prayer, that goeth out of unfained lips, that it may be thus with your Honors both: ſtill I ſay, and thus more, thus more againe, and thus ſtill, and thus both ſtill and more continually during life. That thoſe words of endleſſe comfort may reach unto you in the judging day, Come yee bleſſed of my Father, and poſſeſſe eternall ioy. If this poore travell of mine may availe any thing to this effect, it is your Honors owne, proceeded from your owne moſt deeply bound for ever to be your owne, and therefore bold to preſent it in this ſort, becauſe he is your owne. It was begun in your Honors hearing, being that part of the Catechiſme that then fell to my courſe, both the Law and Faith having beene expounded before; the one by my ſelfe, the other by my fellow that followed: and becauſe it could not at that time be

Who all ſhall welcome it by thus much more (as they did the other) by how much it bringeth countenance from your Honors both unto them, and is a gift derived even from your ſelves unto them. The Chriſtian Reader elſe whoſoever, I ſhould wrong too much, if I ſhould not comfortably hope he will accept it well; ſince already he hath ſhewed his love in the like reſpect. Therefore moſt humbly beſeeching you both (Right Honorable) to accept my duty, to weigh my heart, and to pardon my boldneſſe. A PROFITABLE EXPOSITION OF THE LORDS PRAYER: BY WAY OF QVESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Of Prayer in generality.

MAny things are ſpoken by many men of Prayer in generality, and gladly would I heare what you think convenient of the ſame: yet would I not preſcribe by any queſtions, for feare my want of judgement in asking, might procure in you any needleſſe anſwering.

Your care is very good, yet ſpare not to ſpeake, if I omit any thing whereof you would willingly heare. Truth it is, that much is ſpoken, and much may be ſpoken of this matter at large, but a few things may ſuffice us at this time, having fuller diſcourſes to go to when we will.

First then let us conſider, that Prayer hath a foundation even in our nature, as we are men, and is ſo taught us by the very inſtinct and teſtimony of reaſon and conſcience, that looke what or whomſoever we acknowledge and thinke to be God, that and the ſame we alſo willingly confeſſe ought to be prayed unto. For a perſwaſion of Godhead ſtandeth not without a confeſſion of Prayer due to the ſame. So we ſee in the fourteenth Pſalme, wherewith the deniall of God, which the foole maketh in his heart, is joyned an utter want of Prayer and invocation. Contrariwiſe, in the 139. Pſalme with the confeſſion of God, an carneſt, hearty, and often calling upon his name. So that a neceſſary conſequence the Spirit maketh it upon the confeſſion of a God, even by the inſtinct of nature to uſe Prayer to the ſame. And contrariwiſe, if we ſhould never pray, then neceſſarily muſt we be even in the number of thoſe fooles, which ſay in their hearts there is no God. Which if it were duly and effectually conſidered of us, it would rowze us aſſuredly out of our dead and damnable negligence in this behalfe, if there were any ſpirit of life and feeling in us, and cauſe us to acquaint our ſoules more often and earneſtly with this heavenly exerciſe. Fearing even with a great feare, the vengeance of ingratitude towards God for innumerable benefits, the plagues in hell due to Atheiſts, and ſuch as deny God, and the ſame amongſt men that of force muſt fall upon us, when being men, yet we abhorre from the very nature of man. All which three grievous conditions the want of Prayer forcibly proveth upon us, as now we ſee. Againe, the Apoſtle Saint Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romanes, teaching how the Gentiles doing by nature the things contained in the law, ſhew the effect of the law written in their hearts, is a witneſſe inſtead of many moe, ſufficient and be whileſt man hath mans being a thing compriſed in the Law, was then, is now, and ever ſhall be ſtrong, that to pray to God, nature, a thing ingrafted and planted of God in the ſame nature. And many other reaſons might be brought, but theſe ſuffice.

Secondly, let us conſider the neceſſity of this Chriſtian exerciſe of Prayer: which wee ſhall evidently ſee, if either we reſpect the Lord, our ſelves, or our brethren. For unto the Lord we know is due ever, and eternally, here, and in the world to come, praiſe and thankſgiving, and that is Prayer. Praiſe the Lord all ye people, for it is a good thing to ſing praiſes unto our God. O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is gracious, O thank the Lord of all Lords, &c. Yea, Let every thing that hath breath praiſe the Lord. And as long as I have any being, I will ſing praiſes unto my God. In the world to come, ſee the Scriptures: Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and which is, and

In the world to come. Luke 1.74,75. Oſea 14.3. Pſal.50.15. Prayer neceſſary in reſpect of our ſelves.

Unto the Lord is due obedience to his Commandements, if we be the Lords, for they are holy and juſt. But this is one, that we ſhould pray unto him; and therefore in reſpect of God Prayer is neceſſary: Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will heare thee, and thou ſhalt glorifie me, ſaith the Lord. And in another place, I have ſworn by my ſelfe, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteouſneſſe, and ſhall not returne, that every knee ſhall bow unto me, &c.

In reſpect of our ſelves Prayer is neceſſary, if either we conſider the manifold woes and ſorrowes, which at times ſhall nip our hearts, lying there, and even grating and grinding our inwards to powder by day and by night, till we have eaſed our ſelves by Prayer, and powred them into the lap of the Lord, with ſuit for comfort and redreſſe, or the infinite neceſſities of this wretched life, which albeit the Lord is merciſull and ready to give, even before wee doe aske, yet good reaſon we ſhould aske them, and ever bound to that gracious God, that upon aſking will vouchſafe to give them. What helliſh gripes of wringing woe doe we thinke the ſervant of God David felt, when over and over he mentioneth the ſadneſſe of his Soule? What Iob, when the arrowes of the Almighty did ſtick in him, the venome whereof did drinke up his ſpirit, and when the terrors of God did fight againſt him? when he ſhriked out with mournfull voice, what my ſhrinking hand doth ſhake to pen: O that I might have my deſire, and that God would grant me the thing that I long for. And what was that? O fearefull! It followeth, That God would deſtroy me, that he would let his hand go, and cut me off. What the perſecuted Prophet, when he would ſo gladly die? What Ionas in the belly of hell, as he calleth it? And what thouſands, and ten thouſands of Gods children ever, and daily, and whileſt the world endureth? And how have they been eaſed? Doe we not ſee? Even by throwing themſelves at the feet of the Lord, and powring out by prayer their grievous complaints into the boſome of their gracious God, whoſe eare hearkened, whoſe heart pitied, and whoſe hand ever in his good time eaſed their ſhoulders from the burthen, to their great comfort.

Pſal.42. Chap.6. 1 Kings 19. Ionas 2.

Therefore Prayer in this reſpect we ſee moſt neceſſary. For the other we know the Scriptures alſo: Aſk (ſaith God) and you ſhall have: If having them be neceſſary in reſpect of wants, neceſſary is alſo asking: that is, praying in reſpect of having. So looke we at woes, or looke wee at wants, neceſſary in reſpect of our ſelves is Prayer.

Mat.7.7.

Goe we laſtly to our Brethren, and we are commanded to let our light ſhine before them, to their example and confirmation. Of which light this is a notable part and branch, our often, zealous, and religious prayer, and therefore in reſpect of them alſo neceſſary.

Prayer neceſſary in reſpect of our brethren.

Thirdly, the utility and profit of it would very duly and earneſtly of Gods children be conſidered, wherein the ſaying may have fit and proper place.

Prayer is profitable.

Æque pauperibus prodeſt, locupletibus æque:
Æque neglectum pueris, ſenibuſq; nocebit.

That is:

It gaineth good to poore and rich, if uſe thereof be free:
And hurteth youth as well as age, neglected if it be.

The Scripture wonderfully layeth downe the benefit of this holy exerciſe, not in one or two reſpects, but even in every thing, that may befall the childe of God in this life. In afflictions, as partly hath been ſhewed, it eaſeth the heart, it ſtayeth our ſteps, ſtill ready to ſlide into impatience, it perſwadeth the Lord, it winneth his mercy, and bringeth his gotten comfort at time appointed, to the panting Soule, all breathleſſe almoſt in the ſcortching heate of ſuch tryall, as pleaſeth God to ſend. And therefore pray (ſaith our Saviour Chriſt) continually, that ye may bee counted worthy to eſcape all theſe things, that ſhall come to paſſe, and that ye may ſtand before the Son of Man. But what things are they? O reade and conſider that ſingular Chapter, and ſee the fruit of Prayer. Falſe Chriſts ſhall come, and deceive, to their endleſſe woe, thouſands and thouſands, but pray we to God againſt this fearefull fall, and we ſhall eſcape. Warres and ſeditions ſhall be heard of, and ſeene, dreadfull and terrible, but pray to God and they ſhall not hurt us, no, not once make us juſtly afraid: Though it be Nation againſt Nation, Kingdome againſt Kingdome: though the earth ſhake and tremble in divers places, and we ſee hunger and peſtilence, and fearefull things, and great ſignes in heaven above us, yet pray we to God our guide and ſtrength, and wee ſhall eſcape. If hands be laid upon us, perſecuted and taken, and delivered up to the Synagogues and Priſons, and brought before Kings and Rulers for the Lord Ieſus ſake, pray we to the ſame our gracious God, and his word is paſt, theſe ſhall all turne unto us for a teſtimoniall, and not hurt us. If we want learning, knowledge or utterance, ſo that we feare of a truth any weake defence, pray we to him, that in weakneſſe is ſtrong, and the power he promiſed, both of ſpeech and knowledge, ſhall bind the very devil that he cannot ſtir, and with the head the members, with the Captaine the ſoldiers, with their life all the limbes, ſo that not all the kingdome of perdition, if their force could be joyned againſt the pooreſt man or woman of us, that ever ſhall profeſſe Ieſus, ſhall be able to reſiſt or ſpeake againſt us. Let our deare Parents that brought us into this world, ſeeke by cruell violence in hatred againſt a truth, to throw us out of the ſame againe, and our owne brethren, kinſmen, and friends betray us, and kill us, if it pleaſe God, we being hated even of all men for the Lord Ieſus ſake, pray wee ſtill ſtedfaſtly unto our God, and if he be the Lord that hath made the heaven and earth, whoſe word is truth, and abideth for ever, there ſhall not one haire of our head periſh, but in patience comfortably we may poſſeſſe our ſoules. Let Hieruſalem be beſieged, that is, our native land and Countrey, our Townes and houſes in which we dwell, a token that deſolation is neere: let the heavy woman ſo great with childe begin to ſigh for her ſelfe, and weepe with woe for her deare birth within her, with ſhivering ſhrinke, to thinke of bloody ſpeare to ſpit her ſprawling Babe upon, let our nation and people diſobeying the Lord in the time of peace, fall upon the edge of the ſword, and be caried captive into all Countries, and our ſtately Cities, Caſtels and Townes be troden unto duſt, yea, let the Sunne, and the Moone, and all the Starres of heaven threaten by their fearefull ſignes, the approching dreadfull wrath of God to men, trouble and perplexity be upon earth, the Sea and the waters roare, and mens hearts faile them for feare, looking after thoſe things that ſhall come upon the world, the very powers of heaven being ſhaken, and the Son of man appearing in the clouds with mighty power and glory, yet let us pray with a chearefull voice, and ſend out our Faith to the Lord of life, as we are ever bidden, and amidſt all theſe feares and terrors, otherwiſe to be trembled at day and night, we ſhall have no cauſe at all to feare, but even contrariwiſe, to lift up our heads toward heaven, as men and women beholding with eyes their eternall deliverance, everlaſting comfort, and unſpeakable joy drawing neare unto them, to remaine with them, and they in it for ever. O prayer then availeable with God, and profitable to men! There needeth no more to declare the fruit of it; and yet much more remaineth to be ſpoken. For when in theſe dreadfull times many ſhal have their hearts oppreſſed with ſurfeting and drunkenneſſe, and the cares of this life, and ſo that day of death and doome come upon them unawares, Prayer in watching ſhall preſerve Gods choſen, that they ſhall be counted worthy to eſcape all theſe things, and not onely ſo, but as followeth, with comfort: even to ſtand before the Sonne of Man, that is, in cheare, in joy, in ſpirituall motions of heart, not to be expreſſed by man, to enter into the heavenly and everlaſting Tabernacles. Lord then for thy mercy teach us to pray, that theſe bleſſings promiſed to the ſame may light upon us. I ſtay the courſe that I might goe on in, for the profits of Prayer are innumerable. It ſanctifieth our mirth, it ſanctifieth our meates, and they are neither of them holy, but in this. We awake, and we worke, we ſleepe, and we reſt in peace, if we faithfully pray. If we pray with Iacob, we proſper with Iacob in our journey: If we pray with David, we have our heads covered with David in the day of battell. If we pray with the Father, we have our ſon healed: if we pray with the Mother, we have our daughter healed: If we pray with the Maſter, we have our ſervant healed. And what ſhould I ſay? Cornelius praying, hath Peter ſent unto him, and the holy Ghoſt powred upon him: Hannah praying, hath a childe given her: and to conclude, there is no end of the tale, nor meaſure of Gods mercies, if we ſpeake of the fruits of Prayer. This knew well the godly Father S. Chryſoſtome, and therefore he ſaith, if thou deſireſt to live ſingle, or in holy Matrimony to Gods content, pray: if thou deſireſt to bridle anger, and with meeknеſſe to be familiar, pray: if thou deſireſt to be free from the fret of envy, or to doe any thing that belongeth to a godly life, pray, and pray heartily; pray, and pray often; pray, and pray faithfully; and the Lord ſhall grant thy Prayer. For it is armatura inexpugnabilis, an armour of proofe againſt all and every aſſaulting dart of the devill, or his members and meanes whatſoever. So profitable is Prayer we ſee. The Lord in Mercy give us ſpirits.

Amen, I beſeech him. Yet ſee the poyſon of Satan in his members, againſt this fruitfull exerciſe: for there want not wits in this wicked world, that dare diſpute againſt it, and aſk how it may bee, that we ſhould fitly aſk of the Lord by prayer any thing, ſince without asking, and before asking, he knoweth what we want and would have, yea, ſo fully knoweth he all things, that he needeth no remembrancer to put him in minde of any thing: and therefore why ſhould we aſk or ever pray, but leave the Lord to himſelfe to give what pleaſeth him?

Truth it is that thus they reaſon, but I truſt you ſee the impiety of their ſpeech, and the blindneſſe of their hearts: for it is an old rule and a true, that ſubordinata non pugnant inter ſe: Things that are compriſed one in another, are not contrary one to the other: and ſuch are Gods foreknowledge of all things, and our asking, notwithſtanding by Prayer what we want. For in his owne perſon expreſſely in his word he hath commanded, notwithſtanding all this his divine knowledge of every mans eſtate, which he knew himſelf to know as wel as we, yet nevertheleſs that we would pray to him in our needs, and aſk if we ſhould receive at his hands. And therefore you ſee this is a marvell by the witneſſe evident of the Lord himſelfe, and our prayer is not not taken away in any reſpect by the Lords knowledge, but they implyed one under the other, ſtand and agree well both together. Then if you looke at the practice of Gods children, you may plainly ſee the ſame. For David confeſſing of the Lord, that hee did not onely know his wants, but his very thoughts, and that long before. Yet nevertheleſſe for all this knowledge in God, uſeth his owne duty commanded, and prayeth for his wants. Yea, our Saviour Chriſt (which may ſtand for many prooſes) in the ſame Chapter, biddeth us call upon our heavenly Father by prayer for our daily bread, that is, for all neceſſities, and yet telleth us that he knoweth already, and before that wee have need of theſe things. Elias the Prophet promiſed Ahab raine, not raſhly upon his owne head, but as privie to the Lords purpoſe, and certified of his will, and yet for all that, moſt earneſtly prayed he, crouching to the earth, and his face betwixt his knees, and ſeven times ſent his ſervant towards the ſea for it. Therefore let us know, and ſo conclude, although the Lord underſtand moſt fully and perfectly what wee would have before wee pray, yet hath himſelfe appointed this meanes to obtaine at his hands, notwithſtanding that his knowledge, and therefore we muſt uſe it ever, notwithſtanding the ſame, knowing that what his wiſdome hath joyned, as ſtanding and agreeing together, thoſe, mans wiſedome, mans folly, or Satans malice may not ſeparate, as diſagreeing, and one fruſtrating the uſe or profit of the other. And againe, that is no end of our prayer at any time, to admoniſh God of any eſtate of ours unknowne unto him, but we pray, notwithſtanding he knoweth already what wee want, to performe our obedience to his Commandement, and appointed meane to give glory to him, as the fountaine of all good, to teſtifie to the world our faith and truſt in him, and his promiſes to exerciſe our patience in ſtill yet expecting and asking, and for ſundry ſuch cauſes allowed and godly, and not to put him in minde, as one that knoweth not our deſires. Fond therefore I truſt you ſee this reaſon is againſt the uſe of Prayer.

True it is, I thanke God, and ſo let it fall. Yet give me leave to propound another to the ſame purpoſe, but I truſt of no greater force. They ſay thoſe things are not to be asked even of a man, much leſſe of the Lord, which he willingly, and of his owne accord is purpoſed to give: for that were not to honor, but rather to diſhonor, by craving where no need is. But whatſoever we want, the Lord is ready to give, and therefore we ſhould aske nothing.

Indeed of no greater force at all. For it offendeth even as the other did, in reaſoning of things ſubordinate one under another, and agreeing well together, as of things contrary to themſelves, and therefore taking away one another. The willingneſſe of God to grant our deſires, taketh not away our Prayer, but ſtrengtheneth our Faith to aske cheerfully, and therefore even then when he ſaith, you ſhall have, he ſaith alſo, aske by Prayer: then when he ſaith, I will heare, hee ſaith alſo, call upon me: and even then, when he promiſeth to be neare, yet hee mentioneth to whom, namely, to ſuch as pray unto him. And the eyes of the Lord are upon the juſt, and his eares are open to their prayers. Therefore even the Lord himſelfe being Judge, his purpoſe to grant taketh not away our obedience to aske: his ready willingneſſe to give, even before we aske, croſſeth not at all his Commandement nevertheleſſe to aske, and ſo neither our bounden duty to performe the ſame continually. But by all thoſe places of his fatherly readineſſe, and moſt mercifull willingneſſe to doo us good, as I have already ſaid, our Faith is ſtrengthened, our hearts encouraged, his goodneſſe ſhewed, and our obedience in this duty of Prayer confirmed greatly, not any way ſubverted or taken away.

Mat.7. Pſal.50. Pſal.145. Ioel 2.32. Pſal.34.16.

Well then, ſee now another device of Satan againſt this holy exerciſe. If we cannot take it away out of the uſe of men by theſe concluſions, let us try another way to make it vaine, and not only ſo to our ſelves, but even hatefull and abominable to the Lord. Let us aſcribe unto it merit of remiſſion of ſins, juſtification with God, many marvellous vertues above the dignity allowed in the Word, and finally to ſalvation. And to this end let us alledge all the places of Scripture wherein Prayer is commended highly, as if they meant thus highly.

Marke 9.29. Pſal 55.17.

Indeed you ſay very true, ſuch there are, and thus Satan perſwadeth. But alas what ſhould we ſtand upon it? It is one thing to be a meanes, and another thing to bee a cauſe of ſalvation and mercy. Gods children acknowledge no cauſe of their life with God, but Chriſt Jeſus only in whom the Lord hath freely loved us: but meanes many, as hearing, reading, faſting, and what we ſpeake of, Praying. Our prayers are acceptable to our God, but never for themſelves, but for Chriſt. They are availeable alſo with God, but by and for faith in Chriſt, whereof earneſt prayer joyned with faſting is a token. And therefore if we obtaine of God never ſo great matters by Prayer, our Prayer yet is no cauſe of that, but only a meanes. So then a fooliſh and falſe argument it is to cut it off, that thus reaſoneth of a cauſe that is not a cauſe indeed.

1 Cor.1.31. 2 Cor.5.18

I ſee well the foundation of Prayer even in nature. I ſee the neceſſity of it in reſpect of God, our ſelves, and our brethren: I ſee the marvellous and exceeding profit of it, and laſtly the malice of Satan againſt it in both extremities, either ſeeking to deface it as not required: or if he cannot that doe, in aſcribing unto it above that which is lawful, therby to make it fruitles with God. Will you now adjoyn any more?

It ſhall not be amiſſe alſo for us to conſider thoſe other points which be uſually conſidered in in these treatises, and compriſed for memory in an old verſe, to wit, Affectus, cauſæ, quis, per quem, quidque petendum: That is,

With what affection we muſt pray.
For what cauſes.
To whom.
Through whom.
For what.

And concerning the firſt, the Scripture teacheth us, that we muſt pray with a zealous ſpirit, with heart, with ſoule, and with all the power within us, not with cold affection and lip-labour. The Apoſtles ſpeech of the Spirit may give this rule of prayer in it ever to bee obſerved, Be fervent in prayer. The Lord himſelfe by his Prophet complaineth, that the people cryed not in their hearts unto him, that is, with this affection that we ſpeake of. And the ancient Ceremonies of lifting up of the hands remembreth us thereof. The Spirit of God witneſſeth it of his children, as of Hannah, ſhe prayed and wept ſore, troubled in her minde that her lips ſhooke withall, albeit ſhe ſpake in her heart. Of Moſes, that he cryed unto the Lord, and yet he ſpake never a word, but ſo vehement was his ſpirit, and ſo fervent his inward powers of ſoule and heart, that it was like a ſhrill ſhrike in the eares of the Lord. This heat of heart, it is glorious before the Lord, and profitable to us: but it is not at our Commandement, wee cannot have it when we will, the Lord hath reſerved it to himſelfe to give, when, and where, and to whom, and in what meaſure it pleaſeth him. As it is witneſſed unto us by the Apoſtle, ſaying: The Spirit helpeth our infirmities: for we know not what to pray as we ought: but the Spirit it ſelf maketh requeſt for us with ſighs, which cannot be expreſſed. That is, we are not able of our ſelves to pray with that ferventneſſe of ſpirit, that heat of heart, ſuch motion of minde, ſuch truſt, ſuch faith, ſuch ſighs, ſuch power, ſuch affection, in a word, every way as is convenient to the Majeſty of God, unleſſe we be enabled by his Spirit; and therefore in mercy he ſupplyeth with the ſame as pleaſeth him. Nevertheleſſe, meanes there are in the word noted unto us, which worke under the bleſſing of this Spirit to this effect in meaſure in us: and therefore if this affection be required in us, they be alſo neceſſary as helpers to the ſame.

Affection required in prayer. Rom.12. Hoſ.7.14.

1 Sam.1.10.13. Exod.14.15.

Rom.8.26.

The firſt, is a true conſideration of our owne unworthineſſe and dignity, ſuch and ſo great, as that there is no mercy due unto us: Such as maketh us with the Publican not to will to lift up our eyes to heaven, but to knock our breaſt, and cry in humble ſort, Good Lord be mercifull unto me a ſinner. Such as maketh us with the Centurion to ſay, Lord I am not worthy that thou ſhouldeſt come under my roofe, and therefore, ſay but the word, and my ſervant ſhall be well. Such again as maketh us with Daniel to ſay in ſmarting woe, O Lord we do not preſent our ſupplications before thee for our owne righteouſneſſe, but for thy great tender mercies. With David, O Lord enter not into judgement with thy ſervants, for no fleſh living ſhall be juſtified in thy ſight. With Eſay, We have all been as an uncleane thing, and all our righteouſneſſe is as filthy clouts, and we all doe fade like a leafe, and our iniquities like the winde have taken us away. With Ieremy, O Lord though our iniquities teſtifie againſt us, deale with us according to thy name, for our rebellions are many, and we have ſinned againſt thee. And finally, ſuch as may juſtly make our ſoules vexed within us when wee thinke of it, our bodies to bow downe and goe crookedly, and our eyes to faile, as he ſpeaketh. This low conceit, but true conceit of our ſoules, marvellouſly quickneth up our ſpirits, and therefore is ever to be uſed, and our ſoules prepared thereunto by ſome fit meditation of it before prayer. This wanted the proud Phariſie, and therefore his prayer ſheweth no zeale nor heate, as the humble heart that commeth creeping to the Lord in humility, confeſſing griefe for ſin, and ſpeaketh as one doth to him that hath no cauſe to give, but great and many to withhold. Ever therefore be carefull of this, to keep upon your ſoule, as upon a tree that you would have grow abroad and large, but not high, a weight of her owne true unworthineſſe, and certainly you ſhall finde the power of it, in quickning affection when you pray, great.

2. The ſecond meanes is a true conſideration of the things that we aske for, how profitable, expedient, and good for us they are, how bad we are without them, &c. By which things there ſhall grow in our hearts an heat and prayer for them more earneſt, and if this be wanting, we pray in an order and a forme, but zeale is away foraſmuch as we know no great hurt, if we ſpeed not, and if our words be more vehement than the true and ſimple deſire of the things prayed for doth procure, it is mockery, ſuch as the Lord will puniſh. And therefore let this be another Chriſtian meanes carefully uſed ever as we may in our prayers, to worke a right affection in us, even ſo much as ever we can, to conſider of the things we want and aske, before we ask them.

3. Then when we ſee theſe two, to wit, our unworthineſſe to receive, and the benefit of the gift, let the third be a true view of the want of any under meanes in this world, to compaſſe our deſire by, or if we have any, as friends, riches, and ſuch like, yet the great inability that is in them all, unleſſe the Lord ſay Amen, give his bleſſing to their labours, and proſper their endeavours for us. For thus againe will grow a ferventneſſe in our affections, and a right godly zeale in our prayers. Yea, the more empty that we come before the Lord in this reſpect, the more life hath our prayers alwayes. For he that in truth doubteth his helpe at home to be ſufficient, his ſuit for reliefe abroad will be more earneſt. He that ſecretly ſhrinketh to the conceit of the power of any ſecond cauſe whatſoever to give him any good by, and cleaveth not only to the Lord, in a Chriſtian renunciation of all the meanes in this world, further than hee will vouchſafe to bleſſe them, his prayer ſhall be cold, and more frozen, as reſting upon other matters as well as upon his prayer, and if he ſpeed, never ſo thankfull to the Lord neither. Therefore you ſee a third care of the Childe of God, if he have his prayers pithy, even to empty his heart of all ſuch earthly lading as we have ſpoken of, to goe to his knees, either without them indeed, or without any truſt and confidence in them, further than the Lord ſhall ſtrengthen them to him and for him.

4. A fourth is an eye to the ſweet promiſes of God, concerning the ſuits of his Children to him, which are ſo many, and ſo entire, as no heart, if it be not flint or ſteele, but muſt receive comfort and courage to ſpeake unto ſuch a Lord. Ask and you ſhall have: ſeek and you ſhall finde: knock and it ſhall be opened unto you. Yea, whatſoever you ſhall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you. Call upon me and I will heare you: Come unto me and I will refreſh you: Whoſoever ſhall call upon the Lord ſhall be ſaved. And a thouſand ſuch like. Muſe upon them till the fire be kindled within you, and then ſpeake with a ſpirit to ſo ſweet a God as ſo cheereth his children to pray heartily. And remember it often what once was ſaid: I will come into thy houſe even upon the multitude of thy mercy, and in thy feare will I worſhip toward thy holy Temple. The multitude of Gods mercies make a ſweet entrance into the houſe of Prayer: Yea, ſay you with David joyfully and comfortably, In Gods word will I rejoyce, in the Lords word will I comfort my ſelfe, in God have I put my truſt, I will not feare what man can doe unto me.

Other meaner helpes alſo there be of affection not to be contemned of the godly, as to ſpeake and pronounce our prayers with words: for ſometimes our weakneſſe is great, and our mindes begin to ſtray from our prayer conceived in ſilence, and then it ſhall be good to ſpeake out, yea, even to cry out that which wee but thought before, to the end that ſo we may ſtay a ſtarting minde, and bring it to the ſound of the tongue. This hath been a wiſdome of the godly ever, and a meane as we reade to helpe them. The Prophet David ſaith, I cryed to the Lord with my voice and I ſaid, thou art my hope and my portion in the land of the living. So that he uſeth the pronuntiation of words, and happily even for this cauſe that we ſpake of. S. Auguſtine ſaith, Devotio noſtra voce excitatur, our devotion and affection is ſtirred up and quickned by the voice. And experience ſerveth for longer proofe in this matter. The geſtures of body, as kneeling, lying proſtrate upon the earth, knocking of the breaſt, and covering the face, or turning to the wall, lifting up the eyes, and ſuch like, they are helps alſo of affection. Yea, then are they lawfull, and right indeed, when they ſerve to this purpoſe in ſincerity, and not to any outward ſhew in hypocriſie. And thus much of them.

Pſal. 142. 1. 6.

Now on the other ſide, as theſe be helpes under God to quicken up our ſpirits in prayer, if we be dull, and to make us pray zealouſly and earneſtly: ſo are there impediments alſo that hinder us and make us that we cannot pray with ſuch affection as we ought. As the contraries of theſe that I have ſpoken of, a proud heart puft up with conceit of merit, and ignorance, or at leſt not a through conſideration of the thing or things we beg, a leaning to ſecond cauſes overmuch, a dulneſſe in the ſeeking of Gods promiſes, and ſuch like, which I may not now over again follow at large. One great let only will I touch, and ſo conclude this point, and that is ignorance of the ſpeech or tongue wherein we pray: Which I call even a great let, becauſe it not only hindreth our affection and zeale, but otherwiſe dangerouſly hurteth us by keeping from us a ſingular fruit of our prayer, as will appeare.

This great folly then of many in the world that delight to pray in a ſtrange tongue, and not only ſo, but boldly (to ſay no worſe them) defend that they can pray with as right an affection thus, as otherwiſe, hath firſt God againſt it in his word moſt plainly by the voice of S. Paul the Apoſtle, who ſaith flatly, no man heareth their prayers that are ſo made, no man heareth them I ſay, and marke the words well. The Apoſtle meant not but that the ſound of that unknowne voice entred into their eares, but becauſe it entred without underſtanding, therefore it was in truth then, is now, and ever ſhall be no hearing indeed, that is no good hearing, no profitable hearing, no commanded or allowed hearing. And therefore if it be a duty enjoyned of God that his people ſhould be made partakers of Common Prayers by hearing what is ſaid, then is it alſo evident as they ought to bee in a ſtrange tongue, foraſmuch as in this place the Spirit of truth telleth us, ſuch prayers are not heard at all indeed, as are not underſtood when they are heard.

1. Reaſon.

2. Reaſon.

Secondly, if the Pipe or Harpe bee not underſtood for want of diſtinction in the ſounds, the hearer is without benefit of that ſound, and the Inſtrument is not uſed as it ought to bee, even ſo, if the tongue wherein prayers are powred forth to the Lord bee not underſtood, the the hearer of that ſound is without profit, and that ſound is not well uſed in that order. The Trumpet alſo uſed to ſignifie unto Souldiers when and how to prepare themſelves to the Battaile, if it give an uncertaine ſound, there is no preparation made: even ſo againe is the tongue or ſpeech which wee uſe in Prayer, the meanes to ſtirre us up to that ſpirituall exerciſe, and to performe the ſame, and therefore if it be not underſtood, it leaveth us wronged as did the other, and the duty required of us is not done. Unleſſe we can ſay, that Souldiers that heare the Trumpet and not withſtanding what it meaneth, runne every man his way from his fellow, doe well.

Thirdly, the holy prayers of the Church ought not to bee ſpoken into the winde that is in vaine. But ſo they are (ſaith the Lord) if they be made in a tongue that is not underſtood, and therefore they ought not to be ſo. — 3 Reaſon. Verſe 9.

Fourthly, neither ſhould the Miniſter bee a Barbarian to his people in the houſe of GOD and duty of Prayer, that is, one that is not underſtood, and therefore might as well hold his peace as ſpeake, neither ought any man or woman privately be ſo to themſelves: But except we know the power of the voyce, ſaith the Scripture, that is, except we underſtand what is prayed, that is ſo, namely, both he a Barbarian to us, and we to our ſelves: therefore the tongue ſhould not be unknowne to us. — 4 Reaſon. Verſe 11.

Fifthly, if we pray in a ſtrange tongue, our underſtanding is without profit and fruit, ſaith the Apoſtle, and that ought not to be ſo. But when we pray we ought to pray with our ſpirit and with our underſtanding, alſo we ought to ſing with our ſpirit and with our underſtanding alſo. Therefore we may not pray in a ſtrange tongue. — 5 Reaſon. Verſe 14. Verſe 15.

Sixthly, our prayers ought to bee ſo made that all the company may anſwer, Amen, but if they be in a ſtrange tongue, ſaith the ſame Scripture againe, he that occupyeth the place of the unlearned cannot ſo anſwer, becauſe he knoweth not what thou ſayeſt. Therefore they ought not to be ſo. — 6 Reaſon. Verſ. 16.

Seventhly, the Apoſtle propoundeth himſefe for an example, and ſaith, that notwithſtanding he was able to ſpeake more languages than they all, yet had he rather in the Church ſpeake five words with his underſtanding, that he might alſo inſtruct others, than ten thouſand words in a ſtrange tongue. And what care thinke we ſhould be in us to follow his practice? Shall he be the dear one of the Lord in ſo doing, and we ſo alſo in having no ſuch care nor conſcience, but even flat contrary, to ſpeake rather ten thouſand words that we doe not know, neither profit other by, than five that doe both? Let us conſider it, and ſetting aſide all froward wilfulneſſe & damnable prejudice of a truth, take heed betimes. Prayer is a ſweet obedience to the Lord, if it bee aright, make it not a diſobedience to his will your ſelfe by doing it wrong. Many are the bleſſings promiſed to it, turne not thoſe bleſſings into a curſe, by a ſtubborne heart that will not bee inſtructed. — 7 Reaſon. Verſe 10.

Laſtly, we edifie not our ſelves by ſuch unknowne prayers, which yet we ought to doe, as well in our private exerciſe, as the publique Miniſter his whole people in a publique place, all things being commanded of God privately and openly to bee done to edifying, and the reaſon being all one, namely, our benefit and theirs before the Lord, therefore we ſhould not uſe them. — Verſe 8. Verſe 26.

Thus is the Lord againſt it, and his Word. Let us now conſider men, and in them either their practice or their judgement, and ſee if this kinde of praying may be warranted that way. — The practice of the godly againſt this error.

Concerning the firſt then, may we finde any Patriark or Prophet, any ſervant of God whatſoever, either in the Old Teſtament, or New, that uſed thus to pray in a ſtrange tongue? No, no, it is well knowne that from the very Creation of man, till the corruption of Rome infected the Church, there is not one to be produced, that either being a Miniſter of Common Prayer, made it in a tongue that the people knew not, or being a private man, prayed privately hee wiſt not what. Not one Prophet, not one Apoſtle, not one man or woman of holy memory in the Booke of God, that ever uſed it: & yet they prayed as often, as much, as zealouſly, as fruitfully, and as commendably, as we I trow, yea happy wee if we were like them. And is it nothing to leave the example of all theſe Saints, and to goe a courſe that not one of them ever practiſed? Is there like comfort in a thing never uſed, and ever uſed of Gods choſen? How then are ſome bewitched in ſmall matters to relie upon examples, and ever to be ſpying and prying into the wayes and workes of weaker men ten thouſand parts, and yet in this matter ſo weighty and great to caſt behinde them the practice of ſuch great ones, and never to regard it? For the publike prayers of the Church, it hath ever moved me ſince I knew it, what I ſee recorded by indiffrent men in this behalfe.

Saint Hierome ſpeaking of the pompe of Paulaes funerall in his Epitaph hee made of her, and ſhewing what concourſe was to it of people of divers languages, plainly layeth it down that every one had the tongue they underſtood in their common prayers, & not a ſtrange one. And yet none of them was either Hebrew, Greeke, nor Latine, which ſome count only holy, but the Syriack. S. Auguſtine willing the Prieſts to apply their ſtudy to correct the errors of their latine — Their judgement againſt it. Cap. 12. ad finem.

speech in those dayes, addeth this reason: Vt populus ad id quod planè intelligit dicat, Amen: That the people to that which they fully understand, may answer, Amen. Note the custome of the Church then, and the faithfull care of this godly Father for the people, that no let might bee to their understanding of the common prayers. The same Father againe in another place saying, that we need not any utterance of words alwayes to pray unto God, because the Sacrifice of Justice is sanctified in the temple of the minde, and in the secret chambers of the heart, by and by objecteth to himselfe, Wherefore then doth the Priest lift up his voice, and pray aloud in the open assembly in the Church, and then answereth to the same thus, Not that God, but that men may heare him, and that the people by the sound of his voice and understanding of his meaning, may be put in minde, and by consent joyned together, and lift up to God. Againe hee saith, Quid prodest loquutionis integritas, quam non sequitur intellectus audientis? Cum loquendi omnino nulla sit causa, si quod loquimur non intelligunt, propter quos ut intelligant, loquimur. What profit is there in speech be it never so perfect, if the understanding of the hearer cannot attaine it? For there is no cause why we should speake at all, if they understand not what we speake, for whose sake we speak that they may understand us. Again, Mens mea sine fructu est, hoc ait, quando id quod dicitur, non intelligitur. My minde is without fruit (this the Apostle S. Paul saith) when the thing that is spoken is not perceived. And again, Si intellectum mentis removeas, nemo ædificatus audiendo quod non intelligit. Set apart the understanding of the minde, and no man hath fruit or profit of the thing that he perceiveth not. Quid opus est jubilare & non intelligere jubilationem, ut vox nostra sola jubilet & cor non jubilet? Sonus enim cordis intellectus est. What needeth us to sing if we understand not what we sing, to sing with our voice and not with our heart? For understanding is the sound or voice of the heart. These are most plaine testimonies, and worthy consideration, if we desire a truth.

In Psalm. 99.

Origen againe very plainly saith of such things as are read in the Church. Non fuisset necessarium legi hæc in ecclesia, nisi ex his ædificatio aliqua audientibus preberetur. It should never need to reade them unlesse some edification should come by them to the hearer. But without understanding we know not what edification is, and therefore Origens judgement is openly this, that if Scriptures and Prayers should be in a strange tongue, then it were as good that there were never any at all of either of them. O marke it! Cyprian next as flatly againe, Not the sound of the voice, but the minde and understanding must pray unto the Lord with pure attention. But my understanding to pray and the language to be strange to me that I pray in, is impossible, therefore far was Cyprian from this folly. Saint Chrysostome againe the like, and many more, that I spare to name in this briefe Treatise.

Levi. cap. 7.

De orat. Dominì.

The favourers of Rome in latter dayes saw this truth, and yeelded their testimonies plainly for it. Lyra and Thomas of Aquin spare not to avouch it, that the Common Service in the Primitive Church was ever in the common vulgar tongue, that the people did understand. That earnest, and as some think, strong defender of the contrary to this, by the power of a truth, is drawne to these very words: That in the Primitive Church the prayers were made in a common tongue knowne to the people, for cause of their further instruction, and it was so necessary to be. And againe in another place: It were good the people having humble and reverent hearts understood the Service, I deny it not. And whereas they say they can as heartily, as earnestly, and with as vehement an affection pray, although they know not what they say, may they not see their owne Doctor say the contrary flatly, and a man of no common learning? Si populus intelligit orationem Sacerdotis, melius reducitur ad Deum, & devotius respondet, Amen. That is, If the people understand the prayer of the Priest, they are the better brought unto God, and with more devotion farre, answer, Amen. Now there is the same reason of their devotion openly, and of our owne privately. May they not see it plainly affirmed. Quomodo potest debitè Deo psallere qui non intelligit quid psallit? How can he rightly sing unto God that understandeth not himselfe that he singeth? as if he should say, it cannot be, it is impossible, and not to be hoped for.

Aug. præfat. in Psal.

Last of all, is it not an old saying grounded upon a true reason, Ignoti nulla est cupido? There is no desire of the thing which we know not, and no desire I thinke is a very cold affection.

Let us end then this point of the practise and judgement of men, with that Decree of Pope Innocent the third, in the Councell of Laterane, about the yeare of our Lord 1200. that in such Cities as should be concourse of people of divers nations, the Bishop should take order that every people should have a Pastor of their owne language, which might serve them, and minister unto them in the same. A thing very worthy observing, that even with the Pope himselfe the truth of this cause, that Prayers ought to bee understood should prevaile.

We have seen then God, and we have seen men against this great corruption and hinderance of our prayer, & men both in practice & judgement. What if we joyn now for conclusion of all, very open reason against it? It may doe good. For truly even this sticketh so deep in this behalfe, as any Christian heart may feare ever to come before the Lord with prayer in this order.

For

For is it not one,and a very ſingular uſe of our prayers,to ſtrengthen and frame our faith by the experience of mercies asked and received at our Gods hands? It working ever in us a truſt, a hope, yea,an unſpeakable comfort,that he will be as he hath beene,being no changeling in himſelfe,and that whom he hath heard ſo graciouſly, ſo readily, and ſo often, with grant of their deſires,thoſe he will ever heare,and ſtill heare in their right and lawfull prayers,to the praiſe of his mercy, and the joy of them his ſervants in their diſtreſſes. Now this ſingular uſe and profit as I ſay, of prayer are they deprived of, that uſe to pray in a ſtrange tongue, for if any particular benefit be given them,they know not whether it hath come at their intreaty, or no, becauſe they know not what they have prayed for,and ſo receive they no ſure and certaine teſtimony of the Lords help and goodneſſe to them, to the comfort of their hearts at all times when they ſhall need againe to call upon him.

And therefore if this be a bleſſing to have true experience, nay, thouſands of experiences of the Lords ſweet favour to us, then muſt it needs be a dangerous thing to our faith,that robbeth us of all and every triall of our God. Therefore let but even reaſon ſpeake in this cauſe, and it will conclude unto our conſciences thus, that foraſmuch as petitions knowne of us to bee made by us to the Lord, and of him granted to us, (which is done when wee underſtand our prayers) do ſtrengthen our faith in comfort ever to reſt upon the Lord,and the contrary(which is when we pray in a ſtrange tongue) doth weaken the ſame, and rob us of that comfort that groweth by experience, therefore it is profitable to pray in the one, and moſt dangerous to pray in the other.

Againe, is not the remembrance of Caligulas fact in this reſpect moſt fit, and preſſeth any honeſt minde in the world with ſight of fruitleſſe labour in ſuch kindes of prayers? Caligula the Emperour ſet golden loaves before his gueſts,and all other ſervices in forme of meats in beaten gold,and bade them eate. But their dainties were too hard, and for all that glorious ſhew they aroſe an hungred. And doth not this Romiſh practice in very like ſort ſet before the people of God, whoſe ſouls are deare to the Lord that made them,a gliſtering ſervice in Hebrew,Greeke, and Latine, and bid them feed? but alas, what ſhould they feed upon? A godly ſhew there is to ſtir up wonder and aſtoniſhment in the people,but to receive or taſte of,either to move them to repentance, or to comfort and quiet their conſcience they having nothing. And how paſſing well ſpeaketh Auguſtine in like caſe, Quid prodeſt clavis aurea ſi aperire quod volumus non poteſt? aut quid obeſt lignea ſi hoc poteſt? quando nihil quarimus niſi patere, quod clauſum erat? What availeth a golden key, if it cannot open that we would have opened? Or what hurteth a wooden key, if it be able to open? ſeeing we deſire nothing but that the thing that is ſhut may be opened? The wrong is apparent to the Church of God, though I ſay no more,but it paſſeth a frenſie for men and women in their private prayers to deale thus with themſelves. For I truſt to refreſh their hungry bodies, they would ſet no ſuch hard meat as gold before themſelves: and skilleth it not how it feedeth the ſoule that ſhould feed it,ſo it be glorious to the ſhew? O conſider it, and whoſoever ſeeke to ſtarve us, let us not be guilty of our owne ſpirituall death our ſelves.

De doctrina Chriſtiana. Lib.4.Cap.11.

Againe, if the bruite beaſts or birds diſcover this folly, let us not refuſe them. If they could ſpeake, as Democritus the Philoſopher ſometimes thought, and as Lactantius a Chriſtian writer ſeemeth partly to ſay,they doe: yet being birds and beaſts and voide of reaſon, they would not ſpeake they knew not what. The very ſenſe of nature therefore is againſt this folly. But let their ſound be a ſound without ſenſe and underſtanding, as Phinies Raven that could ſay Ave Cæſar Imperator, All haile Emperor Cæſar, or the Cardinals Popinjay that could pronounce diſtinctly all the Articles of the Creed, and yet knew not what they ſaid: ſhame wee not to bee like them? Having the gift of reaſon given us of God above all the creatures that he made, to diſtinguiſh us from them in the rule of all our actions? Let the old Father Saint Auguſtine ſpeake both for the cauſe and for this reaſon. Quid hoc ſit quod precati ſumus, intelligere debemus, ut humana ratione, non quaſi avium voce cantemus. Nam & meruli, & pſittaci, & corvi, & Picæ, & hujuſmodi volucres, ſæpe ab hominibus docentur ſonare, quod neſciunt. Scienter autem cantare naturæ hominis divina voluntate conceſſum eſt. What this is that we have praied, we muſt underſtand, that we may ſing with reaſon agreeable to a man, and not chatter with voice as birds doe. For Owſels and Popinjayes, and Ravens, and Pies, and ſuch like birds are often taught of men to pronounce that which they doe not underſtand. But to ſing with knowledge is given by God to mans nature. What teſtimony plainer, or reproofe more weighty may there be? But I forgot my ſelfe, and purpoſing but to touch matters, make too long abode in this thing.

In Pſal 13. Expoſit.

Conclude we then with an effectuall thought in our hearts as men and women that are not ſworne againſt the Lord,and paſt all recovery, whether ever any perſon in this world dared,or we our ſelves durſt ſpeake to an earthly man for a ſuite of weight belonging unto this body in this world,and know not what we ſay? O our care in the one, and careleſneſſe in the other, our feare in the one even over tittles & ſyllables,& our want of feeling in the other in large ſpeech, what a witneſſe will it beare againſt our ſoules before the Lord in that dreadfull day if wee take not warning and leaving betimes the way God condemned, man misliketh, reason reproveth, and very nature abhorreth, make choice of the other which in all these respects is commended, and by no meanes can ever doe harme? To day if we heare the truth, let us harden no hearts against it. Say not God is mercifull, and I hope the best, for as hee hath mercy, so commeth wrath from him when we are wilfull. Woe to the eare that will not heare, saith the Lord often. Larger discourses may be looked of, if need bee, this serveth for a taste of truth in a short Treatise.

Syrac.5. Verse 6. Yea Sir, but God understandeth whatsoever we say, in what tongue soever we speake, and that is sufficient.

No indeed. For can you affirme that prayer was ordained for God alone, or for us, to make our moane to God by also? if it were so, and is so, then ought wee as well to understand our selves, as the Lord to understand us. And is there no matter what wee speake, or how we speake, so that GOD understand us? Could we so content our selves toward a man? Let the one teach us in the other, and let desperate conclusions have deserved confusions before our eyes ever. Wee may as well reason against speech of tongue, because God knoweth our hearts, as against understanding of our prayers, because God understandeth them. But enough is said.

Goe you then to the causes of our prayers, which is next in order of our verse.

These have in effect also sufficiently beene touched already in this that hath beene spoken. For wee have heard causes in respect of our selves, and in respect of our brethren. Which you may turne back unto againe, if you will, and peruse all causes urgent and weightie of our prayers, that are. God hath commanded us to pray, God hath promised to heare us if we pray, threatens to punish us if we doe not: Our faith is then confirmed by it, our dangers prevented, our wants relieved, our love to the Lord increased, and our lives ordered to the example of Gods chosen, ever with such like, and these are great causes to use it.

Psa.50. Iohn 14.14. Psal.14. Luke 17.5. Mat.6.13. Psa.18.1.

What say you then of the third point concerning the persons to bee prayed unto?

I answer, that onely God, and none but God is to be prayed unto, or as the words of our faith and Creed hath, one God in Trinity, and Trinity in unity is to be worshipped.

Which answer implying two things as you see, to wit, that God is to be prayed unto, and onely to be prayed unto. Let us see the truth of them both out of the Word. First, then for the former it is mentioned as in the Law. Thou shalt feare the Lord thy God, and serve him, and sweare by his name. And in another place, Thou shalt feare the Lord thy God and serve him, and thou shalt cleave unto him and sweare by his name.

Deut.6.13. Chap.10.20.

With a number other proofes in every place where the word of serving the Lord by a figure noteth all duties due unto him in generall, and so implyeth this duty of prayer to him in speciall.

Even as David expoundeth it in his Psalme, saying, I will worship towards thy holy Temple, and then expresseth what one thing hee meaneth by that worship. I will praise thy name because of thy loving kindnesse and truth, that is, by prayer of thanksgiving, and praise I will doe my duty.

So then this is plaine, and more plaine I trust, then that wee should need proofe, that God is to bee prayed unto. If any would have reason as well as testimonies, the Apostle giveth us a strong one of contraries, hee toucheth the Galathians with it as a fault no lesse than Idolatry, that they did service unto them which by nature were no gods. For it inferreth plainly our not offending, but most right doing, when wee doe service unto him that is by nature God.

But prayer is a service, and a great service, therefore due and most due to the Lord for ever. But it is not this that any man doubteth of, and therefore as I said, not to be stood upon.

It is the other that is a question, to wit, whether God onely is to bee prayed unto or no, and therefore let us looke to that rather and see the truth.

Mat.4.10. Concerning this then, is not the Scripture as plaine, if we will not wilfully bee blinded, as in the other? And doth not our Saviour Christ put it quite out of doubt when he saith: him onely shalt thou serve? Onely to God, avouched by Christ, should stand against, not onely to God, affirmed by ten thousand worlds, if there were so many to doe it.

Esay 42.8. Psa.50. But the Lord affirmeth further, that he will not give his glory to any other: and it is a part of Gods glory in any Christian judgement, I hope, to pray unto him, and to make him the fountaine and well-spring of all our good. For, Call upon me (saith the Lord) in the day of thy trouble, and I will heare thee, and thou shalt glorifie me. The Law of God saith, Thou shalt have no other gods but me; which is an exclusion of all creatures in heaven and earth, from partaking with the Lord in any worship we owe unto him as our God.

The 17. Chapter of the second booke of Kings, is a notable testimony of the Lords abhorring any partners in this behalfe. For there wee may see, and heare him witnesse it unto our soules, who must one day come to judge them in glory, dreadfull if wee have not harkened, that that not to feare him onely, is not to feare him at all, and not onely to doe after his Lawes and Commandements, is not at all to doe after them. For our additions to the will of him, overthroweth utterly that which we doe thereof, becauſe it is not as we ſhould doe it, that is, onely. My covenant and charge with the Iſraelites, ſaith the Lord there, was ever this, that they ſhould feare no other gods, nor bow themſelves to them, nor ſerve them, nor ſacrifice to them, but onely me, which brought them out of the land of Ægypt, with great power and a ſtretched-out arme. And marke the emphaſis, Him feare. That is, as we may ſee plainly, him onely, him ever, and none but him. And therefore over and over he ſaith it there, no other, no other, and againe the third time, no other.

Exod. 20.

Which is proofe ſufficient, if we be the Lords: yet is the Scripture fuller, and teacheth us plainly, that they ever were and ever ſhall, be blaſphemous Idolaters, injurious to the Lord, that call upon any in their prayer but the ſame Lord alone, whether it bee in heaven or in earth, or in the waters under the earth; whether it be of gold, ſilver, or whatſoever. The places are knowne, and you may read them. It teacheth us alſo, that God hath made us in his great mercy Lords of all his creatures here, and even the Angels in heaven miniſtring Spirits to our good, as ſhall pleaſe him to appoint.

Pſa. 115. 3. Ier. 2. 28. Acts 7. 42. Deut. 4. Phil. 2. 10. Gen. 1. 26. Pſa. 8. Heb. 1. 7.

But whatſoever we pray unto, we make it ſuperiour to us, and having rule and power over us: and therefore if it be a creature, we offend grievouſly, perverting the Lords appointed courſe, and ſervilly ſubmitting our ſelves to that he in his mercy hath put under us, not over us in his manner and order. Againe, that we cannot pray to any thing without beliefe in the ſame, but beliefe muſt onely be in God; and therefore pray to no other. VVherefore it ſtandeth true by the Judge of truth, the eternall VVord of God: we now well ſee, that both God with his worſhip of prayer is to be ſerved and honoured, and onely God alſo, with excluſion for ever of all others whatſoever they may be: and ſo we end this queſtion.

Rom. 10. 14.

Your next is, through whom or by whom we muſt preſent and offer our prayer unto God?

It is ſo: And it may be that in the former queſtion you expected ſome fuller ſpeech of Angels and Saints that be dead, which many are of opinion may bee called upon, that yet greatly miſlike that other folly, or rather madneſſe of praying to inferiour creatures.

Aud if you did, it ſhall now be ſupplyed, God willing, for I did referre it of purpoſe hither, becauſe no man juſtifieth it amongſt us, if he have any cunning, that they are ſimply to be prayed unto, as helpers themſelves of themſelves, but as mediators to him that is able to helpe, that is, God the Lord. Let us ſee then this, if even but thus much may be given unto them.

And to begin at the beginning, we know it true, that betwixt God and us a Mediatour muſt needs bee. For ſo ſaith the Scripture, No man commeth to the Father but by mee: And as there is a God, ſo there is a mediator betwixt God and man. The high Prieſt in the Law by God aſſigned, a figure and ſhadow of Chriſt, even in his office of Prieſthood taught the ſame. And conſcience in us of our owne unworthineſſe to appeare before God, in our ſelves, and for our ſelves, driving us away from his preſence, inferreth it neceſſarily with it: that there muſt be a mediator for us. But who this is, and ever was, through the malice of Satan working in his members, is become a queſtion.

Iohn 14. 6. 1 Tim. 2. 5. Heb. 9. 6, 9, 16, 19.

We ſay with the truth and his due glory, Chriſt Jeſus our Lord, and hee onely. The Papiſts ſay Chriſt, but not Chriſt onely. Our warrants bee many, and ſtrong againſt them. Firſt, expreſſe words: There is one God, and one mediator betwixt God and man, the man Chriſt Ieſus. Marke the place well, and ſee how firſt he determineth the number, and ſaith there is but one: Secondly, the perſon, who that one is, even the man Chriſt Jeſus: Thirdly, why there is but one, and no more, namely, becauſe there is but one God, and no moe. Which is a ſingular proofe, every one bluſhing to deny the one, and yet daring to avouch the other. So then by this place it is got, that one God, and but one Mediator, and that Chriſt alſo: but moe mediators, moe gods of neceſſity: which they will not teach I hope plainly.

1 Tim. 2.

Secondly, all thoſe places that appoint us to pray in Chriſt his name, making ever mention of him, and onely of him, without any addition of any other, doe they not with a mighty ſtrength uphold our ſoules in this faith? For wanted the Lord either power or will to adde further truth, if there had been any ſuch? Or yet he that ſaith, he will honor them that honor him, become envious toward his Saints, and will ſpeake of their lawfull honor, if this were it, to pray to them.

Iohn 19. 13. Iohn 16. 4, &c. 1 Sam. 2.

3. Thirdly, can any man bee our Mediator with God, but hee that is juſt himſelfe, fully and perfectly before God? And was there ever any ſuch, or can be to the worlds end, but onely Chriſt? Is not any thing whatſoever it bee that commeth not of faith ſinne? And cõmeth faith any way but from the Word? Then either ſome proofe out of the Word, againſt Chriſt onely, and for others as well as Chriſt, or to beleeve, it is ſinne and a death for ever, without repentance. Dare wee of our owne heads take the honour of Chriſt, aſcribed to him ſo expreſly in his Word, and give it to others equall with him, without a warrant? It is written, Gloriam meam alteri non dabo, I will not give my glory to another: and he that writ it ſhall judge us for breaking it, unleſſe we can ſhew his diſpenſation. Sanctos defunctos pro nobis orare, ex nulla Scriptura Canonica edocemur. That the Saints departed pray for us, it appeareth not in any Canonicall Scripture.

Et quamvis id fateror, non tamen ex eo ſequeretur, nos oportere ſanctos defunctos invocare. And although that it ſhould be granted, yet follow thereupon it would not, that we ſhould pray unto them; for aſſured by the Word of God it cannot be that they heare our prayers. And without that aſſurance, what comfort can we pray withall unto them.

Wherefore moſt grievouſly doe they offend both againſt Chriſt and Religion, that make mediators beſide him. Wee are plainly told that he maketh interceſſion for us, but we are not told of any others. I write unto you little Children (ſaith Saint Iohn) that you ſinne not, and if any man doe ſinne, we have an Advocate with the Father, Ieſus Chriſt the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our ſinnes.

1 John 2.1. Contra Parmenian. lib. 2. cap.

In which place of Scripture S. Auſten noteth two things. Firſt, how the Apoſtle doth not ſay, ye have an Advocate, but we have an Advocate: teaching us thereby, that there was never any ſo holy but that he had need of Chriſt to be his mediator as well as others: and therefore he did not ſeparate himſelfe from others in that reſpect. Secondly, that he did not ſay, ye have me an Advocate with the Father, but ye have Jeſus Chriſt the righteous, neque ego exoro pro peccatis veſtris: neither is it I that intreate for the pardon of your ſinnes, but Chriſt.

For had the Apoſtle Iohn ſaid otherwiſe, quis enim ferret bonorum atque fidelium Chriſtianorũ? what good and faithfull Chriſtian could have abidden it? Quis ſicut Apoſtolum Chriſti, & non ſicut Antichriſtum intueretur? Yea, who would have looked upon him as upon an Apoſtle of Chriſt, and not as upon a very Antichriſt? What a notable teſtimony is this againſt other mediators beſide Chriſt? and how happeneth it that our Papiſts ſee it not, or thinke better of it, if they ſee it? But I pray you heare the ſame Father againe in another place.

Aug. Confeſſ. lib. 10. cap. 42, 43.

Quem invenirem qui me reconciliaret? An eundum mihi fuit ad Angelos? At qua prece? quibus Sacramentis? Whom ſhould I finde to reconcile mee to thee? Should I goe to the Angels? with what prayer? with what Sacraments? Have not many done thus, and beene deluded with the ill Angell, transforming himſelfe into an Angell of light? Verax ergo mediator Chriſtus, the true mediator therefore is Chriſt Jeſus, and much more in thoſe two good Chapters to this purpoſe. Theſe proofes may ſuffice in this briefe Treatiſe, yet are there many moe. Themſelves had even by the mighty power of an able God to give his truth paſſage, a true feeling of the ſafety of the one, and the danger of the other, and their witneſſe of it ſhould truely worke both with them and us.

With them to draw them to a ſweet truth, and with us to ſtrengthen us where wee ſtand, ſince the Lord hath made his enemies confeſſe the ſoundneſſe of our faith. Caſſander ſaid it of his owne practice, Ego in meis precibus non eligo Sanctos invocare, ſed invocationem dirigo ad Deum ipſum, idq; in nomine Chriſti: Hoc enim tutius exiſtimo. I, ſaith he, doe not uſe to pray to any of the Saints my ſelfe, but I direct my prayers to God himſelfe, and that in the name of Chriſt: for that I judge more ſafe: Another of them againe: Tutius & jucundius loquor ad meum Ieſum, quam ad aliquem ſanctorum ſpiritum. Both with more ſafety and comfort doe I ſpeake unto my Jeſus, than to any of the holy ſpirits.

Is not this ſtrange that our enemies ſhould confeſſe our manner of praying to God alone by the mediation of his beloved Sonne, both more ſafe and more comfortable, and for the ſame cauſes uſe it ſo themſelves, and yet teach others otherwiſe? Should faithfull teachers ſeeke to ſave themſelves, and make no conſcience to kill others? And is this to deale faithfully with the Lords inheritance, the price of his Sonnes blood, to teach them to doe, what not onely by knowledge in judgement, but by inward feeling of conſcience, they finde neither ſo ſafe nor comfortable as the way wee uſe, and themſelves alſo uſe? Woe and woe againe muſt needs bee to ſuch, as even againſt their own feeling, direct the people committed to them. And what madneſſe is this in us, if we ſuffer our ſelves by any ſubtill perſwaſions to be led unto that which our teachers themſelves refuſe for their owne part to joyne with us as in a courſe that is neither comfortable nor ſafe. Let us hearken rather to the Apoſtle, truely advertiſing us to ſuffer none ſuch as theſe, neither any man living at his pleaſure to beare rule over us by * humbleneſſe of minde and worſhipping of Angels, advancing himſelfe in theſe things which hee never ſaw, raſhly puft up with this fleſhly minde, and holdeth not the head, &c. For aſſuredly if the conſcience of all them were examined that delight in other mediators beſide Chriſt, to offer up their prayers to God, and to ſpeake for them, and true confeſſion made of what they finde, it would appeare to us all that this ſinne ſpringeth of none other roote than of a perſwaſion of that Chriſt is not ſo pitifull and mercifull, and willing to be ſpoken unto as other Saints and creatures bee: Which how blaſphemous it is againſt him, to give his creatures preheminence above him in any goodneſſe, let every feeling heart diſcerne and judge. Farre was the godly Father from ſuch opinion of our Saviour, when hee made him all in all, and with truth ſaid of him what all true Chriſtians firmly beleeve and hold; Ipſe os noſtrum eſt, per quod patri loquimur, oculus oculus noſter, per quem patrem videmus, dextra noſtra, per quam nos Patri offerimus.

Col. 2. 18. * For theſe Angell-worſhippers blamed ſuch of pride as would goe ſtreight to God, and uſe no other undermeanes beſide Chriſt, and ſaid the other was humbleneſſe of minde. But ſuch humility the Apoſtle condéneth.

Hee is our mouth wherewith wee ſpeake unto God, our eye wherewith wee ſee God, and our right hand wherewith we offer our ſelves unto God. Quo niſi intercedente nec nobis nec Sanctis omnibus quicquam cum Deo eſt. But by whoſe interceſſion neither wee nor all the Saints in heaven have any thing to doe with the Lord. And that there remaine no ſcruple of feare in us to goe to this gracious Mediator even when we pray, conſider it in the Scriptures, and conſider it earneſtly, that that gliſtering reaſon which they uſe of our indignity to goe to him at the firſt, (for ſo I call it, becauſe it ſeemeth ſo faire at the firſt view) never diſcouraged any of the godly mentioned in the Word ever, but even then when they have ſeene and thought of their unworthineſſe moſt, they have yet gone unto God and to no others for helpe: David when hee ſaw that multitude of offences in him, and himſelfe ſo horribly defiled as that there remained almoſt nothing of old David in him, that is, of a good ſervant of God, never yet cried to Abraham, Iſaac and Iacob, nor to any of all the godly departed, or Angels in heaven, but Miſerere mei Deus, Have mercy upon mee, O God, and according to the multitude of thy mercies doe away mine iniquity. Iohn Baptiſt, though he ſaw himſelfe unworthy to looſe the very latchet of Chriſts ſhooe, yet taught hee no other Mediator to God, neither had any other himſelfe, but onely him. Pſal. 15. Matt. 3.

The good Centurion, that in ſo true feeling both of himſelfe, and Chriſt, confeſſed hee was not worthy, under whoſe roofe the Lord ſhould come, yet with all that unworthineſſe was not feared from him to aske his helpe, even for his ſervant. The poore publican unworthy in his owne eyes to looke upon the heavens, yet feareth not to looke upon his God, and to ſay, God be mercifull unto me a ſinner: when hee might have called upon Saints and Angels for mercy, if it had beene as good or better, as theſe mad men affirme. And ſo farre was this his doing from preſumption diſpleaſant to God, and unſeeming an unworthy ſinner, as that ſentence is given by the Lord himſelfe of it, it was pleaſant and acceptable to God, and hee juſtified more than the other. Finally, the prodigall Sonne with the ſame mouth that confeſſeth indignity ever to bee counted Sonne any more, yet calleth upon his Father for pitty, and not upon any of his fathers ſervants. Wherefore let us open our eyes and ſee the truth, let us not harden our hearts, to day when wee heare his voice, the Mediator betwixt God and man, is the man Chriſt Jeſus, and none but hee: it is hee that ſitteth on the right hand of God, and maketh interceſſion for us, and there is no other. And if any man ſinne, wee have him our Advocate, and wee muſt know no other.

Yea Sir, but you know their anſwer in this matter, if they bee charged, they doe not deny they ſay, but Chriſt, and onely Chriſt is Mediator of redemption, but not of interceſſion, and that which they aſcribe to holy ſpirits, it is onely to make interceſſion for them. 1 Tim. 2. 5. Rom. 8. 22. 1 Iohn 2.

Indeed they ſo anſwere, but alas in vaine. For it is but a ſhift deviſed of Satan to deceive our ſoules by if wee receive it, and that may appeare both to them and us, if wee have care to ſee the truth. For hath it firſt any warrant in the Word? If it have, let them produce it, if not, let them know that even for this cauſe it faulteth, and we reject it. For if this be granted that men may frame diſtinctions at their pleaſures, there is not the truth to be named, but it may be overthrowne. Wherefore this is one reaſon againſt it, it hath no warrant in the Word. Secondly, was not the high Prieſt in the law, mediator in figure, both of expiation by ſacrifices, and of interceſſion by prayer? That is more plainly, did not he both offer ſacrifice and make prayer? And what was this but in ſhadow to ſhew that ſo in the New Teſtament both theſe things ſhould bee conjoyned in one man alſo, even the man Chriſt Jeſus, and hee that was Mediator of redemption ſhould alſo be mediator of interceſſion. To divide theſe then, is to make the body not anſwere to the ſhadow, neither the truth to the figure, which may not be. For looke whatſoever was typically ſhewed Chriſt ſhould doe, that hath hee truely done and performed, and to affirme otherwiſe is great impiety.

Thirdly, theſe two are both duties of the mediator, and in truth none can bee a mediator, unleſſe hee performe both theſe things, namely, both redemption and interceſſion. Now of two duties or parts of the office of a mediator, ſhall wee make two ſorts of mediators? Truely it is even all one, as if becauſe man conſiſteth of body and ſoule, as of two parts that make but one whole, wee ſhould ſay there are two ſorts of men, one conſiſting of body, another of ſoule, which were a true ſpeech. Or againe, becauſe the Prince hath power over body and goods, and they both are incident to the prerogative of his Kingly office, therefore of two things belonging to one perſon, wee would make a diſtinction of perſons, and ſay, there are two ſorts of Princes, one having power over body, and another having authority over goods.

For even ſo it is in this matter of a mediator, whoſe office conſiſteth in both theſe duties, as parts of the ſame, to redeeme the people, and to make interceſſion for them. Remember alſo in the Scripture before named, how utterly S. Auguſtine diſliked that Parmenian the Heretike, who in a certaine place made the Biſhop a mediator betwixt God and the people, and how hee ſaid, that if S. Iohn ſhould have done ſo, no man would have abide him, neither have looked upon him, as upon an Apoſtle of Chriſt, but as upon a very Antichriſt. Truely Parmenian never thought the Biſhop was a mediator of redemption or ſalvation, and therefore even there, by that learned Father Auguſtine, is moſt plainely overthrowne this fooliſh diſtinction which we ſpeake of. Laſtly, conſider the Scripture of God, and tremble to reſiſt a truth maliciouſly when it is plaine. Doth not the Apoſtle ſay, Woe have boldneſſe, and entrance with confidence by faith in him? If in any place it can bee truely ſhewed, that wee have ſuch entrance by any other, finde it out, if not, thinke of it. Conſider adviſedly of the 7. and 9. Chapters to the Hebrews, and ſee how ſtrongly it is proved, that theſe two offices of redemption and interceſſion are joyned, and ſo that the dignity, power, and efficacy of Chriſts interceſſion, dependeth upon the merits of his redemption. Marke how he ſaith it of Chriſt, that he ever liveth to make interceſſion for his. Find you where Saints or Angels live to make interceſſion for us? Againe, that Chriſt is entred into the very heavens, to appeare now in the ſight of God for us: ſhew you the like of other mediators. That Chriſt by the very oath of God is appointed to this office for his children. Shew you where God by oath hath joyned others in commiſſion with him. Conſider with your ſelfe how comfortable a promiſe it is of Chriſt, That whatſoever we aſk the Father in his name we ſhall have it. Surely, if other were fellowes with him in mediation of interceſſion, we ſhould have like promiſe, that whatſoever we aske in their names wee ſhould receive it: but this is not ſo, and therfore a great difference betwixt our comfort that ask in Chriſts name, and theirs that aske in other names. I am the doore, ſaith our Saviour Chriſt, by mee if any man enter in hee ſhall bee ſaved, and ſhall goe in, and goe out, and find place, I am the way, the truth and the life. No man commeth to the Father, but by me. Which were meerely falſe, if there were many mediators of interceſſion. For then ſo many mediators, ſo many meanes to come to God.

Finally, conſider it even with your heart, that in the very place where hee ſaith, There is one mediator, and that Chriſt, he ſpeaketh of prayer, ſupplication, and interceſſion, and therefore moſt fully ſatisfieth any Chriſtian conſcience, that even of that there is but one contrary to this vaine and fooliſh diſtinction. Wherefore, let the fruit of all this bee a reformed judgement, for as much as prayer to God alone by Chriſt hath warrant and comfort, and the other hath none, but when God ſhall awake us, moſt fearefull diſcomfort, being a plain and dreadfull robbery of God of his true and due honour. If you can find as plaine proofs and props to your conſcience that others be joyned in this authority and office with Chriſt to make interceſſion for us, as now you have ſeene that Chriſt is, then hearken to them, but if not, thinke upon your God that ſhed his precious blood for you, and hee that hath ſo loved you, and done ſo much for you, grudge him not his due glory, neither match his creatures with him cheeke by cheeke, without good warrant, for he is a jealous God of his honour, and hath plainely told us, that his glory hee will not give to another. Thinke upon your owne poore ſoule, the greateſt jewell that ever God committed to you; ſpill it not, kill it not, by pulling it from the life of all ſoules, Chriſt Jeſus. And be you even fully reſolved, that if the Angels or Saints appearing or living in this world, would never ſuffer their fellow-ſervants to pray unto them, ſurely now in heaven they like it not, but would have you onely cleave to Chriſt.

Apoc. 19. 10.

For what things may we pray?

I exhort you (ſaith the Apoſtle) that ſupplications, prayer, interceſſion, and giving of thanks be made for all men. For Kings, and all that are in authority: that we may leade a quiet and peaceable life, in all godlineſſe and honeſty: for this is good and acceptable in the ſight of God our Saviour. And againe, Whatſoever ye ſhall do in word or in deed, do all in the name of the Lord Ieſus, giving thanks to God, even the Father, by him, with many other places.

1 Tim. 2. 1. Iames 5. 13, 16. Matt. 5. 44. Rom. 12. 14.

Chryſoſtome in his Liturgie, and others, have prayers then uſually of the Church publiquely made, for ſeaſonable weather, fertility of the ground, peace and quietneſſe, for ſuch as travelled by land or by water: for them that were ſicke, priſoners or captives: for Biſhops and people: for infidels and heretikes, and ſuch like. In concluſion, we are warranted to call upon the Lord our moſt mercifull God, for whatſoever is requiſite, either to body or ſoule, in this life, or the eſtate to come. Which being more particularly laid downe by Chriſt himſelfe, in this prayer following, need not now ſo much to be ſtood upon.

Iuſtinus. Tertul. Clemens. Auguſtin. &c.

1 Tim. 4. 8.

Something alſo of the place of prayer, if you will.

As prayer it ſelfe is either private or publike, ſo is the place, both allowed and commended in the Word: Of the firſt our Saviour ſpeaketh, when he ſaith: Be not as the hypocrites, for they love to ſtand in the Synagogue, and in the corners of the ſtreets, becauſe they would bee ſeene of men. Verily I ſay unto you, they have their reward. But when thou prayeſt, enter into thy chamber, and when thou haſt ſhut thy doore, pray to thy Father which is in ſecret: and thy Father which ſeeth in ſecret ſhall reward thee openly.

Matt. 6 5.

Here by Chamber, are meant all private places whatſoever, which the godly draw themſelves into, to make their private prayer. It being now lawfull to pray every where, and in all places, lifting up pure hands without wrath, or doubting, and no need to ſeek out Temples, Churches,

1 Tim. 2. 8.

Churches, or Chappels hallowed by men, as though no prayer were good but there.

Whether wee bee at home or abroad, in the Citie or in the Countrey, in our ſhops working, or in our beds lying, whether wee be ſitting, ſtanding, walking, by day or by night, early, or late, God is preſent, and heareth, and accepteth the prayers of any faithfully made, and in mercy hee hath made and conſecrated our bodies Temples for the Holy Ghoſt. A great mercy and little thought of, that we are not tied to any places. For then might our ſtreights have been ſuch that wee could not come at them, and ſo conſequently, not have beene able to pray to God his liking, whereas now it is not, but whereſoever wee are, we may doe it if wee need, in bed ſicke, in priſon bound, in perſecution feared, and driven into holes, ſo that wee cannot come at the publike places, we may pray and comfortably pray, aſſured that even in all theſe places and others whatſoever, (our prayers made in faith) come before the Lord as incenſe, and the lifting up of our hands is as an evening ſacrifice. Of publike place and prayers, all thoſe appointments of God of aſſemblies, both in the Law and the Goſpell, and his childrens carefull and diligent keeping of the ſame.

Pſal 14 1. Exod. 29.38. Ioel 2. Eſay 56.7. Iohn 2.16.

This publike place the Lord calleth his houſe, and the houſe of prayer. And the old Father is not afraid to ſay thus to them: Non aque exoras, cum ſolus Dominum obſecras, atq; cum fratribus tuis. Eſt enim in hoc plus aliquid, videlicet concordia, conſpiratio, copula amoris & charitatis, & Sacerdotũ clamores. Præſunt enim ob eam rem Sacerdotes, ut populi orationes, quæ infirmiores per ſe ſunt, validiores illas complexæ ſimul in cœlos euehantur. Thou doſt not ſo ſoone obtaine thy deſire, when thou prayeſt alone unto the Lord, as when thou prayeſt with thy brethren. For herein there is ſomewhat more: the concord, the conſent, the joyning of love and charity, and the cry of the Prieſts. For to that end the Prieſts are made overſeers, that they (being the ſtronger ſort) may take with them the weake prayers of the people, and cary them up into heaven.

Chryſoſt de incomprehenſibili Dei natura. Hom. 3.

Againe, Quod quis apud ſeipſum precatus accipere non poterit, hoc cum multitudine precatus accipiet. Quare? quia etiam ſi non propria virtus, tamen concordia multũ poteſt. The thing that a man cannot obtaine praying by himſelfe alone, praying together with the multitude he ſhall obtaine. And why ſo? For although not his owne worthineſs, yet the concord and unity prevaileth much. This concord and unity in prayer, is a goodly thing, and maketh a ſhrill ſhrike in the Lords eare. S. Hierome did liken it to a thunder-clap, Baſil to the roaring of the Sea: And by plaine experience wee know, that if one ſtring of an inſtrument make a ſound, many ſtrings will make a greater ſound: If one ſticke make a fire, many ſtickes make a greater and a hotter fire. This true and good conſcience, made ever the godly have a ſpeciall care to frequent the publike places of prayer: that if themſelves were dull, yet even the company of others might ſtirre them up; And they in common place, might receive the bleſſing of common prayer.

Chryſoſt. in 2. Theſal. Hom. 4.

Peter and Iohn went together into the Temple to pray. And David remembring how hee had wont to leade the people to the houſe of God, and have a multitude follow by his good example: when hee was baniſhed from that comfort, and wanted that helpe ſo good againſt wants, he ſaid; his heart was ready to breake within him, and the griefe was very great. A moſt notable place for all men to thinke of, to ſtirre them up to frequent places of prayer, and eſpecially for great men, whoſe examples prevaile ſo mightily, either to good or evill. The companies will aſſemble, if they come and follow them carefully. As they did David: and that obedience of many, ſhall bee their crowne and true comfort, even as it was Davids: What thinke you, if in his exile ſo grievous and bitter, Davids conſcience had cried alſo againſt him, and ſaid: Thou never when thou hadſt peace and liberty, caredſt for publike meetings, at prayer and Sacraments: thou never gaveſt any good example this way to the multitude, that watched what thou diddeſt and depended upon thee, but if thou diddeſt pray, it was ſecret by thy ſelfe, when thou ſhouldeſt have beene with the Congregation: and therefore ſince God got no honour by thee, nor obedience of his people, by thy zealous forwardneſſe, to goe before them, and to leade them to the houſe of prayer: therefore now the Lord hath laid thy honour in the duſt, and raiſed up evill againſt thee. Doe you think it would not nip? yes truely more than all his woe beſide, for there is no torment to a conſcience juſtly accuſing. Wherefore now it ſhould bee thought of by all Nobles, and Gentlemen, and women; the markes that ignorant people frame themſelves unto, that if ever the Lord ſhould do with us as with David, or caſt us in the bed of ſickneſſe, or any way let us that we could not goe: yet with David wee might teſtifie with great comfort, what had beene, although then grieved as he, that it was not ſo ſtill. S. Auſtin was raviſhed with the ſongs of the Church and Congregation met together, and even wept in ſpirituall comfort, conceived by that ſweet and heavenly matter ſo joyntly, and with ſuch order and power made and uttered to God in publike meetings. And who hath not felt his heart moved in a Congregation? Wherefore once againe, let theſe things worke a great regard of publike Church-aſſemblies at times appointed. For the ſanctifying of the Sabbath requireth it, if there were no more. And take heed of exceptions, for they are moſt dangerous againſt a thing ſo renowned in the word, and ſo carefully obſerved ever of the godly. It is eaſie to deceive our ſelves with a ſhew of truth; if there be not even a conſcience, to ſuſpect a Plea, before that is made a-gainſt the truth. Many things might bee here touched, but who is wiſe will conſider what is not openly touched, and beware.

Yet one thing more, I pray you, anſwer me in this matter, and that is concerning the dead: May they be prayed for of us, after they are departed?

No indeed, unleſſe wee will preſume in zeale and affection above any warrant of the Word of God, and ſo pull upon us (as we have heard before) both ſinne, and the reward thereof. For wee have no commandement any where to doe it, being yet expreſly commanded to pray for the living; and to doe ſuch duties alſo for the dead, as are fit and allowable, as to bury them, to mourne moderately for them, and ſo as may become men and women that have hope of their reſurrection, and life eternall, to bee faithfull performers of their laſt wills, and ſuch like. We have no example of any in the Canonicall Scripture that ever did it: we have no promiſe to be heard if we doe it: no puniſhment threatned if we doe it not. And is not this a great nakedneſſe of an action, to have none of all theſe? yea, ſuch a nakedneſſe, as ſhall touch and preſſe any man or woman living, that deſire to pleaſe God by true and right obedience? Truely it is. And we are not able to name any one thing that God hath in good liking to have his children doe, but it either hath all, or the moſt of theſe. It hath a commandement, it hath a promiſe, it hath example, it hath puniſhment threatned, if not done, &c. Wherefore let us conſider it, and bee not caried away with vaine ſhifts. Wee uſe to ſay, wee doe it for good will, and if it doe them no good, it doth them no harme. But is there any true good will which is not allowed by God? Should not his liking and allowance be the rule and guide of us and all our doings? If then wee can finde where he biddeth ſhew our good will in this ſort, uſe it, and feare not: if we cannot, neither thinke that is good will which wanteth the Lords ſtampe upon it, unleſſe you will affirme that God condemneth good duties to our brethren, which God forbid. Then conſider againe, that albeit it neither hurt nor profit them, yet in truth it hurteth us that doe it, both becauſe it is an action without warrant, and therefore not of faith, and ſo ſinne: and becauſe alſo it confirmeth and proppeth up that lewd opinion of Purgatory, ſo derogatory to the truth of God, and the comfort of his children. Therefore if we will ſhew good will to our friends departed, let us ſpeake of them as men and women in the hands of God, and in ſuch comfort, as that they need not any prayers of us, departed in a true faith, and therefore now poſſeſſors of the promiſe; even of ſuch joyes, as no eye hath ſeene, no eare hath heard, neither any heart been able to conceive of. For thus to hope of them, is like friends to hope of them, and thus to ſpeak hurteth not our ſelves. Our phraſes may be as eaſie, God hath had mercy on him I truſt, as God have mercy on him: he is with God I hope, he is at reſt from his labours, hee hath finiſhed his courſe, or any ſuch like. If we will a little at firſt labour to forget a bad cuſtome, when it ſeeketh to come upon our tongues ſo readily. Then for the place in the Machabees, our anſwer firſt toucheth the books, and then the matter. The books we except againſt, as not Canonicall (that is) of authority to build our faith and obedience upon; and the reaſons of our ſo doing, are ſuch as never have, nether can be truely anſwered by any adverſary: I pray you let it not grieve you, both to heare them, and very diligently to marke them.

2 Mach. 12.44.

2 Mach. 2.29.

Firſt, the Holy Ghoſt never uſeth to epitomize and contract any prophane mens workes and writings, but is able of himſelfe to write, and lay downe whatſoever may be profitable for his Church, and ſo hath ever done. But the ſecond booke of Machabees, whence this place for prayer for the dead is taken, is an abridgement wholly out of the five bookes of Iaſon the Cyrenian, as the Author himſelfe confeſſeth: and therefore not a writing or booke of the Holy Ghoſt.

2 Mach. 15.39.

Secondly, the Authour of this booke craveth pardon for his wants, and ſaith it is as well as he was able to doe: but thus never the Holy Ghoſt at any mans hand. For how ſhould God crave pardon of man, and ſay, it is as well as hee was able to doe? Therefore this moſt mightily and evidently, unleſſe wee ſhut our eyes, and ſtoppe our eares againſt the truth, telleth us this Booke is not as the reſt of the Scriptures, whereon wee ſafely ſtay our ſelves. Thirdly, in the writings of the Holy Ghoſt there are no contrarieties ever, but in theſe bookes there are: and therefore no Scripture by inſpiration from the Holy Ghoſt. Will you thinke of ſome of them? In the firſt booke it is ſaid of Iudas, that he was ſlaine of Bacchides his Armie, and Ionathan and Symon his brethren, buried him in his fathers ſepulchre, in the City of Modin, and all the Iſraelites wept for him, &c. In the ſecond booke hee is alive againe, and writeth letters 36. yeeres after he was dead. Can both theſe bee true? If not, then marke the credit of this booke. Not unlike to this, is that which is written of Antiochus his death. In the firſt booke it is ſaid, hee laid him downe upon his bed ſicke, and there died: with ſuch circumſtances of the matter as there you may reade, and ſee your ſelfe. In the ſecond Booke, and firſt Chapter it is ſaid, That hee entring the Temple of Nanea, the Prieſts opened a privie doore of the vault, and caſt downe ſtones like thunder upon him and his company, and bruiſed them in pieces, cut off their heads, and threw them out to the reſt of their company that were without. In the 9. Chapter of the ſame Booke it is ſaid, he died a miſerable death among the Mountaines. Theſe be greater contrarieties than I truſt any man that feareth God, will thinke may bee in Books whereof the Holy Ghoſt is Author. And therefore you ſee wee doe not without great cauſe refuſe to learne our faith out of theſe books. If mens judgements be regarded of us, we heare and ſee what the Fathers thought. Hierom, Epiphan, Athanaſius, and Cyprian, reject theſe books in this ſort, as not to be rules of faith. Yea, the Biſhop of Rome himſelf Gregory, 1100. yeeres after Auſten, rejecteth them as not Canonicall: and if other men be of ſmall regard with them, yet would God the Papiſts would reſpect their owne Biſhop. But Auſten (they ſay) affirmeth them Canonicall. O why ſhould not love of Truth baniſh all cavills! Auſten doth ſo: and in the very ſame place that they alledge ſaith the contrary. How then is Auſten contrary to himſelfe? No, their owne eyes ſee as well as we, if they will, that when he calleth them not Canonical, he taketh the word ſtrictly and properly, and meaneth they are no grounds and rules for our faith: when he calleth them Canonicall, he taketh the word largely, and meaneth they are ſuch as may bee read in the Churches, for examples of the great and marvellous paſſions and perſecutions of the Martyrs. Beleeve not mee, but heare himſelfe. Firſt, that they are not Canonicall. In Machabeorum libris, &c. Although there may ſomething bee found in the bookes of the Macchabees, meet for this order of writing, and worthy to bee joyned with the number of miracles, yet hereof wee will have no care: For that we have intended onely to touch a ſhort reherſall of the miracles contained in the bookes of holy Canon. See how he ſaith, they are not Canonicall, and therefore hee will not accept of the miracles in them. Againe, Hæc ſupputatio non in Scripturis ſanctis, quæ appellantur Canonicæ, ſed in aliis invenitur, in quibus ſunt, & Machabæorum libri. This reckoning is not found in the holy Scriptures that are called Canonicall, but in certaine other books, among which are the bookes of the Macchabees. Many ſuch teſtimonies might be alledged out of this Father, but theſe ſuffice in this Treatiſe. Now that they are Canonicall, heare himſelfe againe. Libros Machabæorum Eccleſia habet pro Canonicis, propter quorundam Martyrum paſſiones vehementes atque mirabiles. The Church accounteth the books of the Machabees as Canonicall; not for the authority and weight of truth, but for the great and marvellous paſſions and perſecutions of the Martyrs therein contained.

Greg in Iob l. 19. cap. 16.

And againe, the Scripture that beareth the name of the Machabees, is received not unprofitably of the Church, ſo that it be read and heard with ſobriety, eſpecially, becauſe of thoſe Machabees that ſuffered ſuch cruell torments for the Law of God.

Wherefore by his words now on both ſides repeated, Auguſtines mind is plaine; namely, that thoſe bookes alledged in proofe of faith, they are not Canonicall, but to bee read unto the people in the Church for example of life, in this ſenſe (ſaith hee) they are Canonicall, and may thus be read; ſo that they be read ſoberly. And what is this, but that which other Fathers have alſo ſaid? As Ierome, the Church readeth the ſtory of Iudith, the booke of Toby, and the books of the Machabees, but the ſame Church receiveth not theſe books as the Canonicall Scriptures. Cyprian, Hæc omnia legi quidem in Eccleſiis voluerunt, non tamen proferri ad authoritatem ex his Fidei confirmandam: All theſe writings our Fathers have allowed to be read in the Church, yet not to bee alledged for authority, to confirme the Doctrine of our Faith. Wherefore to goe no further, in this you ſee our reaſons, why we allow not any proof of Doctrine out of thoſe books, and therefore not of prayer for the dead. Other reaſons moe are alledged by the godly learned, and might by me now, but that theſe ſuffice here.

Next, our anſwer toucheth the matter it ſelfe, and we ſay, That prayer for the dead, ſought to bee proved out of this place of the Machabees, is contrary to the reſt of the Scriptures, and therefore wee dare not allow it. For no truth and lawfull thing is contrary to any Scripture, but agreeable, as receiving warrant and lawfulneſſe thence.

Secondly, that though Iudas had ſo done (which is not likely hee did, howſoever this place hath beene corrupted to that end, becauſe it is contrary to the cuſtome of the Jewes, even to this day to pray for the dead) yet this particular example is not ſufficient to eſtabliſh a Doctrine, no more than Zipporahs was, to prove that women may adminiſter the Sacraments; or the example of Razis, that one might kill himſelfe, whom this Author ſo much commendeth.

And therefore concluding, ſince neither by this place, nor by any Scripture, this prepoſterous love to the dead, to pray for them, can find ſure warrant: we deſire that it may heartily be thought of, how ill it becommeth any that profeſſeth a deſire to pleaſe God, with commanded obedience, and not with traditions of men, or deviſes any whatſoever, either of their owne heads, or any others. And thus much of it.

Sufficient then being ſaid of theſe circumſtances of prayer, will you now proceed to the forme it ſelfe preſcribed by our Saviour?

Content, And firſt conſider what a gracious goodneſſe this was in the Lord our God, to lay downe a forme for us, That wee not able to ſee the bottome of our wants our ſelves, neither in what wee doe ſee, to take ſuch courſe as becommeth ſpeakers to ſo great a God, by his owne mouth wee might be directed both in the one and the other, to our great comfort and aſſurance, that keeping our ſelves within the compaſſe of forme, our prayer ſhould bee to the Lords good liking;and therefore we obtaine what we aske,according to his will. Without a form,we might have wandred to our great harme, asking many times things hurtfull ; and if not ſo, yet things unlawfull,not in forme lawfull,which alſo had been evill. And if heathens ſaw the nakedneſs of men,for want of ſuch direction: Let us Chriſtians ſee Gods mercy,and our owne great good by his direction.

What forme ſome Heathen uſed.

Plato (wee know) eſpying the ignorance of men in making their prayers to God, for that many times they ſought, what granted would hurt them:ſaid, this was a good forme ; O Iupiter Rex,optima nobis & voventibus, tribue. Mala autem poſcentibus quoque abeſſe jube. That is, O Iupiter King, give unto us the beſt things, whether wee aske them or no. And all evill things command away from us, though wee aske them. Wherein wee may ſee how dangerouſly they groped in great darkneſſe, for want of a forme : and were faine for ſafety, to pray thus generally,whereas we now plainely are taught how to pray more particularly, and yet ſtill truly. Wherefore ſee I ſay,firſt Gods great mercy,and our great good,by having this forme laid downe unto us.

Then touching the forme it ſelfe which our Saviour hath laid downe, it conſiſteth of three principall parts.

The Lords prayer hath three parts.

Firſt, of a Preface; Secondly, of the Petitions themſelves; and laſtly, of a Concluſion. The Preface in theſe words. Our Father which art in Heaven. The Petitions in order after. The Concluſion thus, for thine is the kingdome, the power and the glory, for ever and ever, Amen.

A Father, by Creation, Redemption, Sanctification.

The firſt part which is the Preface,ſhort in words, but plentifull in matter,is ſo laid down by the wiſdome of the Lord Jeſus, as that every word carieth his weight, and bringeth to us in uſe thereof moſt ſingular profit. The firſt, is Father, by which Name, we are taught to ſpeake unto our God when we pray unto him, and ſee the uſe. There is no prayer as wee well know, and before hath beene declared, that can pierce the eares of Almighty God, unleſſe it be made both in affection and faith. Affection hath his want great, and too great often in our corruption, and therefore in mercy of a gracious God, helps and meanes provided for it. This is one evermore to conſider, to whom I pray,and to whom I ſpeake ; Namely, not to a ſevere and ſowre Judge, not to a cruell and mercileſſe Tyrant, not to a ſtranger that knoweth me not, or hath no alliance with me, but to a Father; yea, in Jeſus Chriſt now my Father, a kinde, a loving, a good, a tender Father, who looketh upon me with bowels of mercy and pitty, figheth for me before I come, runneth out when I doe come, meeteth me, embraceth me, falleth about my necke with his armes, weepeth upon me in melting motions of loving kindneſſe, heareth mee ſpeake, weigheth my ſuit, whether it may be my good, and can as ſoone in concluſion ceaſe to bee God, as denie mee any thing that may bee my benefit. And oh then, the affection that wee may pray with, if wee conſider this Name of Father. My ſoule may thirſt, my heart may long, yea, burne and burſt as it were within mee, with deſire ever to come to my Father, for hee is ever a Father, and hath ever the nature of his Name, though I bee vile. And therefore let us take the uſe intended by the Lord in this given Title, and pray cheerefully, with ſweet comfort in the conceit of whom wee ſpeake unto evermore.

The uſe of the word Father,to our ſoules.

The ſecond uſe of the word Father.

When Affection then is thus kindled and ſtirred up, looke at Faith in the next place, which alſo muſt concurre with it, or elſe in vaine wee pray, and obtaine nothing. This knew our Saviour well, and therefore even to this end alſo hath taught us to ſay and pray in the Name of Father. Whereby ariſeth in us, and ought evermore, an aſſurance of his willingneſſe and readineſſe to helpe us. For what will a Father deny unto his begging child, that may doe him good? Pater quid negabit filiis, qui jam dedit, quod Pater eſt? What will that Father denie to his Sonnes, which hath already graunted this, to bee their Father ? Yea, ſuch a Father,as being not Our Father, hath redeemed us to him, his utter enemies, with no leſſe price, than that precious blood of his owne and onely beloved Sonne. O how ſhall hee (with him) not give us all things alſo ? If wee which are evill, yet in the nature of Fathers, give good gifts to our children,how much more ſhall our Father which is in Heaven, give good things to them that aske him ? Can a woman forget her child,and not have compaſſion on the ſonne of her wombe ? Though it could be, yet will I not forget thee. Behold I have graven thee upon the palmes of my hands, thy walls are even in my ſight. Judge then, the willingneſſe of the Lord evermore, to grant our profitable prayers,and bee ſtrengthened in Faith by this word Father. Primus ſermo quantæ ſit gratiæ vide, & ſuavitatis, ô homo: faciem tuam non audebas ad cœlum attollere,oculos tuos in terram dirigebas,& ſubito accepiſti gratiam Chriſti, ex malo ſervo factus es bonus Filius. Non ergo hic arrogantia eſt, ſed fides. Prædicare quod acceperis, non eſt ſuperbia ſed devotio. The firſt word of prayer, of what grace and ſweetneſſe it is, oh man, ſee and conſider. Thou durſt not lift thy face to heaven, but threw thine eyes downe to the earth, and ſuddenly thou receiveſt mercy in Chriſt ; of an evill ſervant,to be made a good Son. Here is no arrogancy,but faith. And to publiſh abroad what thou haſt received,is no pride, but devotion, ſaith the godly Father Ambroſe.

Rom.8.32. Mat.7.11. Eſay 49.15,16.

Ambr. lib.5.de Sacram. cap.4.

A third uſe of this word Father is, to put us in mind alſo of the duty of children : For wee may may not thinke, that we calling him daily by his tender Name of mercy and favour, and expecting at his hands the fruits of ſuch nature as his Name importeth, wee in the meane time looſly and lewdly may behave our ſelves, and neither before God nor man, walking as children, yet fooliſhly feed our ſelves with the hope of childrens benefits from their Father. There is no ſuch matter if wee take that courſe, but even as often as we open our mouths, and pray this prayer, ſo often even of our owne mouths, the Lord ſhall judge us, that wee calling him Father, yet live not, nor deſire to live in the duties of his children. O fearefull change of a ſweet Name, to a dreadfull witneſſe of woe unto us! Say then oh Father, but doe or indevour to do the office of a child. For it paſſed from him, and lyeth before us, to ſtand till Heaven and Earth periſh, hee expecteth it, and we are commanded it: If I bee your Father, where is my honour? If I bee your Maſter, where is my feare? And therefore well ſaid the godly Father, Quemadmodum nobis placemus de Deo Patre, ſic ſibi placeat & Deus de nobis. As we take pleaſure in God to be our Father, ſo let us doe, as he alſo may take pleaſure of us to be his children. Yea, well ſaith the word which we muſt never forget; Gird up the loynes of your mind, be ſober and truſt perfectly on the grace that is brought unto you by the revelation of Ieſus Chriſt, as obedient children, not faſhioning your ſelves unto the former luſt of your ignorance, but as be which hath called you is holy, ſo be you holy in all manner of converſation. And if he call him Father, which without reſpect of perſons, judgeth according to every mans worke paſſe the time of your dwelling here in feare, and ſo forth to the end of the Chapter.

And the Apoſtle Paul in like manner, I therefore being priſoner in the Lord, pray you that ye walk worthy the vocation, whereunto ye are called, with many other ſuch places. And certainly it is true, our ſinfull ſoules ſhal one day rue the proofe of it, if it be not warned: God heareth not ſinners: but if a man be a worſhipper of God, and doth his will, him heareth he. Yea therefore, marke it with a mind and a conſcience, carefull to performe the like evermore. How David both perſwaded the Lord to heare him, and ſtrengthened himſelfe in aſſurance to be heard, by performance of the duty of a childe, to him whom he called in his prayer his Father, either before or after. Before in theſe places, Save me for I have ſought thy precepts.

And againe, Let thy hand ſave me, for I have choſen thy precepts. And in the laſt verſe of that Pſalme, Seeke thy ſervant, for I doe not forget thy Commandements. With ſuch like ſpeeches many. Afterwards, as appeareth in the 145. Verſe, Heare mee oh Lord, and I will keepe thy ſtatutes.

By which practiſe of the Saint of God, we may make this aſſured, but dreadfull concluſion; That Father in mouth, and ſonne without ſenſe in life, maketh him of a Father a Judge, and turneth his favour into fury, his pitty into plagues, and our hoped health in Heaven, into aſſured woe in Hell for evermore.

Note.

Therefore, againe and againe, let us take this profit of this word Father, even to reforme us daily, as the Lord ſhall ſtrengthen, into the obedience of children. So ſhall we ſay in comfort with S. Iohn, Whatſoever we aſk, we receive of him, becauſe we keep his commandements, and do thoſe things which are pleaſing in his ſight. Yea, doe we no way ſtrengthen the error of merite hereby, but teſtifying hereby our ſelves in truth, not in a lying name and ſhew only, the children of God, both pleaſe the Lord with obedience of Faith, and comfort our ſelves in truth of promiſes altogether free, made by a good Father unto the ſame.

1 Iohn 3. 22.

A fourth fruit againe may be of this word Father in this beginning, even to prove unto the conſciences of the whole World, the ſufficiency and perfection of the worke of Chriſt for us. For by which God is ſo fully pacified and pleaſed, ſo contented and ſatisfied, as that of a Judge to puniſh, he becometh a Father to favour; and we of enemies, ſonnes and fellow heires with Chriſt, that is abſolute perfect, and every way full. But by the worke of Chriſt for us this is done, and wee in the knowledge thereof be ſo even by the ſame Chriſt commanded, not in the ſpirit of feare, but of Faith and comfort boldly to call him Father. Therefore the worke of Chriſt for us is moſt perfect, glorious, and abſolute. This giveth faith for feare, this giveth hope of ſafety from the power of all foes, from the ſtrength of the Law, from the ſting of Death, from the victory of the Grave, and from the maineſt might of all the kingdome of Hell that can bee rayſed againſt us. For we are juſtified, yea, fully juſtified, and who or what can now condemne us? we are ſonnes, and who can make us againe ſervants? we are friends, and who can make us foes? It is now my Father and your Father, my God, and your God, and what ſtrength of hels tenne thouſand can change this courſe? O word of comfort then commanded mee by Chriſt to pray in the name of Father. Deare God, and ſweet God, let our ſoules feele it. It is finiſhed, and why are wee feared? Were our ſinnes as Crimſon, as Scarlet, as blood, they are waſhed, they are wiped, they are gone. Were my wants the wants of the whole World, they are pardoned, they are forgiven, God is pleaſed, and is now my Father. O Saviour ſweet, make my thanks many: let my tongue, my voice, my heart, my ſoule, my whole man inward and outward reſound thy laſting praiſe. See, ſee, their ſinne that deviſe a daily Sacrifice for ſinne, either adding unto this moſt perfect redemption as if it wanted, ted, or elſe vainly doing by a worke of will what already is fully done by prefcript of God. Bee it that we paied a debt, and yet are troubled for it divers times and waies againe, muſt wee ſo often pay the debt againe as we are troubled? No, wee know it ſufficeth well to recurre ever to the payment once made, and making proofe thereof, wee ſtill eſcape ſuch vexing wrongfull action. So it is in this, the vertue, power, and efficacy of this Sacrifice is perpetuall, being once made, and needeth but by faith to be taken hold of and applyed, whenſoever we are troubled. The debt is payd, make but the proofe, and end this action. For, once hath he entred by his owne blood unto the holy place, and obtained eternall redemption for us. And with one offering hath hee conſecrated for ever them that are ſanctified.

Heb. 9.12.10. 14.

Why do we ſay, Our Father, and not my Father?

1 Charity.

This word againe hath his great reaſon, and profit to us in this preface. For firſt it teacheth us Charity towards our brethren in generall, whereſoever, and whoſoever they be, and a care as well of their good as of our owne. Which in this great corruption of nature is hard to be had, unleſſe we ſhould by ſuch admonitions as this, be drawne unto it. We rather as borne for our ſelves, live and care for our ſelves, in ſuch a ſelfe love, as God and man abhorreth. Wherefore the Lord Jeſus here commandeth in this word of community, that wee ſhould never thinke of our ſelves, never pray for our ſelves, but alſo together with our ſelves, for all others, even the whole Church of God in earth. For it is the fulneſs of the body of Chriſt, and therefore by that meanes deare unto us, if hee bee deare. It is that one body whereof wee are all members. And the bond of members ſo ſtrict, that we ſhould feele one anothers griefes, beare one anothers burthens, remember one anothers bonds, even as though we were bound with them, and them that are in affliction, as if we were alſo afflicted in body: yea, we are taught in this love, every man as he hath received the gift, to miniſter the ſame one to another, as good diſpoſers of the manifold graces of God, and by name, to pray one for another. For love never ſeeketh her owne things onely. This we forget too often, and therefore we fearefully pray without profit. Our hearts are narrow and ſtraight, onely looking at our ſelves and our owne, our children and friends: and the deare Saints of God, members alſo with us, are not thought upon. Alas wee judge it folly to be told us, that we ſhould thinke upon them, and ſinke or ſwimme, as we ſay, the Church of God, we care not ſo we be well. This is farre from Our Father, that is, farre from that affection that in this word we are taught to all men, and therefore certainely theſe Prayers thus made of us, moſt uſually without remembrance, care, and deſire of good to all Gods Church, as to our ſelves, is no ſweet meat before the Lord, but even a filthy ſmoake rather, that hee flieth from.

We muſt never pray for our ſelves with ſuch a private heart, but that wee wiſh the like mercie to all that have the like neede. Epheſ. 1.23. Epheſ.4.4. 1 Pet.4.10. Iames 5.16. 1 Cor.13.5.

Therefore let us remember this uſe of this word, if we wiſh to pray aright, and thinking of others in chriſtian love, as of our ſelves, intreat the Lord for them as for our ſelves. Beatus qui amat te, & amicum in te, & inimicũ propter te. Bleſſed is he that loveth thee, and his friend in thee, and his enemies for thee, ſaith the Father. That is, Bleſſed ever he or ſhe that reach out affection as they ought paſt themſelves to others. For, Dilectionis flammas Satan ferre non poteſt. The flame of Chriſtian Love and Charity, Satan the enemie of our bleſſedneſs cannot abide. But Dilectio donum Dei. This Love is the gift of God, and that Lord then grant it to us for ever.

2 Vnity. The great danger of ſchiſme. Mat.5.24. Mat.6.15.

Secondly, this word teacheth us unity with our brethren, conſent and agreement of minde, in Faith and Doctrine, and every good thing. For how elſe can wee call him Our Father, we being divided from the Church and members thereof, by Hereſie or Schiſme. The word ſhall import a communion with them in one Father, common to all, and our wicked wayward ſeparation of our ſelves from them ſhall deny the ſame. Therefore bee reconciled ever firſt to thy brother (ſaith the Scripture) before thou pray, or elſe thy prayer witneſſeth againſt thy ſelfe. And let not the Sunne goe downe upon thy wrath, if thou meane to pleaſe God.

3 Humility. Acts 10.

Thirdly, Humility is learned by it, not to exalt our ſelves above our brethren, paſt that which is meet, foraſmuch as we have all one Father, and ſuch an one, as is no reſpecter of perſons, but tenderly minded to all his children. Hee careth not for the puffes of this world, birth, beauty, wealth, or wit, nor for all the glory, wherewith commonly proud fleſh ſwelleth: but hee careth for thoſe that feare him, and worke righteouſneſſe, how meane ſoever they be. And when the fading faſhion of tranſitory condition is cut off by death, the determining of ſuch pride, then they as we with God accepted, as honorable, as wealthy, as beautifull in Heaven, where this traſh is troden under foot: yea, even more peradventure honoured, as they that have more honoured him in this life, where we with our pleaſure played the wantons, and vainely boaſted of a painted ſheath. There is neither Iew nor Grecian, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, but we are all one, in Chriſt Ieſus. It is Our Father, to the comfort of all hearts, that feare his Majeſty. Omnes Chriſtiani fideles diverſos in terris habent patres, alii nobiles, alii ignobiles: unũ verò Patrem invocant, qui eſt in Cœlis: Sub iſto Patre ſunt dominus et ſervus, Imperator & miles, dives & pauper. All faithfull Chriſtians here on earth (ſaith S. Auſten) have divers fathers, ſome noble, ſome unnoble, but they make their prayers but to one Father in heaven; and under this Father is maſter and ſervant, Emperour and ſouldier, rich and poore. Truth it is, and ſweet it is, to us poore wretches in this world, upon whom the Magnificoes of this earth looke ſo bigge, as if wee never ſhould be worthy to wipe their ſhooes, much leſſe accepted as their fellowes: Yea, peradventure before them, in a place of greater honour than the ſea of glaſſe here can ever bee. Wherefore let us joy in it, and remember to ſchoole our ſelves in our places, every one to ſhew favour fit, and due regard to every man in this preſent world: the Prince to the ſubject, the maſter to the ſervant, and every man and woman one to another: If I did condemne the judgement of my ſervant (ſaith holy Iob) or of my maide, when they did contend with mee: what then ſhall I doe when God ſtandeth up, and when he ſhall viſit mee, what ſhall I anſwer? Hee that made mee in the wombe, hath he not made him? Hath not he alone faſhioned us in the wombe? And receive him now (ſaith the Apoſtle Paul) not as a ſervant, but above a ſervant, even as a brother beloved, &c. Thus wee ſee the Chriſtian humility towards our brethren in this world, that is noted unto us as a thing fit for us ever, in this word, Our Father,

But it ſeemeth by this forme, that we may not at any time ſay in our prayers, My God, or Father, neither yet pray particularly, either for our ſelves, or any other. But in common ever.

No, you miſtake it: For as this community of affection is taught us, and this prayer that extendeth the deſire to the good of others, ſo is the Scripture full of warrants alſo, for both the particular applications of God unto a mans ſelfe, by the termes of My God, and Lord, and Father; and alſo for particular prayer, for our ſelves and others: Our Saviour ſaith, My Father: the Apoſtle, my God: the Prophet David in every Pſalme almoſt, and the prayers of Gods children for themſelves privately are extant: Davids, Pauls, Hannahs, with many moe.

Matt. 26. Philem.

But the matter is this, wee ſhould not, neither ever did any of theſe ſo particularly pray for themſelves, or any, but that there was ever in them (although not expreſſed) an eye, to commit by the fruit of their action, that thing, either tending to the enabling of them better to ſerve in Gods Church, which is a common good, or elſe as willingly wiſhed, though not in words, yet in truth of meaning to all, to whom it may ſtand in like ſtead, and for as much uſe and good. So are wee but ſpoiled, or all filthy ſelfe-love, without care for others, not forbidden to regard our ſelves, with like wiſh to others.

Why ſay we next, which art in heaven?

Two things in God, our Faith ought ever to bee aſſured of, or elſe wee pray not well, to wit, will to helpe us, and power. The one hath beene ſufficiently declared in the word Father, the other now in theſe is confirmed unto us. For by his being in heaven, appeareth his Majeſty, might and power, his rule and dominion over all things, whereby hee is able to goe through with the purpoſe of his good will towards us, that in nothing our hope of being heard may be hindred: I have ſworne by my ſelfe: the word is gone out of my mouth in righteouſneſſe, and ſhall not returne, that every knee ſhall bowe unto me, and every tongue ſhall ſweare by me.

His being in heaven, what ſpirituall uſe it hath to our ſoules. Eſay 54.23.

This Lord of ours raigneth, let the people tremble, he ſitteth betwixt the Cherubims, let the earth bee moved. This Lord is great in Sion, and hee is high above all people. Let the Kings of the earth band themſelves, and the Princes aſſemble together againſt the Lord, and againſt his Anointed: Let them purpoſe to breake his bands aſunder, and to caſt away his cords from them. Hee that dwelleth in the heavens ſhall laugh them to ſcorne, and this powerfull Lord of ours ſhall have them in deriſion. When hee purpoſed to doe his Church and children good, who or what could ever reſiſt that will? Bleſſe he or curſe, proſper or puniſh, give or take; whatſoever he will, that doth hee in heaven or earth, and none can let him. His power is Almighty, and therefore able ever to performe his will. This is one, the doctrine delivered us in theſe words, and the uſe of it is great. For many are the aſſaults of this life, the troubles of the fleſh, and the griefes of our mindes, dangerous are the darts of Satan againſt us often, and wee have no way to win reliefe, but from the Lord by prayer: Then ſteppeth in the greatneſſe of the matter, the multitude of enemies againſt it, the weakeneſſe of our ſelves in faith, in friends, in counſell and meanes, and in concluſion, a very impoſſibility as it were, in reaſon of the thing appeareth. But oh feare avant, and faith be ſtrong! for what will wants in a tender Father, or what power to him that dwelleth in the heavens? And we are purpoſely by Chriſt remembred of both theſe in this Prayer, that we might never doubt of either. hee is our Father, and hee is in heaven; that is, he is moſt willing, and ever able: then feare away. This comforted Chriſt in the pride of power againſt him, that even then his Father was able, if it pleaſed him, to giue him more than twelve legions of Angels, to fight for him againſt them. And this is written for us, whileſt the world endureth to be our comfort.

Note.

God would deliver Ioſeph his innocent ſervant, and he could doe it, though the credit of falſe report, in reſpect of the accuſer, were never ſo great. God would defend his Daniel, and hee could doe it, againſt all the ſpite of man, and power of roaring beaſts, ſo great and terrible. God would give paſſage thorow the maine ſea on foot, and he could in the moment of time performe his will. What ſhould we ſay? Many haue beene the troubles of the righteous, and ever the Lord able to deliver them out of all.

Matt. 28. 53. What God ever would doe, he ever could doe.

Hee

Hee is the ſame yeſterday and to day, and for ever. And therefore whatſoever befalleth us in this world, pray in the comfort of this ſweet conceit, that he is in heaven: (That is) God and Lord of all, able as willing, and willing as able, and ever both to doe us any good, if wee pray: for feare not the devill, nor death, nor hell, nor man, nor matter ever in this earth, but looke to the power of thy God to defend thee, to helpe and ſuccour thee in all thy diſtreſſes, and that power joyned with the will of a Father, whoſe bowels melt upon his child. O God and Father, ſweet and ſtrong, encreaſe our faith, encreaſe our feeling, and enlarge our hearts and ſoules to receive the uſe of theſe things, that aſſured of will, and aſſured of power, our prayers in faith may pierce thy dwelling place, and win our good on Chriſt for evermore. Amen.

The ſecond uſe of our Fathers being in heaven.

Secondly, theſe words ſerve to lift up our hearts and mindes from all earthly, baſe, and low conceits of the Lord: Yea, even to ſet us, as it were, out of our ſelves, and beyond all remembrance either of body or ſoule, in our heavenly elevation of inward powers to that Throne ſo high and glorious, the Seat of that mighty God wee pray unto: And conſequently, to make us aske nothing of him, that might bee unſeeming ſo Imperiall a Majeſty, to deale in, and to care for. But ever to remember that he being in heaven, and we in earth, he holy, and we unholy, he glory, and we ſhame, hee God, and we men. It is true that the Prophet ſaith; His thoughts are not our thoughts, his wayes our wayes. But as the heavens are mightier than the earth, ſo are his wayes higher than our wayes, and his thoughts above our thoughts.

Eſay 55. 8. 6.

To which end it ſerved alſo in the Church of old, as Cyprian witneſſeth, that the Paſtor being about to make publike prayers, ſhould cry to the people, Surſum corda. Lift up your hearts. And the people did anſwer, Habemus ad Dominum: Wee lift them up unto the Lord; thereby declaring that they thought of no baſe, and earthly, and low matters, but of the Lord, and the Lord in heaven, even as wee doe, and are ever taught by theſe words, Which art in Heaven.

The third uſe.

Thirdly, they ſerve to ſtrike us not a little, but ever thorow and thorow, with a reverence of his Majeſty whom we pray unto. For heaven, and the height of heaven, is his dwelling place, and wee ought moſt earneſtly ever to thinke of it, that we may come humbly to him. This cauſed the ſervants of God, not onely to crouch their bodies, but to bow their hearts, when they came before him, even the knees of their hearts, as thinking never their reverence great enough towards ſo mighty a God.

Pſal. 5. Pſal. 60. 4. 8. 27.

Heaven is his, earth is his, hell is his, all is his. Devouring fire goeth before his face, and mighty tempeſts are ſtirred up about him. He rideth upon the heavens, as it were upon an horſe: yea, the earth ſhaketh, and the heavens droppe at the preſence of him. His Chariots are twenty thouſand, even thouſands of Angels.

Pſal. 29. 3, &c.

It is he that commandeth the waters, it is this glorious God that maketh the thunder. It is he that ruleth the ſea: It is his voice that is mighty in operation, yea, and a glorious voice. Such a voice as breaketh the Cedar-trees, yea, the Cedars of Lybanus: ſuch a voice as divideth the flames of fire, and ſhaketh the wilderneſſe, even the wilderneſſe of Cades. Let us make haſte therefore with that great ſervant of God, Moſes, and bow our ſelves to the earth and worſhip: Yea, let us in the true conceit and reverence of his mighty Majeſty, cover as it were our faces with our mantles, when we pray unto him. So ſhall we come before him rightly, and ſhew the uſe of his glorious dwelling in the heavens, noted unto us. But alas, where is it with thouſands thouſands, that yet take themſelves to be great Chriſtians?

Exod. 34. 8.

We clap our ſelves downe to pray, and we think of any thing rather than of the mighty Majeſty of him before whom we are come; and therefore we gaze here and gaze there; we note this man, and that woman; their geſture, their apparell; yea, the leaſt toy (eſpecially ſtrange about them) and yet we pray well, we huddle and tumble up in haſte the labour of lips without touch of heart, and the faſter the better: wee long to have done, for feare dinner bee marred, and yet wee pray well: wee gape and wee yawne, wee hem and wee hawke, not for neceſſity of nature which is allowed, but in the drowſineſſe of the ſpirits, and to ſhew our authority, wee are chiefe men in the Church, &c. and yet we pray well. But oh we ſenceleſſe wretches in this behalfe, for then come we rightly before the Lord, as wee learne here, when remembring that hee is in heaven, that is, of ſuch glory, majeſty, and power, as hath been declared, wee throw downe our ſoules and bodies, in all reverence and comely feare before him, ſpeaking to him as duſt and aſhes, to the immortall King of heaven and earth, humbly, even with a reverent trembling as it were, and affection of all parts, leaſurely, carefully, heartily, and with all true properties and teſtimonies of a minde, conſidering the puiſſance, the might, the glory, and Imperiall Majeſty of him to whom we ſpeake. Which whether theſe things that I named declare in us or no, let all Chriſtian hearts be judges. It is too true, they convince us of the contrary, and therefore in dread of their witneſſe, (to our woe) at the day of Doome, let us leave them, and uſe the place of Prayer as we ſhould, in all humble, lowly, and poſſible reverence. We are ſo willed, and by Chriſt himſelfe, that ſhall judge us if we doe not. To this end we ſay it, ever thinke of it, which art in Heaven.

Laſtly,

Laſtly, this notation of the place where our God dwelleth, teacheth us, that our prayers are not tied to any certaine place, as in old times, neither bettered by any place, be it this Mountaine, or Ieruſalem, or whatſoever: But the howre commeth, yea, now is, that the true worſhippers ſhall worſhip the Father in Spirit and Truth, and in every place have liberty and leave to lift up your hands to his Majeſty; in every place, he ſaith, and marke it. And why ſo? For our God is in heaven, and heareth every where, without reſpect of place now. I meane without reſpect of place as then, touching any Commandement from him of particular place, but not hereby to overthrow any civill order, for better meeting together in appointed Churches of Gods people Yet even herein beware of ſuperſtition againe afreſh in reſpect of place, more than elſwhere, when true warrant beareth me out, as well then, as in the Church at other times, to make my prayer. But of Churches, and publike meetings there, enough hath beene ſaid before. Where it may be read againe if you will.

The uſe of Churches not overthrowne by liberty of place to pray in, under the Goſpell.

Great is the uſe I ſee well of this ſhort preface, ſo often ſaid, and ſo little thought of: but now I pray you, let me aske a queſtion: Doth not this invocation of God by the name of Father, exclude both the other Perſons, Sonne, and Holy Ghoſt, from both our ſpeech and meaning?

No indeed; for the name of Father, being oppoſed to creatures, is taken eſſentially, not perſonally, and agreeth rightly to all the three Perſons in Trinity, being in eſſence, nature and ſubſtance one; and ſo is it here. But if it be put and joyned with any other perſon of the Trinity, then is it not taken eſſentially, but perſonally, and agreeth to that perſon onely, and ſo is it not here: For you ſee here in this prayer, there is no mention either of Sonne or holy Ghoſt, together with this word of Father: which if there were, then ſhould it be a name of perſon, and not of eſſence: but here is onely mention of Father granting, and creatures asking: and therefore Father, a name of eſſence, comprehending Father, Sonne and Holy Ghoſt. As it doth divers times in Scripture. Eſay, the ninth Chapter, calleth Chriſt the everlaſting Father. The Apoſtle ſaith, Though there be that are called Gods, whether in heaven or in earth, as there be many gods, and many lords, yet unto us there is but one God, which is that Father, of whom are all things, and we in him.

1 Cor. 8.

In which place, the name Father includeth Sonne and Holy Ghoſt. But the name Father is put downe, becauſe it is the beginning of the Deity. So in the fourteenth of Iohn, and elſewhere. Wherefore though we are taught in this forme of Prayer, to ſay, Our Father, yet doe we pray to all the three Perſons, without exception of any, becauſe ſo the Name Father includeth.

The name Father ſet downe becauſe it is Principium Deitatis, the beginning of the Deitie.

But the Scripture calleth Chriſt our Brother: how is he then our Father?

Very well by diſtinction of two natures: he is our Father in reſpect of his Godhead, and he is our brother by reaſon of manhood.

Yet I am not ſatisfied. For thus me thinke is reaſon againſt you. He that receiveth us into favour for Chriſt, and granteth our petitions for Chriſt, that is not Chriſt himſelfe. For there is a manifeſt diſtinction of perſons implyed in it: but this Father here, whom we call Father in the Lords Prayer, receiveth us, heareth us, and helpeth us for Chriſt: and therefore this Father in this place cannot be Chriſt.

You trouble your ſelfe in an eaſie matter, and you do not diſtinguiſh as we needs muſt doe to keepe a truth in theſe cauſes. I told you before there are two natures in Chriſt, and divers ſeverall things in that one perſon, in reſpect of thoſe ſeverall natures. Now you muſt conſider againe, that in Chriſt there is a nature of Godhead, and an office of a Mediator betwixt God and man; he and his office are ſeverall things, yet he one Chriſt. Then concerning your major propoſition, true it is, that he that receiveth us into favour, and heareth and helpeth us for Chriſt, is not Chriſt himſelfe in that one reſpect, but in another he is. For Chriſt as Mediator, is he for whom we are received, heard and helped: but as God, it is he alſo that receiveth, heareth, and helpeth. So doth diſtinction of things, ſeverally to bee conſidered, anſwer your doubt, and leave Chriſt included in this word and name of Father in this Prayer: as well as any other perſon.

Then this nomination of him to be in heaven, how agreeth it to him that is in every place? Doth it not reſtraine that ubiquity of his?

Vbiquity.

No indeed, no more than other ſpeeches in Scripture doth, which yet at the firſt bluſh ſeeme to do it, as this doth. Wherefore that we may underſtand both this and them, let us remember, that not onely in this Prayer God is ſaid to be in heaven, but the Prophet alſo ſaith, He hath prepared his ſeat in heaven, and many other places the like.

Then againe it is ſaid, Do not go up, for the Lord is not with you. Thirdly, If any man love mee, I and my Father will come to him, &c. Which comming and going ſhould ſeeme to refringe his ubiquitie.

But concerning the firſt, we are to know, that in theſe or any other places, God is not meant to be in heaven either circumſcriptively as men limitted by place here, and not elſewhere for that time, either definitively, as Angels by propriety of their ſubſtance, but (that we ſo ſpeake) repletively, becauſe with his abſence he repleniſheth and filleth heaven and earth, and all places, as the Prophet ſaith.

Pſal. 103. 19.
Eſay 66. 1.

Againe,

Againe, becauſe there, as in his Throne and place of greateſt dignity, he ſheweth his power, his wiſdome, his goodneſſe and Majeſty, more than in other places of the world, and therehence more revealeth and declareth the ſame, than from any other place: The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament ſheweth his handie worke. The Lord heareth the heavens, and the heavens the earth, the earth the corne, and the corne the people. From heaven the wrath of God is revealed againſt all ungodlineſſe. From heaven he ſendeth his Angels, from heaven the Sonne of Man deſcendeth, from Heaven the holy Spirit commeth, and from heaven ſhall hee come to iudge the quicke and the dead. Wherefore in theſe reſpects and a number like, heaven is called his Throne, and he is ſaid there to be more than in all other places; and we when wee pray, lifting our eyes and mindes up to this chiefe Throne of his Maieſty, when it pleaſeth him to communicate life, motion, light, and all goodneſſe to his ſervants, ſay, Our Father which art in heaven.

Pſal.19.2.

Hoſea 2.24. Rom.11.8.

Eſay 66.1.

And remember with your ſelf, that even in the ſame place where heaven is called his Throne, the earth alſo is called his Foote-ſtoole, as noting his preſence, notwithſtanding every where, though his Seat be prepared in heaven: And what place will you build unto mee, ſaith the Lord, that is, how may I be apprehended of any one place, that am infinite, and fill all places? Nothing therefore this clauſe in our prayer infringeth his ubiquitie.

Touching the ſecond thing, that God is ſaid in the Scripture not to be with ſome men ſometimes, wee muſt underſtand, it is not meant of his eſſence, as though that were not in ſome places, but of his efficacy and working by his holy Spirit, and by his ſtrength to ſave and deliver ſometimes.

Num.14.

Thus is not the Lord in the reprobate and wicked. For what is it to be in a place rightly and fully, but as in his owne proper place, there to rule and raigne, and to exerciſe his power to the good of the place, which the Lord doth not in the wicked? Thus was it told the people, that God was not with them, and therefore they ſhould go up; namely, not to fight on their part, not to ſave them and deliver them by his power and ſtrength, otherwiſe by his eſſence hee was with them, and he is every where.

How God is ſaid to be neere or farre off. Eſay 55.

This well conſidered, giveth a light to divers places of Scriptures, where it is ſaid, the Lord is neere or farre off, telling us they are meant, not of his eſſence, but of his grace, which grace when it is mercifully offered to men and women, by the Word preached unto them, by bleſſings and comforts beſtowed upon them, able to move a heart of ſteele to thinke of a gracious God that giveth ſuch gifts; then is the Lord ſaid to bee neere, and when unkindly (notwithſtanding all his goodneſſe) he hath beene reiected, deſpiſed, and refuſed, and thereupon ceaſeth to offer us any more favour, but ſhutteth up his compaſſion towards us; then is he ſaid to bee farre off. Thus is it meant in the Prophet, Call upon him while he is neere: That is, I have now ſhewed whileſt his arme is ſtretched out to you, and his mercy offered in ſuch ſort as it is.

How God is ſaid to be more in one man or place, than in another.

This alſo conſidered, teacheth us how God may be ſaid to be more in one man than in another, and more in one place than in another, namely, ſtill not in reſpect of eſſence, which is equally in all places, and wholly in all places, but in reſpect of more or leſſe, after the gift of his grace, to one perſon than to another, or to one place than to another. Of which it may be true that Gregory ſaid, Deus qui omnia tangit, non æqualiter omnia tangit: God that toucheth all things, yet toucheth not all things alike.

Tom. 2. in Ezek. hom. 8. pag. 130.

How God is ſaid to go and come.

By this may the third thing partly be underſtood, to wit, how God is ſaid in Scripture to come and go away, and yet no breach made of his ubiquity, namely, becauſe ſuch ſpeeches are never to be meant of his eſſence, or mutation of place, (for ſo departeth he from none) but of inward or outward effects of his holy Spirit, according to which given or taken away, the Lord is ſaid to come or to go from men and places, as he departed from David, when he left him juſtly for his grievous ſinnes, deſtitute of the peace of his conſcience, of the cheerefulneſſe of his minde, the cleanneſſe of his heart, the quietneſſe of his affections, and other gifts of his holy Spirit, which before David had in great meaſure: Whereupon he was forced to crie, O Lord create a cleane heart within me, and renue a right ſpirit, O Lord give me the comfort of thy Spirit againe, and let the bones which thou haſt broken rejoyce. On the other ſide, he is ſaid to come, when againe he beginneth to worke by his holy Spirit, and to ſtirre up faith, repentance, love, hatred of ſinne, and ſuch like. Thus meant our Saviour when he ſaid, I and my Father will come unto him, and dwell with him. And this of inward graces. Outwardly alſo the Lord is to come, Ergo, when either by outward croſſes he ſo humbleth us, as though he had forſaken us, and departed in anger from us; ſo that we are conſtrained with David to ſay, My God why haſt thou forſaken me: or when he ſo defendeth us, comforteth us, and bleſſeth us, that the world that ſeeth it, is driven to ſay and ſee as Saul did of David, that the Lord is with us. So his abſence, is the abſence of his effects in us, and for us, and his preſence or comming, is the preſence and gift of them, either inward our outward.

Pſal.15.

Pſal.22.1.

1 Sam.13.28.

Wherefore to go no further, I hope it is plaine enough now, that though we ſay our Father is in heaven, yet we are farre from denying therein, or thereby his divine ubiquity and preſence every every where. But even as the ſoule of man, which is wholly in the whole, and in every part, yet is ſaid to be in the head or heart more than elſewhere, becauſe there, more than elſewhere, it exereiſeth his power and effects. So God, though by eſſence every where, and in all places wholly, yet by action, operation, and communication of grace and gifts not equally in all parts, but in heaven, more than in earth, in the godly, more than the wicked, and in one of his children more than other; in the Saints in heaven, more than in the Saints in earth; and in the humane nature of Chriſt, more than in any creature either in heaven or earth, as in whom the fulneſſe of grace and ſpirit without meaſure was. Howbeit, yet in a more excellent manner God dwelt in Chriſt, than by fulneſſe of grace and gifts, or by manifeſtation of his vertue and power, as might be ſhewed, if the place required it. But thus much of this matter. Now if you thinke good, to the Petitions themſelves.

The firſt PETITION.

Hallowed be thy Name.

THat we may herein proceed with more plainneſſe of ſpeech, let us generally obſerve the diviſion or number of theſe Petitions, the order of them, and the matter and meaning of them. Touching the diviſion of them, I will not curiouſly ſtand upon it. Saint Auguſtine, and many after him, by his example, make ſeven, dividing the laſt into two: but their reaſons are very inſufficient, as may be ſeene. And Auguſtine himſelfe, contrary to himſelfe, confeſſeth that thoſe words, But deliver us from evill, are an explication of the former, Lead us not into temptation. And therefore by conſequence unfitly made a Petition of it ſelfe: for in ſo ſhort a ſumme of ſo few Petitions, one to be confounded with another, and to be all one, is not probable. Others make ſix, and they rather are to be followed.

Three things conſidered.

Enchiridion, Chap. 116.

For the order of them, this is to be obſerved, that three of them reſpect immediatly and chiefly Gods glory: other three, our neceſſities and wants: thoſe that concerne the Lord are placed before the other, even as in the law of God, thoſe foure Commandements that contain mans duty to God, are ſet before the other ſix, that containe his duty to his neighbour. Which being done of purpoſe in the depth of his unſearchable wiſdome, that laid this forme downe for us, Chriſt Jeſus, containeth in it a leſſon of great regard, to a minde poſſeſſed with the feare of God and care of bounden duty: Namely, that the honour of God ought to be more deare unto us, than either body or goods, or any profit of ours whatſoever in this world, yea which is far more, than the very ſoules within us, and the ſalvation of them in the world to come.

The Petitions concerning Gods glory firſt.

For ſo both the Lord God himſelfe, the Compoſer of this Prayer, and the giver of body, goods, and ſoule, and all, teacheth in the ſixth of Matthew. And the power of his holy Spirit in the practice of his ſervants, confirmeth and ſheweth evidently. For principally and above all, ſaith the Lord Jeſus, Seeke the kingdome of God, and the righteouſneſſe thereof, and all theſe other things ſhall be caſt upon you. Which words, if a man would demand a reaſon of the order of theſe three Petitions before the other of our Saviour, containe, as you ſee, even a full anſwer, to wit, Gods glory is more chiefe, and therefore ought to be firſt: but theſe three Petitions immediatly reſpect that, and therefore ought to be firſt. The power then of Gods Spirit in the practice of the godly, we ſee alſo in Moſes, the great ſervant of Almighty God, and in Paul his elect veſſell, to beare his name unto the Gentiles: who both of them in the flaming heat of a burning zeal to the glory of the name of God wiſhed the ſame, with the raſing of themſelves out of the Book of life, and curſe of his wrath to the woe eternall of their owne ſoules for ever, in that place of perdition and death, as is laid downe unto us. A fruit in them of a mighty working Spirit, and commended to us in the word for ever, to tell us what ought to be.

Mat. 6. 33.

Exod. 32. 32. Rom. 9. 3.

See then even at our beginning, when we pray like Saints and ſonnes of God, like dutifull children affected rightly to their Father, even then when we fall before him with hearts and mindes, nothing ſo carefull to gaine our own good, as to win the glory and honor of his name, and the content of his holy, bleſſed, and moſt good will. And therefore looke into our petitions earneſtly, how and which way they ſerve to that, before we make them, and then beg them ſpecially for that end. And even then, I ſay, when we feele in the ſecret teſtimony of an inward conſcience, ſuch a flame of love wrought by a gracious Spirit, beyond power of ſinfull nature to our God in us, as that if any preferment of ours, benefit and good in the courſe of this world ſhould be found of us to fight againſt his glory, by and by we finde content, nay not a content only, but even a reſtleſſe poſting haſt, and burning heate to renounce it, to defie it, and to ſpit at it: yea, were it ſuch glory of us in this world as ever Prince enjoyed, and not onely ſo againe, Gods glory more to be cared for, than our owne ſalvation, if they ſhould come in compariſon together. Note.

but even a moſt willing minde, together with the want of that worldly glory or good whatſoever, to wit alſo, as hath been ſhewed, eternall glory, and good in heaven, ſo that our God and Father might thereby be honoured. But oh where are we? Where are we in this affection? Wo to our weakneſſe, & alas our want. Yet let us ſee what ſhould be, let us confeſſe what is not, and God for his Chriſts ſake grant us mercy. Something is ſomething, and ever comfortable, nothing is ſinfull and ever damnable. This love to the Lord, and zeale to his glory, it is his gift, and where he will, he giveth it. Though we be weake, he is ſtrong, and there is no fleſh but he can aide it, neither any heart, but he can change it, only let us ſee our want, and ſeeke our good, and certainly we ſhall finde the ſame with him. This world endeth, and God knoweth how ſoone, and even this night before the next may my ſoule be taken from me, and then all my care for the cauſes of this world, where is it? or whoſe is it? It cannot go with me, it ſhall not follow after me, but ſtrangers perhaps ſhall enter upon my labours, and my cares ſhall make them mighty, that will joy in the lack and loſſe of me. If I have followed then this, and neglected the other, woe is begun, and it ſhall never end with me. But if I have cared but competently for this with the other, and ever in the power of given grace more for the other than for this, be it unto me an end when it pleaſeth God, his mercies ſhall drive my labours to the good of thoſe I here loved, and that my love of him, and zeale to his glory ſhall follow me, remain with me, and weare the crowne of Gods mercy for evermore in heaven.

Luke.

Thus is it a bleſſed thing to love Gods glory, and to ſeeke his kingdome with conſcience of duty, and feeling of a future ſtate: and it is as curſed a thing, only to ſeeke our ſelves, and care for even a kingdome in this world, if it were we could get it, much leſſe for far inferiour preferments, and ſo thereby with the love of them to be devoured and eaten up, as that all ſpeech and talke, and thoughts of the other is very odious to us, and a mockery with us. You ſee the world, the dayes and times, and you know my meaning. Remember the place of theſe three petitions before the other, and remember God in Samuel, They that honor me, them will I honor, and they that deſpiſe me, they ſhall be deſpiſed: and I end with them. Jeſus Chriſt in the benefit of his blood give us care and feeling.

1 Sam.2.

The diviſion then of them, and number, as alſo the order of theſe three before the other, you thus obſerve. Now for the matter and meaning of this firſt, if you will, Hallowed be thy name.

This ſhall we then underſtand, when we know what is compriſed and meant by the two words in it, Name and Hallowed. And therefore concerning the firſt, we are to be advertiſed, that although no one name wherewith the Lord is called in the Scripture, as Iehovah, Elohim, Shaddai, or ſuch like, ſhould either in minde be conceived and thought, or in voice with words expreſſed and ſpoken without moſt high reverence as duty is, yet are none of thoſe names in this place meant, and much leſſe any Judaicall or Popiſh ſuperſtition in any of them confirmed. The Jewes for their Iehovah, this is no warrant. But the name of God ſignifieth here that Majeſty of God, power and infinite vertue that ſhineth, ſheweth it ſelfe in every thing ſo wonderfully.

Even as it is uſually taken in the Scriptures, and for the moſt part ſignifieth in the Prophet, when he ſaith: From the riſing of the Sun, unto the going downe of the ſame, my name is great amongſt the Gentiles, and in every place inceuſe ſhall be offered unto my name, and a pure offering: for my name is great among the Heathen, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts. And Father, glorifie thy name. And Baptize in the name of the Father, the Son, and the holy Ghoſt.

Malac.1.1. Iohn 12.28. Mat.28.

Whereas, I ſay, the word ſignifieth not any letters or ſyllables in tongue, or that, but that power and vertue of God, ſhineth in all things. So againe, in the name of Chriſt the Apoſtles caſt forth devils, that is, in the power, and ſtrength, and vertue of Chriſt: for ſo S. Peter expoundeth in the Acts, when he ſaith, It was not their power and godlineſſe that had made the man goe, but it was the Name of that Holy one and Iuſt, whom they had betrayed, that is, his power and godlineſſe, his ſtrength and vertue, not theirs. So, at the name of Ieſus ſhall every knee bow, that is, not when the word is pronounced we ſhall make a cuſteſie, but we ſhall all and every creature be ſubject to his power, authority, and dominion: for by name there Jeſus is meant Dominatio & poteſtas, Domination and power: and genu flectionis vocabulo exprimitur ſubjectio, by bowing there is expreſſed and meant, ſubjection to that Dominion and power. But perhaps with more plainneſſe it may be noted, that the name of God here reſpecteth three things chiefly: to wit, Marke 16.17. Acts 3.12.& 16 Philip.2.16. Verſ. 11.

Himſelfe.
His workes.
His word.

The name of God, what it is.

If we conſider the Lord himſelfe, then we ſee in him ever Majeſty and holineſſe. And this is his name. If we conſider his workes, we ſee juſtice, mercy, and power in them. And this is his name. And if we conſider his word, there is ever truth, wiſdome, and goodneſſe in it, and this this also his name. So that we may conclude this place even as he that said it, Nomen Dei dicitur, omne id quod de illo prædicatur: By the name of God is here meant, whatsoever it is that truly of him may be affirmed, as that he is good, just, gracious, &c.

And this shall have warrant evident and plaine, even from the Lord himselfe, in that manifestation of himself to his servant Moses, where he saith, he will make all his good go before him, and proclaime the name of the Lord before him, and doing so indeed, his name is neither this word nor that, as Iehovah, Tetragrammaton, or such like, either in Hebrew or Greek, this tongue or that, but it is this: The Lord, the Lord strong, mercifull, and gracious, slow to anger, and abundant in goodnesse and truth, reserving mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, and not making the wicked innocent, visiting the iniquity of the Fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation. See then the great and glorious name what it is. Exod 33.19. Exod 34.&c.

And what is meant, I pray you, by Hallowing of that name.

To hallow or to sanctifie, signifieth two things. Either to make holy that which before was not so, but polluted and uncleane. In which sort our Saviour Christ doth hallow and sanctifie us, making us of the sinfull sons of Adam, the righteous sons of God in himselfe. Either else that which of it selfe, and in it selfe is already holy, so to repute and take, so with all reverence to acknowledge and confesse, and so ever to use and to speake of. In which sense againe, wisedome that of her selfe is most just, is said to be justified of her children, that is, to be so esteemed, judged and taken. And in the third of Iohn, He that hath received his testimony (saith he) hath sealed that God is true: That is, nothing but this doth cause and bring to passe, that God as hee is in himselfe indeed true and truth it selfe, so he is acknowledged of others to be. Now in this latter signification it is taken here; and therefore thus expounded by the learned: Sanctificari, hic, est revelari, observari, glorificari, honorari, vere agnosci: To be hallowed here, is to be revealed, observed, glorified, honoured, and truly acknowledged. Of the Greeke article Dineus, pag. 108. I. Iohn 3.33. What hallowing the name of God is.

And againe, Sanctificari Dei nomen dicitur, cum sacrum, venerabile, purum, augustum esse à nobis agnoscitur & prædicatur, & nullo modo contemptim, aut irreverenter cogitetur aut sumatur. The Name of God is said to be hallowed, when it is confessed and published, as holy, reverend, pure, and high, and such as by no means is either thought of, or taken of us contemptibly or unreverently. So that in plaine speech this petition is thus much: O Lord let that Majesty and holinesse that is in thy self, that justice, mercy and power, which thou shewest in thy works, and that truth, wisdome, and goodnesse which is in thy word, with all thy vertue generally whatsoever comprehended in thy nature, and fit for the knowledge and use of man, be more and more daily knowne of man, and received among us, with that dread, and honor, and reverence, that is fit for such a name, both in word and worke, thought and deed, and every way.

A notable request sure, and well beseeming the sons of God, desirous of their Fathers glory. But thus me thinke you do not restrain it only to man: so that in man only this glory of his name is to appeare.

No indeed, neither ought I: But know it as a fault in Tertullian and Cyprian so to do. For so large is the reach of this Petition, as that it toucheth not only men, godly and ungodly, reprobate or elect, but even all things in this world whatsoever, then to be ordained of the Lord. For in the very least thing appeareth some Majesty, power, eternity, and vertue of him, which in this Petition we desire, as well may appeare, and be seen and celebrated to the praise of him, as those greater matters that are in man. And therefore cryeth the Prophet of God in the Psalme, to all creatures to praise the Lord: Sun, and Moone, and Stars, and light, Heaven and earth, Dragons, deeps, fire and water, haile and snow, winde and vapours, stormes and tempests, mountaines and hills, trees, beasts, cattell, wormes, and all feathered fowles, and in conclusion, every thing, to exalt, hallow, and sanctifie the name of the Lord: For his name only is excellent, and his praise above heaven and earth. And to the same end is the hundred and fourth Psalm, a very notable song of David also, teaching us plainly, that in all the workes of the Lord, there is a portion of this his Name, that is, of his Majesty, power, wisdome, and godlinesse, which in this Petition, and by these words we ought to beg of him, which may appeare, bee seene, noted, marked and observed, and celebrated in this world to his glory. So that you see prayer doth not meane only man, but all things, in that order that I have declared. Every thing as is better and better knowne, containing matter and argument of Gods praise, either in respect of workmanship, use, nature, all or some.

Yet it respecteth man chiefly, as the word of God, wherein he hath shewed himselfe most, and laid downe largest arguments to the glory of his name.

It doth so, and therefore so let us thinke of it. And first see how it beggeth for us knowledge and understanding still more and more of his name and nature, because knowledge goeth before obedience. Which request of knowledge carrieth with it an industry and endeavour in us in all diligence, ever to observe the Lord in his workes, to marke the power, the wisdome, the goodnesse of him in creating them, and in giving such nature, use, and operation to them, in disposing them in such an order, in continuing them in such a course, and so forth, and condemneth the too too common and damnable dulnesse of the world in so continuall use, and so little a regard of theſe things, being the maine cauſe of grievous unthankfulneſſe, and not ſanctifying of the name of God in us.

Secondly, we begin it, as one ſaith, Non modo ut nomen Dei in intellectu per fidem & notitiam Dei, verum etiam ore, corpore, vitaq́, tota ſanctificetur & glorificetur: Not only that the name of God in our underſtanding by faith and knowledge of God, but alſo in mouth, body, and our whole life may be ſanctified and glorified. Of which hallowing of the name of God, ſpeaketh the Lord himſelfe by his Prophet, ſaying, I will ſanctifie my great name, which was polluted among the Heathen, &c.

Ezek. 36.23.

How will he do it, or what is this ſanctification? Mark how it followeth. I will powre cleane water upon you, and you ſhall be clean: yea, from all your filthineſs, & from all your Idols will I cleanſe you. A new heart alſo will I give you, and a new ſpirit will I put within you, and I will take away the ſtony heart out of your body, and give you an heart of fleſh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cauſe you to walk in my Statutes, and you ſhall keep my judgements, and do them. So that then is the great name of the Lord ſanctified you ſee and hallowed, when we do not only know, but do the things that redound unto his praiſe. For then they that ſee our good works, are therby cauſed to glorifie God in the day of the viſitation. And even contrariwiſe againe, if we doe not, we pollute the name of the Lord, in cauſing it to ſound evill amongſt the wicked, and the ſin is grievous. Of which complaineth the Lord by his Prophet Eſay, when he ſaith, His name all the day continually is blaſphemed: And by his Apoſtle to the Romans, in divers other places. And the ſame Apoſtle charging ſervants that are under the yoke, to account their Maſters worthy of all honour, maketh this the reaſon why, Leſt the name of God and his doctrine be evill ſpoken of. And therefore thirdly, as we ſeeke the one, ſo we deſire to be able to ſhun the other in this Petition, beſeeching him in the ſenſe of theſe words, that all thoſe things may be removed, overturned, and taken away, which prophane, blemiſh, or blot that glory of his, either in himſelfe, or in his workes, or in his word and doctrine.

Thirdly, what we pray againſt in this Petition.

Pſal. 104. 35.

Such as are theſe damnable Atheiſts of theſe latter dayes, which with their jeſts, ſcoffes, and mockes, deriding all goodneſſe, do not only diſhonour the name of God, but to their everlaſting woe, in the flames of the burning bottomleſſe pit, affirme it flatly in their hearts, that there is no God at all. Such are they that with their cenſures will correct the workes of God, and ſpeake evill of them, complaine of his providence, and murmure at his judgements, carpe and cavill at his Word, allure unto looſeneſſe, and daily worke diſdaine of commanded obedience, which all, if they be not reformed, are prayed againſt throughout the world by all the children of God daily in this Petition, to their unſpeakable terror of them, if they had grace to thinke of it. For how certaine is that vengeance, which he that ſendeth it, biddeth aske: and how dreadfull muſt it needs be, and even importable when it commeth, which is ſo often, ſo earneſtly, and by ſuch a number as the whole Church of God on earth is, in ſo many places asked, begged, and cryed for? O woe not once thought upon, and yet to be trembled at, ſhall it not be remembred indeed? Shall theſe painted daies ſo poyſon us quite with the love of this world, and the fading follies of a moſt uncertaine eſtate, that all grace and goodneſſe ſhall be contemned of us? And whereas the Prophet of God ſaid, One day in the Courts of the Lords houſe, is better than a thouſand, We ſay the contrary, that but one houre there is too much, though it be but once a weeke, nay once in many weekes, and one day in the courſe of this world, to the which yet the Apoſtle ſaith, Faſhion not your ſelves, is better and ſweeter, and more beſeeming a man, eſpecially a great man, than a thouſand in the other: Is it likely that ever we will wiſh our ſelves with that Prophet, rather doore-keepers in the houſe of God, than to dwell in great renowne in the tents of the ungodly; when we either loure or laugh to be told, we ſhould come in? Can it be hoped, that either now we doe thinke (God often puniſhing ſuch great contempt with laſting blindneſſe) that they are bleſſed that dwell in the houſe of the Lord, being ever praiſing of God, yea, that the very Swallows and Sparrowes that are there, are as it were happy and bleſſed? O it is to be feared no! And therefore not Davids prayer, not Davids Spirit, neither conſequently that election to life, whereof that Spirit is a certain pledge; which is terrible enough, if God were in us. Think of it, and thinke of this againe with it, that all the Church of God thorow the world, as I have ſaid, pray againſt us, when we are thus irreligious and prophane, ſaying, Hallowed be thy name, that is, O Lord confound with ſpeedy curſe of death and woe eternall, all thoſe that not living in the lawes of thy will, cauſe thy name to heare evill, and to be blaſphemed in this world. Let them periſh, O Lord, let them periſh in the luſts of their own hearts, and give thy name his glory: which if hell have not already taken poſſeſſion of us, will pierce us, and make us thinke of reformation of our ſelves: the Lord in mercy grant it.

Pſal. 84.

Rom. 12. Pſal. 84. 1.

That the names of all fained gods being utterly aboliſhed, the only divine name and Majeſty of God the heavenly Father be had in honor, and called upon with pure mindes by men of all ages, countries, and parts of the world.

Amen, Amen. And if it do not, time paſſeth, and time commeth, the which two times ſhall differ, as mercy and judgement differ, favour and fury, love and lothing. And the word of the Lord ſhall not deceive us, ſaying, Vengeance is mine, and I will repay; but how ſoon, that know not we. But well we know, the Lord is not ſlacke concerning his promiſe, as ſome men count ſlackneſſe, but he is patient towards us, and would have all men come to repentance, and one day is with the Lord as a thouſand yeares, yeeres, and a thousand yeeres as one day, and this day will come.

But now I pray you let me move a doubt or two unto you. And first why the Church of God should pray that the Lords Name may be hallowed, which is already, ever was, and shall be most holy, pure, and glorious?

How Gods name is unhallowed and polluted, you may further see in the second commandement. Rom. 12. 2 Pet. 3. 9. Verse 8. Verse 10.

Because we doe not pray it, in respect of him, but of our selves and others, such as wee are: For the Lord indeed is holy, neither can any thing be added to that holinesse or glory of him to make it more, but we doe not know it, so much as we should doe, neither speake of it, and imitate it as we ought: And therefore we pray that as he is indeed, so more and more it may appeare and shine out to the World, all lets and hinderances being taken away, that his due praise may be given unto him of us, that is, we pray not in this Petition, that any holinesse may be added to his Name, that already it hath not, but that as it is in it selfe indeed, and ever, so we may have grace to see and confesse, and more and more daily may bee revealed, and manifested to this world. For the Lord is said to sanctifie us, either inwardly or outwardly. Inwardly by his Spirit, outwardly by his Word, and this againe either by separating us from our sins, quickning us by his holy Spirit, or continuance of them both.

He sanctifieth us by making us holy, we him by confessing him holy, &c.

Another doubt is, why it should be said in that place, And he that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still. Seeing here we are taught to pray, and all men, that our lives may be holy and pure ever, to the end his glorious name may have praise thereby.

Apoc. 22. 11.

That place you meane, is not so spoken, as that we should continue and delight in filthinesse or unrighteousnesse. But it is a declaration of the course that the wicked will take, and withall a secret confirmation of the godly, notwithstanding the same. As if he should have said, be not troubled nor hindered in your most godly course of obedience to me, either by the continuance and ever increasing of the wicked in their wickednesse, or by my tollerance and long forbearing to smite them. But follow you me and my Commandements, stagger not, looke not backe, give not over, and as for the wicked, he that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and hee that is filthy, let him be filthy still: their punishment they shall be sure of in their time: And for you, goe ye on without stop: Let them be as they are to their woe.

Permissive.

The Prayer.

OMighty God, looke upon us wormes and wretches, here at thy feet lying and begging mercy. Let us obtaine of thy fatherly goodnesse, what thou hast so lovingly taught us to aske: that thy Name may be hallowed. Let our eyes and the eyes of all men lightened by thy grace, behold that Majestie and holinesse that is in thy selfe more and more, that Justice, Mercy, and Power, which thou shewest in thy workes, and that Truth, wisdome, and goodnesse, which is in thy word, more and more with all thy vertues generally whatsoever comprehended in thy nature, and fit for the knowledge and use of man, let them be more and more daily known unto us. And when in mercy thou hast bestowed as it may seeme good to thine owne wisdome, this knowledge upon us; O Heavenly Father let it not be in us a bare knowledge, but joyne to our knowledge that dread and honour, that regard and reverence in our obedience that is fit for such a name, both in word and work, thought and deed, and every way. Make us O Lord ever more and more to avoid and shunne what polluteth thy Name, and causeth thy truth to heare evill of the wicked. Remove and overturne also good Lord all those things in thy good time, which prophane, blemish, and blot this glory of thine, shining either in thy Selfe, in thy Word, or in thy works. Such as are these irreligious Atheists of our sinfull dayes, which with their mocks, and scoffes, taunts, and jests, deride all goodnesse, out-face all conscience and care to please thee, and daily worke disdaine where they may have hearing of obedience to thy blessed will. O thou Mighty God, remove their seates out of Kingdomes and Countries, out of Cities and Townes, and out of private Houses and Families. Awake Lord in thy power, and thinke of thy holy Name, let not these inchanters and charmers prevaile against thee, and glory that they have banished out of so many places, the feare of thy Name. They are unholy, and they would have all such, they are uncleane, and they infect where they come, they are grievous Rockes of no small offence, and good Lord remove them from thy chosen. Lessen also for thy holy Name ſake, the complainers of thy providence, the murmurers at thy judgements, carpers and cavillers at thy word, allurers to looſeneſſe of life and behaviour, and all that polluting thy holy name yet hate to be reformed. Finally, deare Father, let not the ſhames of ungodlineſſe daily before our faces, carry us away: neither theſe deep waterfloods drowne our ſoules, the lewd and looſe examples wee behold with griefe, let them never prevaile againſt us to pervert us, but if thy juſt wrath have ſealed their confuſion, they being unjuſt, let them be unjuſt ſtill, they being filthy, let them be filthy ſtill, to their owne woe, not to our ſtop or hinderance to doe our duties, in ſeeking to know thy glorious name more and more, and to ſanctifie and hallow it according to that true knowledge more and more. And (deareſt God) begin not only obedience in us, but confirme thy favour to us evermore; ſtrengthen and eſtabliſh us in all goodneſſe; make ſtrong our inward man againſt all aſſaults; and theſe ſilly ſoules pend up in ſinfull priſon during life, by welcome change receive when time ſhall be, with thee to live, till the day of doom, and then receiving their mates again, but immortall and incorruptible, with them to live conjoyned again for evermore in joy and comfort. But not this for our ſakes O Almighty Lord, but for Jeſus Chriſt our only life and Saviour. Amen.

The ſecond PETITION.

Thy Kingdome come.

HAving beſought the Lord in the former Petition, that his Name might be hallowed, that is, that that Majeſty and holineſſe which is in himſelfe, that Juſtice, mercy, and power, which he ſheweth in his workes, and that truth, wiſdome, and goodneſſe, which is in his word, with all other vertues generally whatſoever comprehended in his nature, and fit for the knowledge and uſe of man, might be more and more daily knowne of men, and receive amongſt us that dread, honour, and reverence that is fit for ſuch a Name, both in word and worke, thought and deed, and every way: It fitly followeth in the ſecond place, to beſeech the ſame Lord, to grant way and meanes, whereby that ſame ſhall bee effected and brought to paſſe, namely, that his Kingdome may come. For if the Lord rule and raigne in us and over us, it ſhall be ſo. And if he doe not, it ſhall not be ſo. No, we ſhall be ſo far from ſanctifying his Name, that for want of his Kingdome in us, Satan ſhall erect his kingdome in us, the effects whereof ſhall be great and grievous pollutions of his Name. Wherefore the order is moſt convenient and good.

The words of the Petition are few and eaſily underſtood if we marke them. For the Kingdome of God is the ruling and raigning of God in the hearts of men: and the comming of this Kingdome, is the beginning, increaſing, and continuing of it in us. So thy Kingdome come, is in effect thus much, as if we ſhould ſay, O Lord erect and begin, O Lord increaſe and propagate, O Lord eſtabliſh and ever continue, in our hearts thy rule and government, to the death of ſin, and life of righteouſneſſe, the true effects of thy ruling ever.

Which yet is not ſo plaine as it will be, when we have conſidered of the ſeverall members implyed in theſe words. For we muſt underſtand, that when wee are taught to pray for this Kingdome of God, all the meanes whereby it is effected in us, are included to be prayed for; as alſo, all ſtops and lets, enemies, and hinderances whatſoever, withſtanding this Kingdome, prayed againſt, that they may be removed and taken away.

To be then as plaine as I can: The Kingdome of God is ſaid to be of three ſorts, to wit, of Power, of Grace, and of Glory. The Kingdome of power is that ſoveraignty which the Lord hath over all the things in this world, directing, guiding, ruling, diſpoſing of every one of them as his good pleaſure is, and cauſing all the creatures in the world, yea, all the words, workes, and thoughts of men, to ſerve to his glory, wiſdome and will, whatſoever is intended by man, or any meanes to the contrary; which the Heathens have called Deſtiny, or inevitable neceſſity. This Kingdome is not here meant, when we pray Thy Kingdome come: for the Lord never hath, hath, neither ever will loſe this Kingdome, that is, as I ſay, this authority and power over all things, to make them ſerve to his pleaſure, and to bring to paſſe what he will have, whereby we ſhould need to pray for it, that it may come. Of this Kingdome may it be ſaid, that is in the Pſalme: Whatſoever pleaſed the Lord, that did he, in heaven and in earth, in the Sea, and in all depths. Pſa.135.6. For it ſubjecteth, as you ſee, to the Lord, all theſe, and all their workes whatſoever. And then what is exempted out of this Kingdome of power, if heaven, earth, ſea, and deepes bee ruled by it? Yet ſtayeth not the Prophet ſo, but proveth by examples what hee hath ſaid, and affirmeth it of the Lord, that he bringeth up the Clouds from the ends of the earth, and maketh the lightning with the raine: that he draweth forth the winds out of his treaſures: that he ſmiteth the firſt-borne of Ægypt both of man and beaſt: that it is hee that ſendeth tokens and wonders, &c.

Of this Kingdome may it be meant that is ſaid by the Apoſtle: For of him, and for him, and through him are all things: Rom.11.36. Eph.11. with a number ſuch like places ſpeaking of the providence of God. And to this Kingdome of God it may be applyed that the Wiſeman ſaith: Non eſt conſilium, non eſt prudentia, non eſt fortitudo adverſus Dominum. There is no counſell, there is no wiſedome, there is no ſtrength againſt the Lord. For he hath ruled ever, he doth rule, and will rule for ever all things, let all the world conſpire againſt it what they can.

Againe, the Lord worketh all things after the counſell of his own will: He giveth raine upon the earth, and powreth water upon the ſtreets: he ſetteth up on high them that bee low, that the ſorrowfull may bee exalted to ſalvation: hee ſcattereth the devices of the crafty, ſo that their hands cannot accompliſh that which they doe enterpriſe: He taketh the wiſe in their craftineſſe, and the wicked is made fooliſh. He removeth the mountaines, and they feele not when he overthroweth them in wrath. He removeth the earth out of her place, that the pillars thereof doe ſhake. He commandeth the Sun, and it riſeth not, he cloſeth up the Starres as under a ſignet. He himſelfe alone ſpreadeth out the heavens, and walketh upon the height of the Sea. Iob 5.10. Iob 9.5. All theſe are ſaid of this Kingdome. Reade Syrach the 17. to the 20. verſe, & ſee what a Kingdome of power acknowledged over all the beaſts and fowles, men and matters whatſoever. Notable is the fourth of Exodus, verſe the eleventh. For thoſe ſeeme caſuall in the Mothers belly, whereof they muſt needs bee underſtood, man being not created ſo at the firſt. Verſe 2. Exod. 4. 11.

The Kingdome of grace ſhall much better be underſtood, if we conſider how we were created, how by ſinne corrupted, and how now in mercy daily by grace renewed. The creation of man you know is laid downe to have beene according to the Image and likeneſſe of God himſelfe. For God created man (ſaith the Booke of Wiſedome) without corruption at the firſt, and made him after the Image of his owne likeneſſe. And he cloathed them with ſtrength, ſaith Syrach, as they have need, and made them according to his Image. Which Image of God maketh not God like unto men, with legges, armes, hands, and a gray head, and ſo forth, as not onely other heretiques, but even our holy Papiſts have imagined, and by ſo painting him in their Churches and windowes, made the ignorant beleeve it: but it maketh man like unto God, in holineſſe, righteouſneſſe, wiſedome, and ſo forth. For ſo expoundeth the Apoſtle theſe words to the Epheſians, and there might all Papiſts have ſeene it, if they would, put on the new man, ſaith he, which after God (that is, after the Image of God) is created unto righteouſneſs and true holineſs, meaning by theſe two words all perfection, as wiſedome, will to doe good, truth, innocency, love of God, power, and ſuch like. See what Image of God is. Now then being thus created and made, who ruled in man, or what kingdome was hee ſubject unto? The Lord you ſee ruled in him, and to his Kingdome was he ſubject. But alas the time, this happy eſtate was quickly loſt. The Serpent deceived the woman, the woman the man: ſinne entred, God was offended, and a fearfull change from all weale to woe, in a little time was brought to paſſe. So that now looke on man againe, and his copy is changed: Satan ruleth, ſinne is entred, death followeth, and this bleſſed kingdome of God in man and over man is loſt, gone, and deſtroyed. Yea, to ſpeake plainer, and not ſo generally, familiarity with God is turned into a fearfull flying off from God, for they hid themſelves from the preſence of the Lord, among the Trees of the Garden. Wiſdome is turned into folly, and they thinke with a few Figge-leaves to cover their ſhame. Yea, ſuch is our wiſedome now, as Romanes 8. 7. truth is turned into lies, and they deale not plainly with the Lord. The Serpent deceived me, the woman deceived me; and there is not plainly, we have ſinned, O Lord forgive us. Now it is ſaid of man, that all the imaginations of the thoughts of his heart is onely evill continually, that we are all become as an uncleane thing, and that all our righteouſneſſe is as filthy clouts, that we doe all fade like a leafe, and our iniquities like a winde doe take us away. Now it is ſaid of us, that we are carnall, ſold under ſinne, that we doe not the good that we would, but the evill which we would not, that doe wee: that when wee would doe good, wee are thus yoaked, that evill is preſent with us: that there is another Law in our members rebelling againſt the Law of our minde, and leading us captive unto the law of Sinne, which is in our members. That the naturall Man perceiveth not the things of the Spirit, for they are fooliſhneſſe unto him, him, neither can he know them. Now it is ſaid of us, that by nature we are the Children of wrath, dead in treſpaſſes and ſinnes, walking in them according to the courſe of this world, and after the Prince that ruleth in the ayre, even the Spirit that worketh in us the children of diſobediente. Now is it ſaid of man that was ſo excellent, Verely, every man living is altogether vanity. Now cryeth the Prophet of men, that his ſoule is amongſt Lyons, that their teeth are ſpeares and arrowes, and their tongue a ſharpe ſword. That they are corrupt and become abhominable, that there is none that doth good, no not one. And where ruleth all this evill that we have thus purchaſed to our wo? O further griefe! our bodies, our ſouls, our minds, our wils, our hearts, our hands, our feet, and our whole man is corrupted, ſinne hath entered over all, and by ſinne Satan as Lord and King ruleth over all, till this other Kingdome come, that here wee pray for. For eratis tenebra, ſaith the Apoſtle, Ye were darkneſſe, but now are ye light in the Lord. And more plainly before, having their underſtanding darkned, and being ſtrangers from the life of God through that ignorance that is in them, &c. Therefore you ſee the mind corrupted. Of the heart & will it was ſaid before, that the imaginations of the thoughts thereof are only evill continually. And out of the heart (now ſaith our Saviour) proceed evill thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, theft, falſe witneſſe, ſlanders, and this is ſtuffe that defileth the man. With a thouſand places moe crying out of the waywardneſſe of mans heart and will, the crookedneſſe, ſtifneſſe, and ſtubbornneſſe of it againſt the Lord and all good. Of the whole man, ſaith the Apoſtle, Novi quod in me, hoc eſt in carne mea, non eſt bonum: I know that in me, that is, in my fleſh, there is no good. Our mouth, our feet, our throat, our eyes, and all are charged with their faults in the Word of the Lord. That free-will that was in man to doe good, it is gone, ſaith Saint Auguſtine, and homo malè utens libero arbitrio, & ſe perdidit & arbitrium: Man abuſing his free-will, loſt both himſelfe and it. And now it is true, that we are not able to thinke a good thought as of our ſelves, but both to will and to performe is of the Lord. Now is it true that our Saviour ſaid, Sine me nihil poteſtis facere; without me you can doe nothing. Non dixit ſine me difficulter aliquid poteſtis, aut ſine me non poteſtis aliquid magni facere, ſed nihil poteſtis, &c. He did not ſay (ſaith S. Auguſtine) without me you can hardly doe any thing, or you cannot doe any greater matter, but ſimply and flatly you can doe nothing; meaning in ſpirituall matters. For herein, quod habes, quod non accepiſti? What haſt thou, that thou haſt not received? Gratia Dei ſum quod ſum: By the grace of God I am that I am: whatſoever it be if it be good. And to goe no further in this ſort, now muſt man and woman (be they never ſo righteous) cry out upon their unrighteouſneſſe, and hide their faces from the judgement of the Lord, if he ſhould out of the comfort provide for them, ſeeke to judge them. David the deare one of the Lord, and a man according to his owne heart, yet muſt confeſſe of himſelfe with woe: Behold, I was borne in iniquity, and in ſinne hath my mother conceived me. Enter not into judgement with thy ſervants, O Lord, for in thy ſight ſhall no fleſh living be juſtified. The great Prophet Eſaias muſt ſay, Woe is me, for I am undone, becauſe I am a man of polluted lips. Mary the Virgin, and bleſſed amongſt women muſt rejoyce in her Saviour, and not in her ſelfe, and ſo all others whatſoever. For we are fallen. Our life that ſhould have beene ſo pleaſant, behold how bitter, heavy and miſerable. Great travell is created for all men, and an heavy yoake upon the ſonnes of Adam, from the day that they goe out of their mothers wombe, till the day that they returne to the mother of all things: Namely, their thoughts, and feare of the heart, and their imagination of the things they wait for, and the day of death; from him that ſitteth upon the glorious throne, unto him that is beneath in the earth & aſhes: from him that is cloathed in blew ſilke, and weareth a crown, even to him that is cloathed in ſimple linnen, wrath and envy, trouble and unquietneſſe, and feare of death, and rigour, and ſtrife; and in the time of reſt the ſleepe in the night upon his bed, change his knowledge. A little or nothing is his reſt, and afterward in ſleeping, he is as in a watch tower in the day; he is troubled with the viſions of his heart, as one that runneth out of a battell, &c. Our dayes that ſhould have beene without end, now are few, and full of woe: for life, wee have got death; for pleaſure, paine; for good, evill; for heaven, hell; and for endleſſe joy, eternall woe. O dreadfull fall! Thus created then innocent, God ruled; but thus fallen from that innocency, Satan ruleth: and we are by nature the children of wrarh, walking after the Prince that ruleth in the ayre, that is the devill. But the Lord is gracious, his mercy indureth for ever: there remaineth therefore hope by a reſtitution or regeneration, which the Scripture teacheth us thus much of; namely, That whereas Satan abuſeth that corrupt nature of ours through the great power which he hath over us for our ſinnes, and driveth us from the word and all religion, into all blindneſſe, ignorance and errours; thruſteth us into divers miſeries and calamities, and in the end into eternall death, there being where he ruleth, no true love of God or any grace, but ſinning, without ſting, touch, or feeling: the Lord our God in a contrary courſe of love, where it pleaſeth him, beginneth with that corruption of nature, whereby Satan before was ſtrong, and taketh it away by little and little, begetting us a new, to a better life, and reſtoring that Image of his in us againe, whereunto we were firſt created, and which ſo fearfully we were fallen from. Our minde he illuminateth with ſome heavy light, whereby it beginneth to know aright God, and by grace our will receiveth a new ſtrength to imbrace the Word, to reſt in it, and to incline it ſelfe to the teſtimonies of the Lord. Our heart is purged and loveth the Lord, and all the members of the body, before the weapons of unrighteouſneſſe unto ſinne become by meaſure, the weapons of righteouſneſſe unto God. So ſinne dyeth, grace liveth, and wee love him, feare him, truſt in him, pray to him often, and in all our wants, with ſuch like. This is now the kingdome of grace, and this is that wee pray for here immediately. The Kingdome of glory is that happy and eternall eſtate which followeth in heaven after this life, which wee alſo pray for here, but mediately as we ſay, that is, when the kingdome of grace in this world is ended. Rom. 6. 11.

The kingdome of glory.

Thus much being ſaid then for plainneſſe of theſe three kingdomes, the kingdome of power, of grace, and of glory, as alſo of which of them the petition is meant; See now what wee pray in plaine words: namely, thus much, O Lord ſubdue unto thy Majeſty all power of Satan in us by any meanes: ſubdue our ſinfull fleſh, and all the wicked luſts thereof, to the inlarging of thy kindome here upon earth, and grant that all the powers of body and ſoule may bee inabled by the holy Spirit, to worke acceptable in thy ſight, that thou mayeſt dwell in us, and we in thee for ever, and all thine and our enemies utterly trodden down, then may it glorioufly raigne and triumph over all, and wee by Chriſt may finally as thy Children and heires be made partakers of thine everlaſting kingdome.

The ſenſe of the Petition briefly.

Now, is not this brought to paſſe but by meanes, and therefore as we pray for the thing that the Lord would grant it, ſo pray wee alſo incluſively for the meanes, that in mercy they may be given to the effecting of it. The meanes are theſe: firſt, the Word, even this heavenly and bleſſed Word of God, ſo ſmally accounted of in the world, and not onely ſo, but even hated, deſpiſed, and rejected of numbers. For ſo ſaith the Apoſtle, It is the power of God unto ſalvation, to every one that beleeveth, to the Iew firſt, and alſo to the Grecian. That is, it is the mighty inſtrument of God, without which men are damned and caſt away. Yea, ſuch an inſtrument it is of power and force, where it pleaſeth the Lord, that it hath greater ſtrength and authority than all the eloquence, than all the wiſdome, than all the learning, than all the policy, and power of the world. Let the dayes before us witneſſe to this truth, I meane thoſe primitive times when the Lord began to powre his mercy on mankinde for Chriſt by the Miniſtery of his Chriſt and of his Diſciples, wherein notwithſtanding this divine Word of his was reſiſted by all the worldly gifts and powers which I named, yet had it marvellous ſucceſſe, and did wonderfully increaſe. Demoſthenes and Cicero for their eloquence, Solon and Ariſtides for their wiſedome, Plato and Ariſtotle for their learning, Alexander and Pompey for their manhood, were of power, of fame, and in the world, when they lived, able by theſe gifts to doe much: Yet the beſt of all theſe had much to doe, (even a few yeares,) to keepe their owne Citizens, their owne Countrey-men, their owne ſubjects in obedience, and to cauſe them to give place to good and wholeſome counſell, and to obey lawes provided for their owne profit. Yea, every one of them almoſt to their owne confuſion, proved of how ſmall force, their wiſdome, their eloquence, their power was, and with the end of their lives, left their common-weales well-neare utterly decayed and undone. Rom. 1. 16.

The meanes whereby this Kingdome of God ariſeth in us.

But contrariwiſe, the Apoſtles not learned, but poore Fiſher-men, not with any inticing words of mans wiſdome, not commended or ſet forth with thoſe gifts and ornaments that men ſo greatly eſteeme, went forth into the world preaching the diſdained Goſpell of Chriſt crucified, and by the ſimple doctrine thereof did in few yeares for the ſtate of Religion change the face of the whole world: notwithſtanding that the Empire of Rome, and other mighty Principalities did to the uttermoſt of their power reſiſt it: and the reformation that by the Apoſtles in this manner was begun, continued and ſpred it ſelfe mightily, and marvellouſly, even againſt the aſſaults of moſt cruell and tyrannicall perſecutions, under Nero, Domitian, Trajan, Adrian, Anthony, Diocleſian, and many moe. A force farre paſſing the power of man, that in the midſt of all ſuch bloody deaths, and moſt exquiſite torments, yet was able daily to get children to the Kingdome of Chriſt, yea, and that ſo plentifully, that well were they that might runne and profeſſe themſelves Chriſtians, that they might die the death for it continually. It is a very notable ſtory that is written of ſuch as this Word of the Lord hath begotten to Chriſt in Edeſſa a City of Meſopotamia, who being as it is ſaid, baniſhed out of all Churches by the decree of the Emperor, made their meetings in the fields; which eſpyed of the Emperour, in a very great rage he ſtrooke his chiefe Captine with his fiſt, and asked why therehence alſo they were not removed according as hee had commanded. The Captaine the next day determineth to diſpatch them, but yet in pitty to them, although himſelfe a Pagan, by ſecret meanes letteth it goe abroad, that the next day he would deſtroy all that were found at thoſe meetings, hoping thereby to warne them to abſtaine, and ſo to ſave themſelves. But ſee the power of this Word in the hearts of men. The next day the Chriſtians although thus admoniſhed, yet flocke thither in more plentifull ſort than at other times, yea runne headlong as it were, and in great haſte, as men afraid to come too late to die. Amongſt all, the Captaine noted a certaine woman, ſo haſtily and with ſuch ſpeed to runne out of her houſe, as that ſhe ſtayed not, either to ſhut the doore of her houſe, house,or to put on her cloathes as woman-hood would,and in her armes a little infant. When he saw it,he commanded to call her to him,and being come, asked her whither shee made all that haste? Into the field said she, where the Christians meet. And hast thou not heard, saith he, that the chiefe Captaine is going thither to put to the sword all he findeth there? Yes,saith she, I have heard it, and therefore I make haste that I may be there when he commeth. And what wilt thou doe with this young babe,saith he? Take it with mee also, said she, that if the Lord will, it may bee vouchsafed Martyrdome also. When the Captaine heard this, hee stayed his course,commanded his charriot to returne,and to the Emperour presently he goeth, told him,if it pleased his Majesty to command him death,hee was ready, but to doe what he commanded he could not: for thus and thus had he seene it, and so delclared unto the Emperour all this story; who by and by was appeased,stayed his hand, and restrayned his intended evill to such zealous lovers of their God. See now how true it is that the Apostle saith, It is the power of God, that is,potens instrumentum, the mighty instrument of God, to get men, and keepe men to the Lord. They were accounted the men that troubled all the world, yet were they not discouraged. Ligabantur,includebantur, cadebantur,torquebantur,& tamen multiplicabantur. They were bound saith S. Austen,they were tormented and racked, and yet for all this they multiplyed and increased. So was it even in these latter dayes of ours, when all pity and truth was buryed as it were in the bottome of the Sea, and Antichrist of Rome in his ruffe, power and strength, exalting himselfe above all that is called God,and made Princes and Emperours to kisse his feet,yea, when it was death almost to think of the restoring of true religion,even then I say did this word of the Lord in the mouth of one simple man at the first, against the clamours of Monkes and Fryers, against the scorning of Bishops, against the power of the Pope, against the assistance of temporall Princes, against all torments by fire, by fagot, by sword, by imprisonment, light such a Candle as now shineth to all the Countrey of Europe, and by the power of man it cannot be put out. Wherefore judge whether the Apostle said not true, when speaking of this word,he said, It was a weapon not carnall,but mighty through God,to cast down holds,casting downe the imaginations,and every high thing that is exalted against the knowledge of God,and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ,&c. Wherefore wee see by this first proofe plain enough,that a means, & a most mighty strong and powerful means,to erect this kingdome of God in our hearts, which here we pray for,is the Word of God. For there is no wisedome no counsell,no strength against it. But though all the heathen rage most horribly, and the people imagine continually, yet it is but a vaine thing. Though Kings and Princes, and all the powers of this earth bend themselves against it,yet will it not serve. For he that dwelleth in the heaven shall laugh them to scorne, & this Word of his prevaileth where he will,to whom he will, when he will,and as long as he will. Other plaine proofes, that this is a meanes to erect this Kingdome,are these: First, S. Iames, where it is said,Of his owne will he begat us with the Word of truth, that we should be as the first fruits of his creatures. The Author of all good, saith Saint Iames, in generall, and of this good in speciall, namely, our new birth, is the Lord, and the meanes is the Word,even the Word of truth. So saith our Saviour himselfe in the Gospell,Sanctifie them ô Father with thy truth,and what is that? thy word is truth. So saith S.Paul, Though ye have ten thousand instructers in Christ, yet have ye not many Fathers; for in Christ Iesus I have begotten you.(And by what means?)through the Gospell. And againe,I beseech thee for my sonne Onesimus,whom I have begotten in my bonds;to wit,by the word. And again,This one thing would I learne of you,ô foolish Galathians,received ye the Spirit by the workes of the Law,or by the hearing of faith preached unto you? Likewise S. Peter,Being borne anew,not of mortall seed, but immortall by the Word of God. And lastly,father Abraham from heaven,They have Moses and the Prophets, let them heare them,&c. as if he should have said,if thou wouldst have thy brethren begotten to the Lord,that he ruling in them,they may rule here with him, and escape that place of torment where thou now justly art, the meanes truly is Moses and the Prophet, that is, the Word of God; for if that erect not the Kingdome of God in them, it shall not be erected by any dead, if they should rise and be sent unto them. For that is the meanes which the Lord hath ordained, and which to this day hath had power to beget to him so many as he would have. VVherefore when the Lord will promise a blessing to a Kingdome,Country,and people, that shall be indeed a great blessing,he promiseth his word,and this word in plentifull measure: and when hee will threaten a plague,and a grievous plague,then saith he, Behold the dayes come that I will send a famine in the Land; not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the word of the Lord. And they shall wander from Sea to Sea & from the North even to the East shall they run to and fro to seeke the word of the Lord, & shall not finde it. So then see we that this word of our God is his mighty means to raise up this kingdome of his grace in us,this day whē we have it giving some thing,& so as it were laying one stone to this spirituall building, the next day giving more,and so laying as it were another stone,and so on to a perfect man,and unto the measure of the age and fulnesse of Christ, that is, till he have wrought his will in us, in this world, and meaneth to translate us to another. Wherefore, as we pray that the Lord in mercy would erect erect this Kingdome in us: when we pray, Thy Kingdome come, ſo doe wee beſeech the Lord in this Petition to grant us all the meanes appointed and ordained of him to this building, and by name, this mighty meanes and mercy great of his holy word, that we may have it amongſt us ſtill, and enjoy it in peace, if it bee his will, to the raiſing up of theſe ſpirituall wals of a ſpirituall houſe of God within us daily more and more, till it be fully finiſhed to the pleaſure of his Majeſty here, and our eternall comfort here and elſewhere for ever with him in his other kingdome of glory. And the God of heaven and all mercy grant this to us, and make us thankfull for it.

Ephes. 3.13. The meanes prayed for as well as the thing.

Now beloved, is this word either reade, unto us, or of us, without any preaching, or preached unto us? For by theſe two meanes buildeth it in us, and not by lying in our houſes, bound in ſilver or gold, or any coſtly ſort whatſoever. No more than the Phyſitians preſcription confected by the Apothecary, and brought unto us, profiteth our diſeaſe by ſtanding in the window, and not further touched. And therefore as I have ſaid that it was a meanes, and proved it to you out of the ſame word, ſo let me ſay a little to you of the uſing of this meanes alſo.

The Word of God is either read or preached.

Of reading the Word.

TWo extremities there are, which of all Gods choſen are to be eſchewed; the one, is an eſtimation of reading ſo great, as that being had we feele no want, neither thinke it a want, never or ſeldome to have any preaching: The other is ſo farre to extoll preaching, as that we utterly contemne reading, yea, exclude it from all power in the bleſſing of God to worke faith in us, or any. The meane betwixt both which, is a right and true conceit both of reading and preaching. Know we therefore, that in the Word they are both commanded, yea, commanded and ordained of the Lord as meanes to erect this Kingdome of his in our hearts for which wee pray, and of which we now ſpeake.

Two dangerous extremities to be avoided of all men.

And firſt for reading, to name but a few places of a number, marke what the Lord in his Law laid downe for all his people. Every ſeventh yeare when the yeare of freedome ſhall bee in the feaſt of the Tabernacles, when all Iſrael ſhall come to appeare before the Lord thy God in the place which he ſhall chuſe, thou ſhalt read his Law before all Iſrael, that they may heare it. Gather the people together, men, women, and children, and the ſtranger that is within thy gates, that they may heare, and that they may learne, and feare the Lord your God, and keep & obſerve all the words of the Law, &c. See a direct commandement to reade the Scriptures to the people, as well as to preach them, and not onely that, but even a mention alſo of profit that ſhall come thereby, namely, learning, & fearing, and keeping of the Lawes of the Lord. And therefore reading is not without all bleſſing. The 13. of the Acts telleth us it was the cuſtome of the Church then to have the Law and the Prophets read unto the people. For, after the lecture of the Law and Prophets, (ſaith the Text,) the Rulers of the Synagogue ſent unto them, ſaying; ye men and brethren, if ye have any word of exhortation for the people, ſay on. This godly cuſtome our Saviour was ſo farre from miſliking, as that he himſelfe willingly uſed it. In the 15. of the Acts it is ſaid, that Moſes of old time hath in every City them that preach him, ſeeing he is read in the Synagogue every Sabbath day. In the 36. of Ieremy, we read and ſee how Baruch was commanded by Ieremy to write at his mouth, or as he did indite, and tell him all the words of the Lord which hee had ſpoken unto him, upon a Rowle or Booke, and then to take that Rowle and goe into the houſe of the Lord, and to read it in the audience of all the people. In hope that by that reading upon the Booke to them in the abſence of Ieremy, who was now ſhut up, the people might be moved to pray before the Lord, and every one to returne from his evill way. And Baruch did ſo twice. See now and marke both the warrant of reading, and a profit hoped for by it of the godly. So farre were they ever from either contemning this meanes, or from denying it power in Gods bleſſing to work faith and repentance in the hearers.

Acts 13.15. Luke 4.16.

Bullinger goeth further than now I doe upon theſe words (for I alledge them onely to ſhew the warrant of this our uſe in our Churches here in England of reading the Scriptures to the people) and ſaith he: Ne pigeat nos laborum, ne pudeat recitationis ex libro, ſi ea deſtituatur vi memoriæ, qua ſine libro memoriter verbum Domini libere annuntiemus. Nemo rejeciſſe aut adverſatus eſſe Baruchum legitur propter recitatos ex libro manuſcripto ſermones Domini. Cur ergo tu fidelem Miniſtrum rejiceres & audire dedignareris, qui fideliter ea prælegit quæ revelata ſunt à Domino? Non dico hæc, quod non niſi recitari velim ex ſcripto ſermones ad populum ſed ſi magna neceſſitas & idoneorum miniſtrorum raritas ita flagitet, ne faſtidiant verbum Dei auditores. That is, let us not bee weary of our labours: let us not be aſhamed to reade upon the Booke the Word of the Lord, if we want memory fully to declare it by heart, or without the booke. Wee doe not reade here that any man rejected or refuſed Baruch for his reading upon the written booke the words of God: why therefore ſhouldeſt thou reject or diſdaine to heare a faithfull Miniſter, which faithfully readeth thoſe things that the Lord hath revealed to him? This ſpeake I not, becauſe I would have nothing but reading of Sermons written unto the people, but that if great neceſſity ceſſity conſtraine,or a want of fit Miniſters ſo requíre,that the hearers may not loathe the word of God. Thus farre was he from the extremitie I ſpeake of,and his wiſdome,gravity and deepe judgement is knowne ſufficiently to all the learned.

Socrat.Hiſtor. Eccleſ.lib.7.c.1.

Socrates in his Story reporteth thus of Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, and a good Biſhop. Primum cum Preſbyterij gradum obtinuerit, conciones, quas ſummo ſtudio confecerat, ad verbum ediſcens, in Eccleſia recitavit. Poſtea crebro uſu & diligentia, majorem audaciam adeptus, extempore concioni capit, rationemq; docendi magis popularem ſecutus eſt, &c. Firſt,when he obtained the degree of a Miniſter,his Sermons that with great ſtudie and diligence he had made, word by word he learned without booke, and then recited them in the Church. Afterward, with often uſe and diligence,he attained to greater audacitie,and began to preach extempore,and followed a more plaine way of teaching. Yet doe wee never reade that the Church then diſdained this meaſure, neither refuſed to heare him,much leſſe exclaimed againſt his Miniſtery as to him unlawfull to uſe, and to all others to acknowledge and receive.

Theod.Hiſt. Eccleſ.lib.4. cap.5. Poſſidon. in vita Auguſt. Cap.5. Vrſin.Catechiſ.

I lay not downe what Theodoret writeth of Flavianus, what Poſſidonius of Valerius and Alipius, what latter writers ſay generally of Miniſters, that they have their warrant, Si mediocria dona, if they have meane gifts,and in ſome meaſure be able to teach,&c. I mention not as I might the diſcreet care of ſome godly and reverent brethren proteſting their conſcience, in frequenting their Churches,and communicating in prayer and Sacraments, when themſelves were reſtrained a while from their Miniſtery,and happily the Miniſters for the time in their places of farre meaner gifts. Neither that divers under their hands have teſtified that they judge it ſchiſmaticall thus to doe. Yet might theſe things be conſidered and wel ſchoole the violence of ſome. But how ſchoole them? to the bolſtering up and bearing with ignorance unthought upon in a dead conſcience in them that ſhould ſee? Farre is it (the ſearcher of hearts knoweth,) from my ſoule. But thus farre to ſchoole them, never to diſdaine for a leſſe meaſure, whom God hath bleſſed with ſome meaſure,and carefull diligence giveth hope of better meaſure, as God will. For truly even in this caſe it may be ſaid with Calvin, cum ſub ſpecie ſtudii perfectionis, &c. when under the colour of deſire of perfection wee can tolerate and beare with no imperfection and want, either in the body, or in the members of the Church, then doth the Devill puffe us up with pride, and ſeduce us with hypocriſie, that he may prick us forward to forſake the flocke of Chriſt, well knowing that he ſhall have the victory, if he can ſo doe. For when as no where elſe either remiſſion of ſinnes or ſalvation is to be had,although we make a ſhew of a life more than Angell-like,yet if with ſuch boldneſſe we ſeparate our ſelves from a Chriſtian congregation,we become Devils.

Appendix to the anſwer of the obſtr. pag. 214.

Apol.pro Chriſtianis.

Iuſtine Martyr ſaith, that in his time the manner was, on the Sabbath day, when the people were gathered together, to have the Scriptures read in the publike congregation, and in the time of publike prayer,for the ſpace of one whole houre. And how common are theſe ſpeeches with Auguſtine? Ye heard when the Goſpell was read, yee heard ere while when it was read, if yee gave eare to the reading: Dearly beloved, wee have heard in the Leſſon that hath beene read us, &c. And for the profit of reading, the Fathers and learned with one conſent have ever ſaid that it is great. That we feed our faith thereby, raiſe up our affiance, faſten our hope, grow expert in the Scriptures, ſo that wee cannot ſo eaſily be deceived by falſe teachers, that we are made acquainted with the phraſe, and whereas by a Preacher one booke cannot bee gone over in divers yeares,by this profitable and godly uſe of reading the Scriptures, even all the bookes of God are gone over many times in one yeare, to the great inſtruction of people, if they will themſelves. Let no Harding therefore in the name of all blaſphemous Papiſts, call reading of the Scriptures to the people in the Church a ſpirituall dumbneſſe, and a thing unprofitable,but let us with the choſen of the Lord ever reverence the good of it, and bleſſe God for our liberty. For it had never beene written in letters to this day,it had never been tranſlated into ſundry tongues by the gift from heaven of the knowledge of tongues,neither ever had it beene commanded by the Lord to bee reade to the people, if it had not beene a ſanctified meanes by him to the great good of his people and Church. Wherefore to goe no further, ſince wee ſee it plainly to bee of the Lord both commanded and bleſſed, let us ſee a little if it be not alſo ſo for the people themſelves to reade it,if they have the abilitie. Surely it is. For the words are plaine: Search the Scriptures. And they cannot with truth bee reſtrained from giving a warrant of reading to all men. Pſalme 1. Bleſſed is the man that meditateth in the Law of God day and night. Is meditation lawfull, and all reading damnable? Pſalme 119. Wherewithall ſhall a young man clenſe his way? Even by ruling himſelfe after thy Word. Are young men then bound to rule themſelves after Gods Booke, and yet no man ſuffered to looke within the leaves? A thouſand ſuch places there are, which I need not to note. Timothy was brought up in the reading and knowledge of Scriptures from his childhood, and the Lord hath commended it. The Bereans tooke their Bibles, and turned to the proofes of Paul when hee preached,and they are highly commended. The Eunuch had his booke in the Chariot, and the Lord looked on him. The Word of God muſt dwell plenteouſly amongſt us,&c, as is there written, written, and therefore we may reade it. Wee muſt take the ſword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, as well as either helmet or breſt-plate, or any other part of our ſpirituall armour: and therefore wee may reade it. Wherefore well ſaid S. Auguſtine: Nec ſolum ſufficiat quod in Eccleſia divinas lectiones auditis, ſed etiam in domibus veſtris, aut ipſi legite, aut alios legentes requirite. Let it not content you to heare the holy Scripture read unto you in the holy Church only, but in your houſes alſo at home, either reade them your ſelves, or cauſe others to reade them. Well decreed that firſt Councell of Nice, that no houſe ſhould be without either a Bible, or at leaſt a new Teſtament. Well crieth Origen, Vtinam omnes faceremus quod ſcriptum eſt: ſcrutamini ſcripturas. Would God we did all as it is written, ſearch the Scriptures. Well crieth that good Father, Comparate vobis Biblia animorum pharmaca ſecularia: Get ye Bibles ye lay-men, for they are medicines for your ſoules &c.

But ſee the iniquity of Rome. It ſhall be lawfull to reade any mans bookes, Si faciat pro nobis, that is, if he be a Papiſt, yea, and the more we have in our cloſets and chambers of ſuch bookes, the holier Catholikes wee: but the Lords booke that is able to make us wiſe unto ſalvation, and is ſweeter than the hony, we may not touch it, we may not have it, or reade it. For if wee doe, wee ſhall be heretikes. So mans workes ſhall make us Saints, and Gods worke devils: Popiſh writings Catholikes, and heavenly writings heretikes, if they reade them. O dreadfull blaſphemie and Doctors of death.

Great is the patience of the Lord that putteth up this, and beareth it daily, when with great juſtice heaven and earth might agree together to flaſh out fire, the one to conſume ſuch teachers, and the other to rend in pieces and ſwallow up the aſhes, when they are burnt of ſuch blaſphemers. Is not this to ſhut up the kingdome of God before men, and neither to enter in themſelves, nor to ſuffer others that would enter? And Woe to ſuch, ſaith the Lord there. Hoc non eſt ſanantium, nec vivificantium, ſed magis gravantium & agentium. Et multo verior hic lex invenitur Maledictum dicens omnem qui in errorem mittat cœcum in via. This is not the part of them that would heale or give life, but rather of them that augment the burthen, and increaſe ignorance. And herein is the Law well verified: Curſed is hee that leadeth the blinde out of the way.

Matt. 23.

What is this, but with the amazed ones in the Prophet to ſay: Tace & ne recorderis nominis domini. Hold thy peace, and never thinke upon the name of the Lord. Theſe men bee the right ſucceſſors of Antiochus and Maximinus, who for like policy burnt the bookes of God, leſt the people ſhould read them: whereas the godly and firſt Chriſtened Emperour Conſtantine, cauſed the Bible to be written out, and to bee ſent abroad into all Kingdomes, countries, and cities of his dominion: and King Adelſtane here in England, cauſed it to bee tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue that all might reade it. Of Iulian the wicked Emperour, who charged the Chriſtians with it as an high fault, that their women were ſo skilfull in the Scriptures: forgetting what Saint Hierom writeth, that all the maidens about Lady Paula were ſet daily to learne the Scriptures.

Irenæus l. 3. c. 5.

Amos 6. 10.

Let us remember how many ſaved ſoules are now with the Lord in reſt, that being able to reade never a word upon the booke themſelves, yet by hearing others reade unto them, have received bleſſing from the Lord thereof, even to acknowledge, to reſiſt the enemy, and to a ſtrength, with their bloods to ſeale the truth of that they heard, and by hearing learned: beſide all other Churches, the monuments of this our Church will afford us many. What manner of men and women would theſe have beene, if they could have read themſelves? Let us remember what Saint Auguſtine confeſſeth of himſelfe, that being inclined to the hereſie of the Manichees, hee heard a voice, ſaying, Tolle & lege, Take up and reade, meaning the booke of God, which he preſently did, and ſo by reading was converted. And concerning reading of the Scriptures either unto the people in the Church by the Miniſters, or any other appointed to that ſervice, or by the people themſelves privately at home in their houſes in a tongue they underſtand, let us conclude upon plaine recited proofes, that it is a meanes of the Lord appointed, commanded, ſanctified and bleſſed, to the raiſing, building, and creating this kingdome of the Lord in the hearts of men, for which we pray, when we ſay, Thy kingdome come: and to deny either of theſe meanes that now wee have ſtood of, or to ſay they have no bleſſing promiſed and granted to them, but that preaching is all in all, and reading is nothing, not profitable, not able to worke faith, &c. is to avouch a great untruth, and of ſuch deniall wee may ſay as hee ſaid: Archangeli neſciunt, Angeli non audiverunt, Propheta non ſenſit, Filius ipſe non edidit: The Archangels know it not, the Angels have not heard, the Prophet hath not felt it, the Sonne of God himſelfe hath revealed to us no ſuch thing.

What then, doe you match reading with preaching, or doe you ſay the people, if they heard the Scriptures read unto them, though they had no preaching ſuſtaine no want, neither need to care for preaching, or once to take any paines to goe where it is orderly, if it be not at home?

No, no: for this is the other extremity I told you of, even now when I ſaid, we muſt avoid two. Let them both therefore not onely ſtand, but ſtand with their juſt and due commendations.

Preaching above reading.

Reading is profitable, but preaching doth profit more than reading doth, becauſe it is more apt for the ignorant and unlearned, expreſſing more plainely the meaning of the Scriptures, and applying the ſame to their conſciences as it ought fit. Wherefore with very fatherly care hath the Lord in his Word appointed, that this meanes alſo ſhould bee uſed to his people, to the erecting of this his kingdome in them: and telleth us what great bleſſing hee hath beſtowed upon it from time to time. He therefore gave ſome to be Apoſtles, ſome Prophets, ſome Evangeliſts, and ſome Paſtors and Teachers, for the gathering together of the Saints, for the work of the Miniſtery, and for the edification of the body of Chriſt, till we all meet together in the unity of faith and knowledge of the Sonne of God unto a perfect man, &c. And goe and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Sonne, and the holy Ghoſt: teaching them to obſerve all things whatſoever I have commanded you, &c. In another place, The harveſt is great, the labourers few, pray therefore to the Lord of the harveſt, that he would ſend forth labourers into the harveſt. Our Saviour himſelfe of this meanes ſaith: The Spirit of the Lord is upon mee, becauſe hee hath anointed me, that I ſhould preach the Goſpel to the poore, he hath ſent me that I ſhould heale the broken hearted, that I ſhould preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of ſight to the blinde, that I ſhould ſet at liberty them that are bruiſed, and that I ſhould preach the acceptable yeere of the Lord.

Ephes. 4. 11, 12. 13.

Mat. 26. 16, 19. Mark 6. Luke 4. 18, 19.

And as he went towards Emaus with the two that went thither, he preached unto them to their good. Peter preached the word and there were added to the Church about three thouſand ſoules. Philip preached to the Eunuch, he beleeved. Peter preached to Cornelius and his company, and they received the holy Ghoſt, and beleeved. Paul preached to Sergius Paulus, a prudent man, and the Lord gave it a bleſſing, to the confuſion of the Sorcerer, the overthrow of Satan, and the erection of this his kingdome of which now wee ſpeake, in his heart. So did hee to Lydia, and to the Jaylor, and to a number moe. By this excellent meanes of preaching hee opened their hearts, and brought them to his fold, that hee in them might raigne over whom Satan ſo long had ruled before, and ſo beginning this his kingdome in them in this life, might aſſure them of his eternall kingdome with him in the life to come.

Similitudes expreſſing the profit of preaching.

And for the ſingular profit that this means hath to this purpoſe, it hath as you have ſeene from time to time, beene moſt carefully provided by the Lord for his people. The ſpice when it is whole ſmelleth ſweetly, but if it be broken and bruiſed by the hand of the Apothecary, it ſmelleth a great deale more. So is the word read of us, or to us, ſweet as the honey, and bringeth the light of life to many. But if the ſpirituall Apothecary breake it and bruiſe it, cut and divide it, as the Lord hath appointed by preaching, then reacheth the ſavour of ſuch heavenly ſweet to many moe, in a fuller meaſure by reaſon of the bleſſing of this meanes, as hath beene ſaid. If the loafe bee whole, the children get not ever ſo full morſells as when it is cut and broken unto them: preaching parteth the bread, and maketh us feed in this fuller meaſure, through the gracious bleſſing of our God. If the fire be covered with any aſhes, the heate breaketh not out ſo greatly as it would if the aſhes were away: even ſo, if in the Word of God, when we reade it, any one thing we underſtand not, as we wiſh to doe, this meanes of preaching uncovereth that heavenly fire unto us, that earſt wee felt not ſo much, and the Lord beſtowing his grace upon his owne appointment, the fire flaſheth into our ſoules, and wee, as men and women raviſhed with heavenly good, perceive and ſee the power of preaching. Thus did it to the Eunuch whom wee named before. What hee read at the firſt, hee underſtood not: but when Philip preached unto him, the fire brake out to his laſting good, and hee vehemently cried to bee baptized. And ſo to the reſt whom ſo lately we noted. O powerfull meanes therefore of the Lord to the erecting of this kingdome in us, the true and plaine preaching of the Word. Reading profiteth, but preaching more: and reading therefore is good, but preaching is better. This bleſſing pray for ever amongſt us, this bleſſing uſe, if the Lord vouchſafe it. Conſider what hath beene ſaid, and not onely ſaid, but proved, that the Lord hath appointed this meanes as the moſt notableſt of all others, to the erection of his kingdome in us, whereof wee ſpeake, that it hath had this bleſſing to thouſands and ten thouſand thouſands that have hearkened thereunto: that the contempt of it is death, and that eternall both of body and ſoule: and then weigh with thy ſelfe what thou daily doeſt. If thou want it, whether thou ſeeke it. If thou have it, whether thou uſe it, and ſhake to think of thy ſhutting out of this kingdom here & for ever, for the contempt of the meanes whereby we are brought into it all of us. Let neither ignorance of ſo great a good withhold thee any longer, neither the deadly ſuggeſtions of that tempting foe induce thee in pride, to make fearefull exceptions againſt the Lords ordinance, to ſave thy ſoule. Either for that the man liketh thee not, or his meaſure, or manner, or whatſoever. For truely if he bring the glad tidings of the Goſpell, his feet are beautifull. If he ſpeake from the Lord he muſt be heard. And if he be the appointed meanes betwixt the Lord and thee, I meane thine own Paſtor, & teacher, thinke whileſt it is to day of the ſtrength indeed of thy exceptions to heare him, and feare the judgements, ſhrinke at the wrath, tremble at the vengeance moſt aſſured to thee, without repentance, if they be too weake: They have not caſt thee away, but they have caſt me away, ſaid the Lord to his Prophet then, and weigh it well, whether the Lord truely may not ſay it of thee now

Fearefull exceptions againſt hearing the word preached.

to thy death, refuſing the meanes appointed by him for thy life, upon ſuch grounds as Satan hath ſuggeſted, corruption nouriſhed, and the triumphant truth of the Lord will conſume in the judging day, to eternall woe. It was well ſaid of that worthy inſtrument in Gods Church upon like occaſion; Agnoſcant anabaptiſtæ, ubicunque miniſter ritè conſtitutus eſt, ac fideliter munere ſuo fungitur, unumquemq; qui pro Chriſtiano haberi vult, debere ei adhærere & cum reliquo grege, ipſius miniſterio frui, &c. Let the Anabaptiſts confeſſe and acknowledge, that whereſoever there is a Miniſter duely placed, and doth his duty faithfully and carefully, there every one that will be accounted a Chriſtian muſt cleave unto him, and with the reſt of the flocke and Congregation uſe his Miniſtery. But what doe they? as many of us as will not follow their errours, although we never ſo purely preach the Word of God, yet do they take us for ravening wolves, and they ſo abhor us, as that they thinke they ſhould commit an offence worthy of death, if they ſhould be preſent but at one Sermon of ours. Then doe they thinke to make ſuddenly Miniſters of their owne, and they being ſo made, in a moment then doe they draw the people, and make contrary Congregations of their own, to the rending of the Church aſunder, that the name of God cannot be called upon with that one conſent and concord that it ought to be. Meditate many times ere the Lord ſtrike thee, what Saint Iames ſaith: My brethren, have not the faith of our glorious Lord Ieſus Chriſt in reſpect of perſons. Faith in that place includeth the preached word, which if thou thus regard, remember the ſtripes that they ſhall have that know their maſters will, and refuſe to do it: remember whoſe head the blood is upon, when the watchman hath warned. If thy Paſtors gifts bee not ſo great, whom reproacheſt thou, but the giver of them? May not hee do with his owne as pleaſeth him, for thee? Refuſeſt thou to heare him, for his little, to whom the Lord will ſay, Euge ſerve bone, and crowne him for his faithfulneſſe over little? Beware, I wiſh thee as a friend in Chriſt, thy feet are ſliding fearefully if thou ſtay not. Stand not upon his Univerſity, upon his degrees, upon his age, upon his method, leaſt of all except (O ſtrange ſuggeſtion of a guilefull ſerpent in theſe evill daies) againſt his writing for his memory, as though becauſe his note helpeth his memory, therefore his lips keepe not knowledge, and thou wilt not heare him. But ſtand upon the meſſage that is done, remember whoſe it is: ſtand upon the meſſengers, calling unto them above all others, in this world, if hee be thy Paſtor, what meaſure of grace ſoever the Lord hath vouchſafed him: ſtand upon the ordinance of the Lord, by preaching to erect his kingdome in the hearts of men, and to ſave them that beleeve: ſtand upon the ability of thy God to give thee good by the miniſtery of him that is thine owne, how meane ſo ever he ſeeme in the world to the curious, almoſt I had ſaid curſed creatures: ſtand upon the judgement done to the deſpiſers of Jeſus Chriſt, and remember it often, Qui vos audit, me audit, &c. He that heareth you, heareth me, and he that deſpiſeth you, deſpiſeth mee. For theſe with a number moe ſuch, are true grounds of that Commandement, the breach whereof will be helliſh woe for ever; Obey them which have the overſight of you, and ſubmit your ſelves, for they watch for your ſoules, as they that muſt give accounts, that they may do it with joy, and not with griefe: for that is not profitable for you. And if my ſpeech may not finde a bleſſing unto ſome, becauſe the Lord hath determined to deſtroy them: yet ſay I to my brethren that am the meaneſt of them all, let us work the worke of our calling faithfully: throw the ſeed of the Lord into his field, according to the hand that he hath given carefully: give attendance to reading painfully, though wee never take degree in Univerſity, paſſe with a worthy Apoſtle through good report, and evill report, and if any man, we thus doing, refuſe the Lords letters, becauſe we bring them, the Lords meſſage, becauſe we deliver it, the Lords gold, becauſe we deale it; let us comfort our ſelves with the ſame Apoſtle, that we are unto God a ſweet ſavour of Chriſt in them that periſh. But my brethren, if wee doe it not, but give our ſelves to eaſe, and to the waies of this world, faſhioning our ſelves daily more and more in an unlawfull ſort according to the ſame, then remember, that preaching being meanes, yea, the chiefeſt meanes to erect the kingdome of the Lord in this world, we neglecting it, we neglect alſo the effect of it, namely, the kingdome of God over and in his people, and ſo ſuffering as much as lieth in us, the Lord to loſe his people, and the people to loſe their God, we fearefully purchaſe to our ſelves that dreadfull woe that is pronounced to all them that preach not the Goſpel. Aaron ſounded wee know when hee miniſtred, by his golden bells in thoſe daies, and therefore he ſhall not die, ſaith the Lord: if we ſound not when we miniſter by the golden gifts given of the Lord, ſhall not we die?

And is this all that we aske concerning this matter, namely, that God would beſtow his word upon us, that wee may reade it and heare it, and have it preached unto us, to the building up of this his kingdome in us?

No indeed. But for as much as neither our reading nor hearing is able to profit us any thing unto ſalvation, except the Lord by his holy Spirit make it fruitfull to us, and give it a bleſſing, therefore we pray alſo in theſe words, for that heavenly power of his grace, that what we reade, or heare red or preached unto us out of his heavenly Booke by the miniſtery of men, may by him be made a ſavour of life unto life unto us. For though Paul preach, and Apollo water, yet neither Paul nor Apollo, but onely the Lord giveth increaſe.

Except the Lord open Balaams eyes, he seeth not the Angel of the Lord in the way with his Num.22.31. sword drawne in his hand, that is, neither anger nor love perceive wee ever, except the Lord worke it in us. How came it to passe that the Jewish people so seeing daily the wonderfull works of God for them, the proofes of his power, mercy, and goodnesse, above all the nations of the world, yet persisted unfaithfull, stubborne, and wayward to so good a God? saith Moses, Deut.29.4. these things being done for you, yet hath the Lord not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and eares to heare unto this day. Teaching us plainly, that such hearts, such eyes and eares, are onely the Lords to give, and without such gift wee profit nothing, no, not by the very evident extraordinary mercies of God. In another place againe, The Lord thy God will circumcise thine

If the Lord worke in one, hee worketh in all: the spirits of men are ruled and governed unto good, onely by him. If hee touch us, wee are touched, if hee turne us, wee are turned, and if hee revive not and give life, wee sinke in our sinnes, as unfeeling wretches, and abide in death.
Ezek.36.26,27 How plainly saith it againe the Prophet Ezekiel: I will give you a new heart, and I will put a new Spirit within you, and will take away the stony heart out of your body, and give you an heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walke in my statutes, &c.

O see and marke how all lets bee removed, and all grace given by the Lord alone in mercy, seeking our salvation. And therefore know it true, as the truth is true that neither hearing nor reading, preaching or private speaking, availeth ever to doe us good, except the guiding grace of the Lord direct us to it by a blessing given to them all, or any when they are used. And therefore, as for the Word, so for the blessing of it by the Spirit of God, doe wee ever pray when we say these words, Thy kingdome come. Then opened he their understanding (saith the Gospel of our Saviour Christ) that they might understand the Scripture. And Lydia attended to those things which Luke 24.45. Acts 16.14. Paul spake, because the Lord opened her heart. So that neither one nor other, Lydia nor the disciples of Christ, see, heare, or understand, except the Lord give the eye, the eare, and the heart. It is the holy Spirit that teacheth and leadeth into all truth, and without whom still all meanes remaine unprofitable.

There is an Ointment saith Saint Iohn, from him that is holy, and that anointing teacheth you all things, that is, the grace of the holy Ghost. Wherefore I cease not to make mention of you in my prayers (saith the holy Apostle) and to bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Iesus Christ, that

Chap. 1.14,15, &c. See Pauls refuge for profit to his preaching, and for life and light for these Ephesians, even to the Lord for his holy Spirit to soften and supple their stony hearts, to illuminate and lighten their darke minds, and to make sweet to them, that is sowre to many; and fruitfull to them by his mighty power, that is never so to any, without the same.

Verse 20. Wherefore to goe no further, know it for conclusion, that wee praying for Gods kingdome to come unto us, in this petition, by the hearing and preaching of his Word, the meanes appointed of him to erect the same, and seeing well by all this hath been said, that neither one nor other of these meanes can prevaile with us any thing, unlesse the Lord also with them give the power of his Spirit, and the blessing of his grace in our hearts by them: therefore there is included herein also even prayer for this grace, and the petition being understood of us, is thus much with the Lord, as we should in plaine termes say, O Lord give us not onely thy Word to reade Psal.119. and heare, but the heavenly grace of thy holy Spirit also to sanctifie, blesse, and make fruitfull to vs, both our reading and hearing, that so hearing, thy kingdome may come unto us, and thou ruling, and we ruled, we may live for ever with thee, according to thy promise. See then still further matter of this Petition.

And since the Lord hath taught us thus to pray for the helpe of his hand, and the blessing of his grace to all the meanes of good unto us, and so guided the tongues of his children ever before this forme was laid downe unto them, though in other words, let us brethren looke upon this occasion into our corruption, for truely the Lord revealeth a secret unto us of our nature, that thousands see not when hee thus teacheth us, that without his Spirit no meanes profit us. Wee trust to our wits, to our skill, to our yeeres and youth, and I know not what, and wee thinke wee have wings of nature above ovr fellowes, many of us, to flie aloft, and to ſee the ſecrets of the Lord: but truely it is not ſo, wee have all ſinned, and ſinne hath cut our wings, that wee cannot flie above; wee have all in our firſt parents tranſgreſſed, and that tranſgreſſion hath dazeled and darkned our eyes, cloſed our eares, and benummed our hearts, that wee can neither ſee, heare, nor feele, except it bee given us from above, as wee have now fully been taught. As naturall men we perceive not the things that are of God, wee are not able to thinke a thought that is good, but all our ſufficiency is of God; and by his grace onely wee are what we are that good is: If any truth be opened to us, the Lord hath done it; and concerning life eternall, fleſh and blood revealeth nothing to us, but the Father in heaven. Reade without this Spirit, and the booke is ſealed to us; heare without this Spirit, and it is a pleaſant ſong that ſinketh not, but paſſeth with the time; pray without this Spirit, and wee pray wee know not what, for it is the Spirit that helpeth our infirmities, and that maketh requeſt for us with ſighes which cannot be expreſſed: and he that ſearcheth the hearts knoweth what is the meaning of the Spirit, for hee maketh requeſt for the Saints according to the will of God. Have not this Spirit, and bee none of Chriſts, for as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the ſonnes of God. Want this Spirit, and feare againe the ſevere threatning of the Law; but have it, and crie in comfort, Abba, Father: the ſame Spirit bearing witneſſe with our ſpirits, that wee are the children of God, ſealing our adoption in our mindes, and therefore opening our mouths. This bleſſed Spirit and ſweet Grace, is that heavenly water that our Saviour ſpeaketh of in his dialogue with the woman of Samaria, when ſitting upon the well with her, hee ſaid, Whoſoever drinketh of this water ſhall thirſt againe, but the water that I ſhall give him, ſhall bee in him a well of water ſpringing up into everlaſting life. And, O my brethren, how differeth all earthly water from this, if wee marke it: let a man thirſt for honors, titles, pleaſures, places, and dignities of this painted world, and if hee enjoy them even in great meaſure, doe they quench his thirſt? No truely, but if this other water be away, I meane this moderating grace of Gods bleſſed Spirit whereof we ſpeake, they increaſe his thirſt a thouſand fold,; and of a ſound man before he enjoyed ſuch heapes, he is ſtricken into a loathſom and deadly diſeaſe, even a ſpirituall dropſie, that the more hee drinketh, the more dry he is, and never ſatisfied. Men are playing daily and hourely the part of Achſah, in ſeeking ſprings of water to his South countrey: that is, more to much, and ſtill ſomething elſe to that that is had already. But this water of Gods holy Spirit, ſpringing not out of the veines of the earth, but from the higheſt heavens, runneth about our hearts continually with a divine vertue, moſt comfortably cooling all our ſpirituall hearts, refreſhing us againſt all burning temptations, quenching the fiery darts of Satan, and finally quickning us to eternall life. This water therefore let us make account of, and pray for a true faith; for hee that beleeveth in mee, out of his belly ſhall flow rivers of water of life, ſaith the Scripture. Quench not this Spirit then, neither grieve him by whom wee are ſealed unto the day of redemption. But remember the good that commeth by him to this wretched frame of our ſinfull hearts: the ground is hard if this dewe drop not, and utterly unfruitfull if this grace bleſſe not. Lend mee therefore not thy tongue and lips only, but thy ſoule and heart chiefly, to pray with me to the Throne of mercy for our ſelves and others. O Lord, O Lord, create a cleane heart, and renew a right ſpirit within us evermore. Caſt us not away from thy preſence, neither take thy holy Spirit from us. Give us the comfort of thy helpe for ever, and eſtabliſh us with thy free Spirit. Amen.

What elſe is included in this Prayer?

Another good meanes to further this kingdome, is a godly, zealous, and carefull Magiſtrate, and therefore wee pray for him alſo, and the bleſſing of his ſervice. This teacheth the Lord us when he biddeth us pray for Kings and all that are in authority, that wee may leade a quiet and a peaceable life in all godlineſſe and honeſty. They are the meanes, the Lord giveth the bleſſing. The like doth the Apoſtle, when hee telleth us, that Princes are not to be feared for good workes, but for evill: and therefore if we will be without feare of the power, that we muſt do well, and ſo ſhall we have praiſe of the ſame: for he is the miniſter of God for our wealth. But if wee doe evill, that then wee muſt feare, for hee beareth not the ſword for nought, but is the miniſter of God to take vengeance on him that doth evill. Charging us as well for theſe good uſes of him, as alſo for the Author of his office and authority, which is the Lord, (for there is no power, ſaith he, but of God, and the powers that are bee ordained of God) that every ſoule of us be ſubject to the higher powers; and that we reſiſt not, for if we doe, we reſiſt the ordinance of God, and they that ſo reſiſt, receive to themſelves damnation. This benefit of a Magiſtrate to the increaſe of Gods kingdome, appeared in Aſa, who tooke away the Sodomites out of the land, put away all the Idols his father had made, diſplaced his mother for her Idolatry, and deſtroyed her Idols, The like appeared in Ezekiah, Ioſiah and the reſt. Reade what they did, ſee what authority may doe, nay ought to doe. Vertue flowriſheth by juſt incouragements, vice flieth and dieth by juſt puniſhments, if the Magiſtrate bee good; and then ruleth God when it is ſo. Bleſſed therefore well may be ſaid, is the Land, when the King is the ſonne of Nobles, and when the Princes eat in time, for ſtrength, and not for drunkenneſſe. That is, when the higher and lower, and all powers in a land are famous for vertue and wisedome, and with the gifts of God. And why so? Surely because these being thus, the Lord is King in such a place, and his heavenly power is more and more daily spread over and into the hearts of men by these meanes. Contrariwise, Woe to the Land when the King is a child, and the Princes eat in the morning: that is, when the chiefe wanteth wisedome and counsell, and the inferiours are given to their lusts and pleasures. And why so againe? Surely because then, for want of so forcible a meanes as carefull magistracy is to represse it, vice floweth, vertue flieth, and God ruleth not. Finally, therefore doe wee pray here in this Petition, and aske of the Lord as a great mercy, that hee would give us godly, carefull and zealous Magistrates, to the better setting up of his blessed kingdome amongst us. And truely beloved, would God the just and often consideration of these might worke in us a faithfull love to them for their paines, and a flaming thankfulnesse to the Lord for them when wee have them. O that wee would meditate of it upon our beds, and thinke upon it when wee are waking, that Moses felt when he said, How can I beare your cumbrance, your charge and your strife alone? Or what he felt that said to his regall Crowne or Scepter, that hee which knew the carke and care, the woes and griefe, the toiles and labours, and the infinite perils and feares that are incident to it, would not take it up if hee found it in the street. Then would we feele what it is to governe and to be aloft. Then assuredly would we honour Magistrates more, love them more, obey them more, and contend against them lesse, in a very true conscience to deale unkindly with a meanes ordained in heaven of so much good to man. God give us eyes, God give us hearts, and God give us the blessing we speake of still.

Will you goe any further in this Petition?

No indeed, this may suffice for my briefe purpose I hope, and therefore this onely will I adde that which I told you of in the beginning, that as we pray for these mercies when we say these words, so pray we as effectually in sense against the contraries of them. For if Gods Kingdome come, then must be done away whatsoever let either hindereth or obscureth the same: Contrary to the use of the Word is that fearefull famine the Prophet speaketh of, contrary to godly and profitable reading is barbarisme, ignorance, and contempt or neglect of good letters, contrary to carefull hearing is that Adder-like stopping our eares against the Charmer, contrary to the sweet melting motions of Gods holy Spirit in us, hardnesse, dulnesse, and unfeelingnesse of heart, prophaneneſſe, and whatsoever is the property of bad ground, contrary to preaching, dumbnesse, to plaine preaching, unprofitable curiosity, to painefull and often, negligent and rare preaching. Contrary to Magistracy is anarchy, to a godly, a wicked, and a bad, and to a faithfull and carefull, a negligent and an idle Magistrate. And to conclude, contrary to the Kingdome of God in any of us, is the Devill and all his workes, the vaine pompe and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and the carnall desires of the flesh, to follow and to be lead by them. All these therefore we pray as heartily and truely against, as we doe for the other, when we say, Thy Kingdome come. And let all that heare me consider of it, what we see to day, namely, thus much, that if wee feele no true testimonies in our soules that wee are the children of this kingdome, but enemies to it, hinderers, letters, and obscurers of it by our workes, words, and thoughts, our owne tongues, and hearts, and all the tongues and hearts under heaven, praying this prayer, rise up against us, and if wee will not bee reformed, desire of the Lord that hee will take us away, confound us, and destroy us by his judgements, that his kingdome may increase and arise. And what fearefull thing is this? To our owne lips the Lord will grant the confusion of our selves, the prayer of one shall bee heard, of two or three by faithfull promise, but the prayer of thousands, and tenne thousand thousands, even of all the Churches and chosen throughout the world, yea, of whatsoever millions in them that pray this prayer, what a shrike maketh it in the heavens to the Lord, and how will he rush up in his just conceived anger, and accomplish what they aske? Therefore with shaking hearts at so great a perill, let us consider of it. Wee feeders and fathers spirituall of the Lords people, let us thinke upon it, and enter into accounts how we doe, further wee or hinder wee the kingdome of the Lord, speake we, or spare we, sound we or sin we, labor we or loiter we, for Gods sake, what do we? Woe to us if we doe not worke, and blessed is that servant whom his master when he commeth shall find so doing. Magistrates and powers consider of it, put you forward, or put you backward Gods kingdome, sleepe you or wake you, are you nurses or none to the Church of Christ, to vertue and piety, and diligent destroyers of sinne aod wickednesse, judge you the cause of the afflicted and poore that you may prosper, or doe you contrary, that you may perish, what doe you? Private men judge, and every particular person one by one consider of it. What doe you? ruleth God in you by his holy Spirit, working faith to God and love of men, with daily and sundry fruits of them both? Doe you set up in your owne houses, places, and charges, this holy kingdome as much as lieth in you by private admonitions, by vertuous examples, and by such meanes as you may? or doe you plucke or pull downe, hinder and let by the contraries greatly? As you love your selves thinke of it, and then shall we know whether we pray for our selves or against our selves when wee say this prayer, and what hope wee may have of the rest whatsoever whatsoever throughout this earth. Thy kingdome come is said often and in many places, if it bee well with us for our measure in our severall places, then so often is the Lord solicited to be good unto us, and there is a communion of good unto the godly by their prayers: if it be otherwise, alas the time, we perish as we live, if we change not speedily, and in some fearfull sort, to the testimony of Gods justice: for the prayer of the chosen, so many, so often making it, and with such spirit of desire, must be heard at last. Thus pray we for the kingdome of God, and for all the meanes that it ariseth by in the hearts of men, and pray we against whatsoever hindreth or withholdeth the same, when we say this petition. And in stead of much more that might be said, let this suffice. The iniquity of our times, and the fearefull loosnes of these daies if it be considered, will tell all Christian hearts, how needfull, even now especially, is this prayer to be made often. Let us pray.

The Prayer.

O Divine Majesty, and most mighty God, heare us wee beseech thee, thy humble servants here gathered together, and in that mercy that hath no measure, subdue all power of Satan and sinne in us still more and more; and rule thou ever over body and soule, over heart and minde, over word and worke, for Christ his sake: and not onely over us, but over many moe, even that number that thou hast appointed to eternall life. To this end give the meanes appointed by thee, thy holy, blessed, and eternall word. Make us carefull readers of it, and carefull hearers of it read unto us, and give thy blessing as thou hast done of old to this endeavour. Make us blessed with them that meditate in thy Law, faithfull beleevers, as that Eunuch had his Bible in the Chariot with him, and read in it as he travelled. Profiting searchers with those good Beræans. Feed our faith, raise up our affiance, fasten our hope, and increase godly knowledge in us, as thou hast done by this meanes in thy children ever. Increase the number of able teachers to thy Church, O gracious God, and blesse their labours, a more mighty meanes to inlarge thy kingdome than reading is. Adde to thy Church by them thousands and thousands. Cast downe by thy mighty power all holds, and imaginations, and every thing that is exalted against the knowldge of thee, and bring into captivity every thought to the obedience of thee. Strengthen thy people that they never despise thy appointed meanes to save their soules, but that thankfull to thy Majesty for the thing, they may have the persons in singular love for their workes sake, obeying them, and submitting themselves to them, as the appointed overseers of them, that they may give their accounts with joy, and not with griefe. If it fall out otherwise, thy just purpose being to slay those disobedient scorners, O Lord, O Lord, make strong thy servants to endure this griefe, and not fearing the face of any whose hearts feare not thee, nor weighing the godlesse love of them that love not cheerfully to goe on through all pikes of worldly unthankfulnes, through good report and ill report, and all snubs, knowing in a sweet feeling that they are unto thee a sweet savour of Christ in them that perish, as well as in them that are saved. And let it never be said of us, O heavenly Father, as once it was of others, that these things being done for us, and wee professors of thy great mercies, yet thou hast not given us a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and eares to heare. For thy mercy sake circumcise our hearts, and the hearts of our seed, that wee may love thee much our Lord and God, and live with thee for ever. Revive the spirits of the humble, and give life to them that are of a contrite heart: Take away our stony hearts out of our bodies, and give us hearts of flesh. Open our understanding as thou didst thy Disciples, that wee may understand both by reading and preaching to our comfort. Give us, mercifull Father, that heavenly Spirit that leadeth into all truth, that happy anoynting that teacheth all things, that Spirit of wisdome and revelation, that the eyes of our mindes may be lightned, that wee may know what the hope of our calling is, and the riches of that glorious inheritanee prepared for the Saints. That we may be strengthened by the Spirit in the inner man, that Christ thy Sonne may dwell in our hearts by faith, and wee able in some measure to comprehend thy loving kindnesse to all penitent, weeping and wayling sinners. For O Father wee have sinned, and darkenesse hath entred to rule both body and soule if thou helpe not. Lord in that mercy that hath no measure looke upon us, and let not his malice destroy the workes that thy mercy hath made. His kingdome is death, thy Kingdome is life and joy for evermore, O heavenly God, then let thy kingdome come, that we ruled here by that saving hand of thine, may taste and feele, enjoy, and have for ever the reward that followeth such subjection in thy glorious kingdome, not for our sakes, but for Jesus Christ his sake, with Thee and the holy Spirit, one Majestie mightie and glorious, ever blessed and praised from generation eternally. Amen.

and

The third PETITION.

Thy will be done, &c.

Why followeth this next?

THE order, if we marke it, is most fit and good: for in the former we prayed that the Lord might rule in us, but that cannot he doe if wee ever remaine unwilling, stirring and wrestling against him and his will, (Inter invitos enim & reluctantes nemo commode regnare potest) therefore very rightly do wee pray in the next place that his will may bee done. And truly very duty bindeth all children to frame their life according to the will of their fathers, and not contrariwise the parents to conforme themselves to the will of their children. Psal.40.8. In the volume of thy booke (saith David) it is written of me that I should doe thy will. So is it of us all, for this is a matter that concerneth not David onely, but every man that hopeth and looketh for the place that David now hath, and therefore with David we must all and every one say most heartily, O my God, I am content to do it, yea thy Law is within my heart, that is, not ordinarily or superficially thought upon by me, but it is even my earnest and vehement meditation continually. Ioh.5.30. I seeke not mine owne will (saith our Saviour Christ) but the will of the Father who hath sent me. And let us thinke, that if he did thus that was subject to no sinne, but had received all power of God, and himselfe was Lord of all, what excuse may wee have before his glorious face, in that high Court of his, at the latter day, if called into the kingdome of God, and received into the adoption of the sons of God, we do not as good children, the will of the Father, but as rebellious wretches every one his owne will? Againe, Iohn 6.38. I came downe from heaven, not to doe mine owne will, but his will that hath sent mee. Thus did hee as a Sonne to his Father, and thus must we doe if wee bee sonnes with him. And therefore pray we heartily to our heavenly Father as here we are taught, Thy will be done. For, Mat.7.21. Not every one that saith unto mee, Lord Lord, shall enter into the Kingdome of heaven, but he that doth the will of my Father which is in heaven.

Why pray we that Gods will may be done, and not ours may be done?

Because our wickednesse is still great in the earth, and all the immaginations of the thoughts of our hearts by nature are onely evill continually. Gen.6.5. And because the naturall man (as saith the Apostle,) 1 Cor.2.14. perceiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishnes unto him: neither can hee know them, because they are spiritually discerned: That is, because in truth we are so fallen by our first sin, and our will so corrupted thereby, that of our selves we cannot will the thing that is good, no not thinke it, but both the will and deed if it be good, yea and all our sufficiency is of him. But on the other side the Lords will is all holy and ever holy, yea holinesse it selfe, and the rule of right for ever. Wherefore by good reason wee pray as we do, Thy will be done.

And this being the true ground indeed of our doing, let us by the way consider whether even this Petition assureth not our consciences of their errour that say it, and of our truth that deny it, that in us or any, is left by nature a free will to do good: For are we not here taught to pray that his will may be done and not ours? We see it. And may we contrary to this order pray that our will may be done, that is, our owne proper and naturall will? Who will say it? But I will say it, that if I were by nature and of my self able to will the thing that is good, then might I lawfully and rightly pray that my will might be done. Wherefore we see, and the world may see, how even this prayer, if there were no further proofe, yet satisfieth the consciences of men as touching this losse in us, namely, of free will to doe or wish good to our selves, till the Lord renew us, and then it is not I, but the grace of God in me, saith the Apostle. But this doctrine hath beene sufficiently touched before.

The error of free-will is against this petition.

What will of God is here meant? for I have heard that it is diversly propounded unto us, though one and the same simple unto him, or in respect of him.

You

You have heard right, and to make this ſpeech as plaine as I can, you muſt underſtand that the will of God is ſaid to be of two ſorts, to wit, hidden and revealed. The firſt, for that it is ſo, in the Scripture reſembled to a depth, and it is unſearchable of man. Wee crie out of it with the Apoſtle: O the deepeneſſe of the wiſdome and knowledge of God, how unſearchable are his judgements, and his waies paſt finding out! And with the Prophet David, Thy righteouſneſs is like the mighty mountaines, thy judgements are like the great deepe. We ſay of it, That no man preſume herein to underſtand above that which is meet to underſtand, but that he underſtand according to ſobriety. For curioſity in this behalfe the Lord miſliketh, we plainly ſee. When the Apoſtles asked him of the reſtoring of the Kingdome of Iſrael, when he would do it, then or no, wee know he ſnubbed them for this entring into the hidden will of God, and told them that it was not for them to know the times and ſeaſons which the Father hath put in his owne power. When Peter asked the Lord of that other Diſciple, hic autem quid: Lord what ſhall this man do? Remember how the Lord anſwered this curioſity of deſire to know this hidden will, and told him that if he would have him tarry till he came, what was that to him, let him do that which he knew to be done. So that this will of God is not to bee pried into, in a buſie and curious impiety of minde, as many wicked ones doe, and that by moſt horrible meanes, even by ſpirits and devils, ſeeking to pull out of heaven, and wreſt from the Lord, as they thinke, his ſecrets before the time. Forgetting quite what the great ſervant of the Lord, Moſes, ſaid touching this thing: namely, that the ſecret matters belong to the Lord our God, but the things revealed belong to us, and to our children for ever, that we may do them. This will of God is called ſecret or hidden, for two cauſes.

First, becauſe it is ſo indeed to all men, till ſuch time as God manifeſt by events what he hath appointed to every one. In reſpect whereof, Saint Iames willeth every man to put in this condition, if the Lord will, and if we live to do this or that.

Secondly, becauſe the reaſon of the Lords will thus or thus, when it is manifeſted for the moſt part is not comprehended of man, but hidden in himſelfe. As why hee choſe Iacob and refuſed Eſau: why he put Saul away from the Kingdome for one offence, and not David for many, with ſuch like. Only this we know with the Apoſtle, that he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardneth. And this his will is our ſtay.

Rom. 9. Mat. 11. 25.

What then is mans duty in reſpect of this will?

Mans duty in reſpect of the hidden will of God.

Surely, as hath bin ſaid, Non eſt curioſe inveſtiganda ſed adoranda, It is not to be ſifted, but highly reverenced, and till the time come that the Lord reveale it, by effects in general thus to be diſpoſed in my ſelf, that whatſoever this hidden wil of the Lord be concerning me, whether to live or die, to be poore or rich, to be high or low in this world, in the ſame I reſt and am contented, let the Lord that made me, do with me and diſpoſe of me at his pleaſure And then afterward when the Lord ſhall reveale it by effects, much more to reſt in it, and give him thanks howſoever it is, taking with good Iob, even evill things at the Lords hands, as well as good, that is, ſowre as well as the ſweet, and lowring lots, as well as ſmiling daies. Bleſſing the name of the Lord that hath taken what before he gave, and yet dealeth with us but in mercy ever.

Iob. 2.

Doe we pray that this will may be done?

No, for this is ever done, and ſhall be whileſt the world endureth, neither can any creature or power reſiſt it: So ſaith the Prophet, My counſell ſhall ſtand, and I will doe what I will doe. So confeſſed Iehoſaphat King of Judah, when he ſaid, O Lord God of our Fathers, art not thou God in heaven, and raigneſt not thou over all the kingdomes of the Heathen? and in thy hand is power and might, and none is able to withſtand thee. And ſo notably confeſſed that wretched Balaam, when he ſaid, If Balac would give me his houſe full of ſilver and gold, I cannot paſſe the commandement of the Lord, or do either good or bad of mine owne mind, &c. So confeſſed the Devill, when he asked leave to touch Iob, not able elſe of himſelfe to goe againſt Gods will, and all thoſe devils that could not enter into the ſwine, ſent by the will of God, and all the actions of man and beaſt ever bridled and ruled, and diſpoſed by the power of his will. No reſiſtance therefore can there be againſt this will, and therefore no need that we ſhould pray that it may be done. No Annas nor Caiphas, no Herod nor Pilat, no Iewes nor Devils could have wrought the death of our Saviour Chriſt, except the hand of the Lord and his counſell had determined before that it ſhould bee done.

Eſay 46. 10. 2 Chron. 20. 6.

Acts 3. 4. 28.

But do not you now ſay that God willeth evill to be done, and ſo make him the author of evill?

God forbid we ſhould make God the author of evill. Yet ſay wee indeed that God willeth many things, that in ſome reſpects are evill, and to ſome perſons, as the death of his owne Son named laſt, and ſuch like. But as he willeth them they are never evill, neither to ſuch as hee directeth a good by them, being not done by them, as in the example named appeareth. But ſurely ſome larger ſpeech to draw us to a right knowledge herein is not amiſſe, and therefore a little I pray you heare. Will therefore hath two objects, to wit, good and evill, ſometime, it willing the one, ſometimes the other. And good things, (beſide the Lord which is the chiefe good of all) are to bee of three ſorts, Naturall, Morall, and Divine. The firſt belong, ad vitam animatam: the ſecond, ad humanam: the third, ad cœleſtem & divinam.

Mans will hath two objects, to wit, good and evill.

All

All these the Lord willeth there is no controversie, and not only so, but is also even the Fountaine and Giver, as Saint Iames saith: for every good giving, and every perfect gift is from above, and commeth from the Father of light, with whom is no variableness, neither shadowing by turning. So hath evill also his distinction, whilst some is the evill, some the punishment of the evill. The distinction is Tertullians against Marcion, and received usually. That evill which is called the punishment of evill, there is no question neither, but God willeth, and is the author of it, he being the Judge, of whose warrant it is done: and the punishment it selfe, being a worke of justice against sinne, being also good. The question is de malo culpæ, of that evill that is the evill it selfe, how God willeth it, or not. And concerning this matter, see first on the one side what is truth, Thou art God (saith the Prophet David) that lovest not wickednes, neither shall any evill dwell with thee. No, thou lovest righteousnes, and hatest iniquity: Perditio tua ex te Israel, & auxilium à me, Thy destruction Israel, is by thy selfe, and of thy selfe, and in me is thy helpe. When the Devill speaketh a lye, he speaketh of his owne, for he is a lyar, and the father thereof. See then the true author of evill, not God, but Satan.

Furthermore, if God be all good, how can he will the thing that is evill; every thing willing, but that which is agreeable to the nature thereof: This striveth therefore with his goodnesse. It is contrary also to his power, for what good that he will, is not he able to bring to passe without the meanes of evill? And if he be, then needeth not he to will any evill, to the end to compasse some good by it that otherwise he could not. It is contrary to his mercy, which extendeth it selfe upon them that have done evill. It is contrary to his justice, which punisheth it in others. And plainly we see then, that the Lord doth not will any evill: Which Saint Augustine acknowledged, when he said, Deus non est auctor alicius rei, qua homo fit deterior, God is never author of any thing, whereby man may be made the worse. Now on the other side, heare againe what is truth also. The Lord delivereth men up into a reprobate minde, to do those things which are not convenient; the Lord sendeth men strong delusions to beleeve lies, the Lord sent a spirit to seduce Achab, and put him in the mouth of all Achabs prophets, with many such things testified of the Lord in the Word, which in us were evill, and seeme so to bee in the Lord also, if our knowledge be not better to distinguish and to cleare him, in whom there can be no unrighteousnesse ever. Hereupon swell the Libertines in blasphemy against the Lord, and excusing themselves, charge him with their wicked waies.

Hereat also stumble the Manichees, and therefore made duo principia, two originalls or first causes of actions: the one most good, from whence came all goodnesse: the other most evill, from whence came all evill, and the punishment of all evill. And hereat also stick many, saying, God suffereth these things to be done, but no further. But I pray you let us aske them whether God suffereth them willingly, or against his will: If they say willingly, then confesse they that God hath a part in the action, and that is more than suffering: If they say unwillingly, then make they not him omnipotent: for, cannot hee let any thing that he willeth not? Wee know he can, and there is none that can resist his will, saith the Apostle. Wherefore to helpe this matter, and to answer with truth, wee must understand a few things, and I pray you harken. Wee must distinguish of sinne, and wee must distinguish of will. Sinne hath two distinctions fit for this purpose to be knowne: For either it is considered simply in it selfe, and by it selfe, as a thing contrary to the law of God, or it is considered as a cause of sin that went before. The first God never willeth, neither can will: The second so also: But in the third respect, God is said to will evill, to wit, not as it is evill, but as it is pœna peccati, the punishment of evill: Which indeed is a just thing of the Lord. So doth he punish sin with sin, as in the place before named, hee punished the Gentiles with delivery up to a reprobate mind to worke evill, because when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankfull. The second distinction is this, in sinne and all evill, there is the action, and the deformity or evill, of, and in the action. The first God may will, for he is indeed the very first efficient cause of every action, according to that saying, In him we live, move, and have our being: and, Deus operatur in omnibus, 1 Cor. 12.16. and of him, and for him, &c. omnia, Rom. 11.16. Touching the second, wee must understand, that will is either proper or improper. Proper, when we will a thing for it selfe, either as a good thing indeed, or at least so judged of us: improper, when we will a thing, not for it selfe, as good of it selfe, but for some other good that shall follow it. And thus may wee will that thing that is evill, as a man willeth the cutting off some member, for the safety of all the rest: So God willeth evil things not because he alloweth them, or loveth them, which is properly to will, but because he seeth in his mercy, he so disposing them, some good shall follow of them, which as I say, is to will improperly: and herein we see how still the object of will is good in the Lord. To apply then all this to God, so farre as our question requireth, let us understand, that that evill which is a punishment inflicted by God for some former evill, wee may say that God willeth: For so teacheth us the same God himselfe by his Prophet, saying, I forme the light, and create the darknes, I make peace, and create evill, I the Lord do all these things. Marke how the Lord saith, hee createth evill, that is, the evill that is a just punishment of some former evill or ſinne. The like againe by the Prophet Amos, ſhall a Trumpet be blowne in a Citie, and the Lord hath not done it? Out of the mouth of the moſt high proceedeth not evill and good. Is it not a known truth in Divinity, that the Lord puniſheth often ſinne with ſinne? Now all ſinne we know is evill, if we reſpect it ſelfe, but if we reſpect it as it commeth from God to puniſh ſinne withall, then is it in that reſpect not evill, but a juſt, right, and good thing. The hardning of Pharaohs heart, in Pharaoh was evill, in God it was a juſt puniſhment of his ſinne. The deceiving of Achab with a lye, in it ſelfe conſidered, was evill, but as God did it for a puniſhment of his ſinne, it was not evill, but juſt. That ſtrong deluſion whereof Paul ſpeaketh, in it ſelfe is evill, but if wee marke it, inflicted by God as a puniſhment for want of love to the truth, ſo it is a juſt thing, and not evill. So the delivering of the Gentiles into a reprobate minde, and all ſuch examples in the word. Tertullian againſt Marcion, and Auguſtine againſt Iulian, handle this matter, and may further be read of it.

This ſufficeth to ſhew, that although we ſay that God willeth often that thing, that in it ſelfe conſidered is evill, yet as it proceedeth from him that it ſhould be ſo, and conſequently hee the author of evill, it followeth not. For many times evill is the puniſhment of evill, and that is juſt with the Lord ever.

Concerning the ſecond diſtinction, how God may be the author of the action, and yet not of the evill any way in the action, ſee by theſe ſimilitudes. The Sunne lightning with his hote beames upon a dead carcaſſe, cauſeth a ſtrong and loathſome ſavour, yet is not the Sunne either unſweet it ſelfe, or the cauſe of that unſweetneſſe, but the carion it ſelfe: For if the Sunne were the cauſe, then ever the like cauſe, the like effect, but we ſee it is not ſo, but contrary, when it lighteth upon ſweet herbes and odoriferous flowers, it draweth out of them great ſweetneſſe and pleaſant ſmels.

God may be author of the action, and yet not of the evill in the action.

Againe, the Earth, we all know, with her ſappe and moyſture, feedeth and nouriſheth all the trees, plants, and roots that are, yet is not that Earth cauſe why this tree bringeth a bitter fruit, and that herbe or root a bad taſte, but the nature ſeverall of the things themſelves is the cauſe of that.

Thirdly, the pure word of the Lord is preached or read, and one favoureth and gathereth to life, another to death and deſtruction; is now the Word cauſe of thoſe ſeverall effects? or the creatures themſelves bleſſed or not bleſſed with Gods holy Spirit? Thus may the Lord then bee author of an action, and yet not of the evill in the action, and ſo he ſeemeth to will evill, when yet in truth he doth not.

What is now his revealed will?

All that which in the holy booke of his word he hath laid downe and declared, to be the duty which he will have performed of us towards him.

And is this that will which here we pray may be done?

Yea, that is it, and therefore if we will underſtand this Petition, let us looke what is required of us in this word, and all that we begge of the Lord, ſtrength and ability to do. Wee beſeech him, that whereas the minds of earthly men burning with luſts, are commonly carried to deſire, and to do thoſe things that moſt diſpleaſe God: hee of his mercy will with the moving of his holy Spirit ſo change and faſhion all the wils of us all, to that will of his Majeſty, that wee may will and wiſh nothing that his divine will miſliketh. Precamur & optamus, ut non tantum faciat Deus quod vult, ſed nos facere poſſimus quod vult. We pray that not only God would do his will, but that we may do what is his will, ſaith Cyprian. To run over all the duties of a Chriſtian required in the Word, were too long: let us therefore not ſo doe, but for example ſake of all the reſt conſider theſe three.

Rom.8.5.7.&c.

Firſt, we know it is the Lords will, that we ſhould beleeve in Jeſus Chriſt, whom he hath ſent and that by faith in his name, we and all the world ſhould obtaine remiſſion of our ſins and eternall life. So God loved the world, that he gave his onely begotten ſonne, that whoſoever beleeveth in him ſhould not periſh, but have everlaſting life. And againe, This is the worke of God (that is, the worke that God requireth of you) that yee beleeve in him whom he hath ſent. Wherefore in this Petition we beſeech him, that that will of his may be done in us, that is, that wee may receive grace ſo to do, and never to looke for ſalvation in any other.

Iohn 3.16. Iohn 6.29.

Secondly, wee know that it is the Lords will, that wee ſhould in a true faith lead a holy and clean life, for ſo ſaith the Apoſtle, Hæc eſt voluntas Dei, ſanctificatio veſtra: This is the will of God, even your ſanctification, and that yee ſhould abſtaine from fornication; that every one of you ſhould know how to poſſeſs his veſſel in holineſs and honor, and not in the luſt of concupiſcence, as the Gentiles which know not God.

1 Theſ.4.3. &c.

What do we then in this Petition, but beſeech the Lord, that that will may bee daily done of us, and we daily changed by the renewing grace of his bleſſed Spirit, into ſuch men and women as he deſireth and delighteth in, namely, into holy creatures, walking not after the fleſh, but after the Spirit, and ſo conſequently favouring not the things of the fleſh, but of the ſpirit. That we may be holy, as he is holy. That our light may ſo ſhine before men, as they may ſee our good good workes,and glorifie our Father which is in heaven: that we may keepe iudgement,and doe iustice in our callings: that being buried with Christ by Baptisme into death, as hee is risen from the dead to the glory of the Father,so we also might walke in newnesse of life: That sinne may not rule in our mortall bodies, that we should obey it in the lusts thereof, or give our members as weapons of unrighteousnesse unto sinne: That fornication and all uncleannesse, or covetousnesse, may not once be named amongst us, as becommeth Saints: That wee may put on as the elect of God, holy and beloved, the bowels of mercy, kindnesse, humblenesse of minde, meekenesse, long-suffering, forbearing one another, if any man have a quarrell to another, and forgiving,even as Christ hath forgiven us; and what should I say? Wee beseech the Lord even that very God of peace, to sanctifie us throughout, that our whole spirit and soule, and body, may be kept blamelesse unto the comming of our Lord Jesus Christ. And with David we say in effect,Looke if there be any way of wickednesse in me,and lead me in the way everlasting. Thus saith Cyprian,Voluntas Dei(quam stabiliri & fieri precamur) est quam Christus fecit & docuit: humilitas in conversatione, stabilitas in fide, verecundia in verbis,in factis justitia,in operibus misericordia, in moribus disciplina: The will of God which we pray to be establisned and done,is that which Christ both did and taught, humility in life, stability in faith, shamefastnesse in words, justice in deeds,mercy in workes,discipline in manners. And doe we thus pray then to bee holy? O my beloved,what shall we answer the Lord then, I say not for our unholinesse, but even for our security, dulnesse, deadnesse, and conceived hearty pleasure in unholinesse? Was it ever counted better than a mockery, to seeme to aske a thing, and yet to doe against it? To desire a Physitian to helpe unto health, and in the meane while our selves with all our might to feed upon the foes of that wished good? Consider then our cases, and the cases of thousands that happely thinke not of it as they ought: wee open our lips unto the Lord of heaven, and pray that wee may be holy, wee would be thought by him and the whole world to meane good faith, and yet what is holy we even hate to be drawne to, misliking none more, neither wishing any company lesse than theirs,that either perswade us to it,or seeme to expect it at our hands, and what is unholy we wallow in,we tumble in,we ioy in,and we even wish to live and grow old in. We pamper the flesh both with food and rayment above all Christian licence, so cherishing, so coying, so lulling and lapping, yea so bathing in pleasure and ease, in softnesse and tendernesse, in wildnesse and wantonnesse, that matter of earth, and wormes meate, as if wee neither thought there were corruption to rot it, heaven to receive it, or hell to burne in. The minde wee rob of all meditation that is holy, and feed it with matter of all hellish impurity. The Lords booke is laid in a corner, and the Devils banners are displayed in every window. Our tongues cannot taste the testimonies of God sweeter than honey or the honey combe; but they can discourse the delights of sinfull flesh,that shall send to hell. Our cheekes are red to talke of Christ, as wee goe to Emaus,and we blush apace to seeme so holy, but the Morian blusheth as fast as we,when fearefully and foully we sinne against the Lord. Wee love the wicked,we loath the godly; wee freeze in love, wee boile in malice; wee sell vertue,we buy sinne; refuse Christ,and choose Barrabas;we lay away life,and play with death: but oh pleasureless play in the end! Let the Prophet Osea speake for me to you, and he will tell us surely that there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land: That by swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and whoring, wee breake out, and blood toucheth blood. And is this holinesse? Is this to pray, Thy will be done? For Gods sake thinke of it, and know with me now in time,what I would bee loath you should know past time, that you may even as well spit upon Christ Jesus, buffet him,and beate him with a reede,kneele before him and say, Haile King of the Iewes, with those cursed mockers, as kneele in this Church or any where, and say, Thy will be done, and yet never care how you doe it in a holy life: For it is horrible mockery, it is horrible hypocrisie, and the end will be evill. You must with prayer to be holy, joyne care to be so: to be faithfull and fervent, you must endeavour it, and you must performe it in some measure, as truly as begge it, or else as truly you perish for ever. The Lord will not be mocked alwaies, the Lord will not have such seeming prayers made, and such sinning lives retained still. Of our owne mouthes shall hee judge us: therefore once againe, as you love the Lord, thinke of it, and to day harden not your hearts against that you heare. You heare the will of God is that we should be holy,and we pray that this may be done. Prayer accepted of God, may not bee without earnest care that it may be done, care to be holy, casteth away the love of looseneſſe; cast away then, what shall cast away you if you doe not, and care for that which shall cause a comfort for ever and ever. Let not the Father speake it of us: Ad Deum omnes ire volunt, post Deum pauci: To God would all goe,but after God will few goe. To live in heaven together,is better than to live in Wilton together,and parting will be paine, if we part in that day. Bee moved then now, that you bee not over-much moved then,even to cry to the mountaines to fall upon you,and to the hills to cover you. Alas, why should I be a minister of death unto you, that so truly wish your life? or a sweet smelling savour to my God in your destruction, because I have done my duty, when I crie to the Lord that I may be crowned with you,and never lose you. As then hereafter you care to be what in this petition you pray to be, ſo love you God, ſo love you your ſelves, ſo love you me, ſo love you heaven, ſo feare you hell, and the God of mercy give my ſpeech a bleſſing to us all.

So love you God, as you care to be what you pray to be.

Amen, I beſeech him, now in time before the doore be ſhut, and the Bridegroome come: For in vain did the fooliſh Virgins knocke, when the time was paſt. But what duties elſe will you name that God requireth, and we pray for in this Petition.

One moe, and that is this: It is the Lords will, that in this world we ſhould take up our croſſe and follow him, as many as will be his diſciples; that through many tribulations we ſhould enter into the kingdome of heaven; and that all that will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus, ſhould ſuffer perſecution; that if we be ſonnes, we ſhould not be without correction, but now and then chaſtened of our God, that we may not be condemned with the world. This will we beſeech the Lord may be done in us, and we enabled by his holy Spirit ſtill more and more, whatſoever wee perceive to betide in this life, by his good pleaſure to receive it, and ſuffer it not only with contented, but alſo with gladſome hearts. And this is a chiefe uſe of this Prayer, for truly it is a ſmall thing in compariſon, beloved, during the time of proſperity and comfort, to ſay, Thy will be done, O Lord: but if in adverſity, when the world lowreth, the ſtorme ariſeth, Princes perſecute, and our owne houſes are divided, our fathers betraying us, our children forſaking us, and our friends defying us for the cauſe of God, if we can then ſay both with content and joy, Thy will be done; this is a ſtrength and a grace of God above all treaſure to be honoured. If it be not ſo high a matter, but loſſe of goods by ſome occaſion, loſſe of friends, want of health, and weary times by bitter paine in body, or ſoking ſorow in minde, yet if we can herein ſay it with true content and comfort, truly it is a meaſure that noteth a childe of heaven, and happy we. But oh hard, hard, yet not ſo hard, but God is able!

Mat. 16. 24. Acts 14. 22. 2 Tim. 3. 12. Heb. 12. 1 Cor. 11.

To ſay with content under the croſſe, Thy will be done, is a great grace.

For behold examples before our eyes: Old Eli in the booke of Samuel, when he had received from the Lord of heaven an heavy meſſage by his yong waiter, little Samuel, to wit, that the Lord would judge his houſe, and that the wickedneſſe thereof ſhould not be purged with ſacrifice nor offering, but utterly deſtroyed for ever: what ſaid he, but even what here we pray, for our parts, we may be able to ſay in our adverſity: It is the Lord, let him doe what ſeemeth him good. That is, it is my God and my Lord, wherefore with me and mine let him do his pleaſure, for we are his.

1 Sam. 3. 18.

See therefore this given grace, when the Lord will, though it be hard. The like did David in his great extremity, when Abſolon was in the field againſt him, and the Ark brought forth by the Prophets to be caried with him: Have the Ark of God (ſaith he) into the City again: if I ſhall finde favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me againe, and ſhew me both it and the Tabernacle thereof. But if he thus ſay, I have no delight in thee, behold here am I, let him do to me as ſeemeth good in his eyes. Therefore not impoſſible, we ſee, for the Lord to work in whom he will, though to our vile corruption a hard matter indeed: our Saviour Chriſt in our fleſh ſaid it with a true content, Yet not my will, but thy will be done, O Father. And in us can he work it by his painfull Spirit, if it pleaſe him. Good meanes to help us, are the ſundry comfortable ſpeeches in the Word concerning the Lords care over us ever, and eſpecially when we have moſt need of him, by reaſon of any woe that we are wrapped in. Our times are in the hand of the Lord, and he, not man, ſhall diſpoſe of our dayes. Our haires are numbred, and our teares are put in his bottell. What are the haires and teares to body and ſoule, and other matters of ours more weighty. He careth for the Ravens, Lions, Birds of the aire, how much more for us? Are we not more worth than many Sparrowes, O we of little faith? If the Dragon would devoure us, he is able in a moment to give us wings to flye into the wilderneſſe, and to eſcape him. If he will not, but a triall muſt be had of us: heare and marke you, lift up your hearts and rejoyce with me; Fidelis eſt Dominus: The Lord is faithfull, and will not ſuffer us to be tempted above that we are able, but will even give the iſſue with the temptation, that we may be able to beare it. O ſweet, O more than ſweet, and the unſpeakable comfort of my fraile fleſh, and all ſuch as I am. For let me doe my duty, feare the Lord, and make much of his lawes; cut apeeces daily, as he will enable me, the cord of ſinne, cleave to that which is good, and abhorre that which is evill, with a ſingle ſoule and heart, that hath no holes, if this life cauſe any worldly woe, though Satan and his friends envy at it, or if the Lord pleaſe, for any cauſe to his Majeſty knowne, to make any triall of me, feare not, muſe not, ſigh not, ſhrink not, my God hath given his word, as he is faithfull, which ever was, and ever ſhall be, there ſhall no more be laid upon me, than he, he I ſay, that hath no meaſure of might, make me able to beare. Only do the thing that I ought in my life now, as neare as given grace inableth me, and truſt to him for that day. Care away then, my beloved, for the croſſe, ever in the power of the Lord let us ſay, and ſince we have ſuch a promiſe, let the remembrance of it, as a mighty meanes, ſerve to worke this in us, in all adverſity to ſubmit our wills to his, and with true content to ſay, Thy will be done, O Lord, for ever with us. Full is the Scripture of other comforts to ſtrengthen us in this, but elſewhere I have noted them, and therefore I ſpare my ſelfe and you here. Remember then now, that though it be a harder matter in woe than well, to pray this prayer, yet is it not ſo hard, but the Lord hath given it, and can give it at his pleaſure to his weaklings, and make his power knowne in our weakneſſe, to his glory and our good, if we aske. O ſweet God, then we aske it, and beſeech thee for the red blood of Jeſus Chriſt, that in youth and age, health and ſickneſſe, proſperity and adverſity, weale and woe, thy will may be ours, and we contented ever. Amen, Amen.

2 Cor.12.

What meane the next words, Sicut in cœlo, As it is in heaven? Are we able to performe ſuch ſervice to God?

Heare you what Auguſtine ſaith, Fiat voluntas tua ſicut in cœlo & in terra. Quid hoc? Vt quomodo tibi ſerviunt Angeli in cœlo, & nos tibi ſerviamus in terra. Angeli ipſius ſancti obediunt illi, non illum offendunt, faciunt juſſa, amando illum. Hæc ergo oramus, ut & nos præceptum Dei charitate faciamus: Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. What is this? Surely, that as the Angels ſerve thee in heaven, ſo we may ſerve thee in earth: his holy Angels obey him, and offend him not, but in love doe his commandements. Theſe things therefore doe we pray for, that we alſo even of love may doe his will. Heare you alſo what S. Hierome ſaith: Petimus ut imitetur Angelos humana fragilitas, & voluntas Domini compleatur in terra: We deſire of the Lord, that mans frailty may imitate the Angels, and the will of the Lord may be done in earth fully: And indeed ſo it is, for we do in this Petition deſire that ſome part of his will may be done, For it becommeth us to fulfill all righteouſneſſe, Mat.3.15. but that all even fully and wholly may be performed, and a halfe righteouſneſſe or obedience, is neither righteouſneſs nor obedience, as S. Iames teacheth us. Non ſufficit Chriſtiano ſi unam partem juſtitiæ impleat, cui utraque præcipitur: It ſufficeth not, ſaith S. Hierome, that a Chriſtian fulfill the one part of righteouſneſſe, when as both are enjoyned him. For, Vera & plena fides univerſa præcepta complectitur: True and full faith comprehendeth all the Commandements, ſaith another. Yea further, we are not only by duty bound to doe all, but with all affection alſo, with all our heart, with all our ſoule, and with all our ſtrength. For, Nec leproſa obedientia, nec canina patientia commendatur, nam velint nolint non modo homines, ſed etiam dæmones & faciunt, & patiuntur, quod providentia ſumma diſpoſuit. Qui inſcii & neſcientes Dei voluntatem faciunt, eorum & leproſa, & ἀναιδὴς, obedientia. Qui veroſcientes eam, ſed reluctantes & murmurantes faciunt, eorum eſt canina patientia: neutrum ergo in nobis probatur, ſed & ſcientes & volentes: Neither a leprous obedience, nor a doggiſh patience is commended: for will they nill they, not only men, but alſo devils, both doe and ſuffer whatſoever the divine providence hath appointed. Thoſe that unwittingly and not knowing it, do the will of God, their obedience is leprous. Thoſe that do Gods will, knowing of it, yet ſtriving againſt it, and murmuring, ſuch mens patience perforce is doggiſh. Neither of theſe is allowed, but ſuch as doe Gods will both wittingly and willingly. Which perfect obedience of ours, as often as the Scripture ſpeaketh of, it uſeth to call us to that cæleſte πολίτευμα, that heavenly regiment, wherein perfectly and faithfully the Lord is obeyed. So doth our Saviour teach us, and therefore addeth here theſe words, Sicut in cœlo, As it is in heaven. You ſee then the reaſon of them, and why they be added, even to teach us the meaſure of obedience, that we are to deſire, and thirſt after, and pray for, not halt, not lame, not maimed, but all full, whole and perfect, ſuch as is in heaven. That looke with what ſpirit, meaſure, affection and will: with what readineſſe and alacrity the heavenly Angels, and bleſſed Spirits, Sun, Moon and Stars obey God, even with the ſame wee may doe it alſo, that as in heaven, ſo in earth there be no rebellion nor repining againſt his holy will. The obedience of all thoſe heavenly creatures I need not to deſcribe, looke but at the Angels, and you ſhall ſee three properties of their obedience, ſuch as ought to be in ours: They obey God lubentiſſime, citiſſime, & fideliſſime, moſt willingly, moſt readily or ſpeedily, and moſt faithfully. If they be ſent to performe any ſervice, they never murmure, but doe it: and therefore ſee their willingneſſe. If to execute judgement upon the enemies, in one night one of them diſpatcheth an hundred foure ſcore and five thouſand of them, and then ſee their ſpeed: Yea, they ſpare no creature, neither give over ever till the Lord ſay, it is ſufficient, ſtay thy hand, and therefore faithfully. They are not like Saul, to ſave either King or fatlings: no, there is no means to corrupt them in their ſervice, ſuch willingneſſe then, ſuch ready ſpeed, and ſuch faithfull obedience, we are taught to deſire and pray for by addition of theſe words, As it is in heaven: For theſe Angels we know are there. And this obedience of theirs with the circumſtances, hath the Prophet David laid downe, if you marke it.

Why, but ſtill I ſay, can we performe ſuch obedience as this in this life?

No indeed: whileſt here we live, both knowledge and obedience are in part: And the moſt regenerate that ever was muſt pray, Forgive us our treſpaſſes. It is Anabaptiſticall to dreame of a perfection here. Yet for all that, ſo perfect we ought to be, and ſo deſirous of Gods greater and greater pleaſure in us, and glory by our ſervice, as that we ſhould never ſtick downe our ſtaffe, as having obtained enough, till this be brought to paſſe in us. Therefore then pray we for it, not as accounting to get it in this world, but as profeſſing our deſire to have it, and our diſcontent with our obedience whatſoever it be, till it be ſuch. And if any man will conclude any thing upon this forme of ſpeech, let him conclude, that ſuch perfection we ſhould performe, not that ſuch ſuch here we ever can performe. And if we ought to performe it as duty due from us, then may we pray for it, that it may be ſuch ſtill, ſtill, till it be ſuch, and our prayer becommeth us well.

How we pray for this meaſure.

What more then will you ſay touching this Petition?

You muſt remember how we have ſaid, that in every Petition are required of God, as well the meanes ordained of God to work ſuch things, as the things themſelves that we ask. For, Expetito fine expetuntur etiam & quæ ad finem: The end being deſired, thoſe things are alſo deſired, which belong to the end. Wherefore underſtanding now what we ask in this Petition, even ability to performe that revealed will of our heavenly Father in his word, wholly and fully, after the example of his heavenly creatures, we muſt conſider the meanes whereby this is had, and know that in theſe words we beſeech his Majeſty likewiſe for them to be given to us.

The meanes alſo asked here.

And what are they?

They are chiefly two, the knowledge of his will, and the ſtrength of his grace, or direction of his Spirit. The firſt hath relation to his word, for there-hence only is his will to be learned, and therefore it hath pleaſed him to give it the name of his Teſtament, or laſt Will, and moſt ſtraitly charged that nothing be added to it, or taken from it. The ſecond is that whereby the firſt is profitable, and ſanctified to our good: For illumination without ſanctification availeth not, but is even in the reprobate: And they that know their Maſters will, and do it not, ſhall their knowledge ſave them? Had not Iudas knowledge? there is no queſtion, but of Chriſt he had learned many myſteries: Had not the Scribes and the Phariſies the knowledge of the law? Yes, they were able to teach many truths out of the ſame unto others, and whileſt they ſate in Moſes chaire, that is, whileſt they delivered truly the doctrine of Moſes, they were to be heard, by the commandement of our Saviour, and to be followed alſo in that they ſaid. But becauſe this Spirit of the Lord did not ſanctifie their knowledge to them, and make it powerfull in them to the death of ſinne, and the life of righteouſneſſe, but that they knew and did not, therefore for all their knowledge they periſhed: a man may ſpeake with the tongues of men and Angels, and yet periſh: a man may have the gift of Prophecy, and know all ſecrets and all knowledge, and yet be no body in Gods eyes. 1 *Cor.*12.1,2. Spiritus eſt qui fœcundat animos: It is the Spirit of the Lord, that maketh our mindes fruitfull; yea, that maketh our hearts good earth to receive the good ſeed of the word to our comfort; that bleſſeth our knowledge to us, to crucifie us to the world and ſin, and renew us to the Lord in daily obedience more and more. The Spirit alſo inſpireth our mindes to will, and after giveth the effect and execution of that inſpired will. Deus enim ille eſt qui in nobis operatur & velle & perficere, pro gratuita ſua benevolentia, The Lord is he that worketh in us both the will and the deed, (to wit, by his holy Spirit) even of his good pleaſure. And it is the God of peace, ſaith the Apoſtle, that brought againe from the dead, our Lord Ieſus, the great Shepheard of the ſheep, through the blood of the everlaſting Covenant, that maketh men perfect in all good works to do his will, working in them that which is pleaſant in his ſight, through Ieſus Chriſt. Whereunto agreeth that of Cyprian: Vt fiat à nobis Dei voluntas, opus eſt Dei voluntate, quia nemo ſuis viribus potens eſt: That is, to do the will of God, we have need of the will of God (to wit, his aſſiſtance and ſtrength) for by his owne power no man is able.

Heb.13.21.

Wherefore ſince knowledge to underſtand Gods will out of his word, and the grace of his Spirit to bleſſe that knowledge to us, are meanes to make us able to performe this petition, and to doe his will; therefore we pray alſo herein for theſe means, and the words are with the Lord, as if we ſhould even in plain tearmes ſay, O Lord give us the knowledge ſtill daily more and more of thy will, out of thy word, and give us the grace of thy holy Spirit to that knowledge, that we enabled by theſe meanes, may work thy will in this life as we ought.

Knowledge of Gods will, and a bleſſing thereof to ſanctification, are here prayed for, as meanes.

What elſe doe we aske in it?

Againe, as we pray for all theſe things, ſo do we as I told you before, and muſt ſtill tell you, in every petition pray againſt their contraries: for if the one be confirmed, the other muſt be overthrowne. Now the contraries of theſe things may be ſaid to be of two ſorts, to wit, either ſuch as do utterly and wholly, and ever reſiſt his holy will, or ſuch as are but certaine impediments, whereby we do it not ſo readily as either we ought or happily would do if they were not. Of the firſt ſort is concupiſcence, the world, &c. For, no man can ſerve two maſters, eſpecially contrary maſters, ſuch as God and ſatan are, the Spirit of God and the fleſh, the new and the old man. Of the ſecond ſort are overmuch care for worldly matters, feare of men, and a number of things that like weights or burdens upon our backs preſſe us, or like fetters about our feete, hinder us, that we go not on altogether ſo readily and ſo fully in this way of doing the will of God as we indeed ought and would, if theſe lets were not. Whatſoever they be then, and of whether ſort ſoever they be, for as much as they are againſt that obedience that we pray for in this petition, therefore we deſire of the Lord that they may be removed, and that no let or leaſt impediment may be to hinder that in us, which both in reſpect of his goodneſſe to us, and our duties to him, ought with all perfection both of will and worke to be performed. And thus might we end this petition, ſaving that ſome profitable collections of obſervations may be made of the words, as they are laid downe here by our Saviour.

The contraries prayed againſt.

Mat.6.24.

I pray you then adde those also.

How we fell, and now may rise.

The first may be this. We may observe and see here both the beginning of mans misery, as also the way to draw neare againe to that old and former innocency. Mans misery sprang by disobedience to the will of God, as we all know, and the way to returne to that good estate againe wherein we were, is obedience to that will, as here we learne when we are taught to pray, Thy will be done. For we pray for the restitution of those graces in some measure, which in our first parents were most perfectly. And looke then how much we performe to the Lord obedience, and so much draw we neare to an happy estate againe. Wherefore the Lord said it,

Mat. 12. 50. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdome of heaven, but he that doth the will of my Father which is in heaven. And againe, Whosoever shall do my Fathers will which is in heaven, the same is my mother, sister, and brother. Obedience then to his holy will, is that which will set us in good place againe. And therefore try beloved, what measure of this is in you, and so like or dislike of your selves. Try with what love you heare the Word, with what care you are filled to doe thereafter, what conscience you make of sin, what name soever it have: what joy you have in the workes of righteousnesse, what griefe, if frailty cause a fall. If you finde these in some measure, so much be glad, if in great measure, much more be glad, for truly so much have we left the way of death, into which we are fallen all by our parents, and so far have profited in the way of life, which is true obedience. But if our conscience accuse us in this trial, that we have no desire to know Gods will out of his word, although it be with many mercifull circumstances offered unto us, no care to live holily, no conscience of sin, but some little servile feare or dread of punishment, no spiritual joy in wel-doing, no inward sorow for evil-doing, then tremble we and feare we before the Lord of heaven and earth, for as yet we are in the way of disobedience, which is the way of death, whereinto our first parents fell: we are buried in our corruption, and dead in sin, not risen with Christ, we are heapers up of wrath against our soules in the day of wrath, and contemners of the Word, which in such sort hath been preached unto us, for which cause that same Word shall judge us in the last day, and we shall perish. Try then, I say, and so like or dislike.

A profitable examination of our selves.

Merit overthrowne. Much lesse workes of supererogation.

Secondly, learning by these words, (As it is in heaven) that our obedience ought not to be lame or maimed, but even such both for will and work, as that of the heavenly spirits, we are notably taught what cold comfort there is for us in our selves, and how far it is off, that we, or any living should be saved by their workes. For dare any of us say we obey the Lords will in earth, as it is obeyed in heaven, and that there is no imperfection in us more here than there? If wee dare not, if we cannot, then you see we have not done all that is commanded, and therefore far from being justified by that meanes, when we have not done our duty. Cleave we therefore fast unto our true safety Jesus Christ the righteous, and away with such dreames.

No estate of persons privileged more than others from doing Gods will.

Thirdly, do we not see that this prayer wholly, called the Lords Prayer, and this Petition particularly, is prescribed by the Lord unto all Christians, men and women, of what degree, estate and calling soever they be, and none exempted? We see it plainly, for to all it is said in the Disciples, that have been, are, and shall be to the worlds end, When you pray, pray thus. We see it then by consequence again, that all degrees, estates and callings, are bound to performe unto the Lord such perfect obedience as here is noted, and not Monks, Fryers, Nunnes, or some certaine sort of this order or that only, which yet hath been taught us, and that others taking some more liberty, might find mercy with God for their prayers, and strict observation, in truth, not of Gods will, but of some ceremonies of their owne devising. But it hath mightily been shewed to the world, and our eyes all, that every plant which our heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be plucked up; and therefore let us beleeve no such folly. If we be the Lords, we acknowledge our selves bound to performe as full obedience, as is performed in heaven, and that is as much as any of these devised orders could performe, and a little more too I trow. And therefore no immunity to us, neither further yoke to them, that I know of, if this Petition stand.

Popish errour.

Fourthly, we may here very well learne the true cause of all such hurly-burlies in the world, of wars, of schismes, of heresies, of strifes amongst neighbours, and finally of all calamities, even this: Quod neglecta voluntate Dei, suo quisq; sensu rapitur: That every man setting aside the will of God (which above all should be regarded) is caried with his own liking & will in all things. Wherefore, as one saith, Oremus Deum, ut spiritum filiorum det nobis, &c. Let us beseech the Lord to give us the spirits of sons and children, that renouncing our own will, we may readily and heartily submit our selves to his will, and not with lips, but life, shew that we pray it earnestly, Fiat voluntas tua, Thy will be done.

Fifthly, praying that this will may be done in earth, we acknowledge even in this world also a place wherein God ought to rule, and not only in heaven. And therefore are justly occasioned as often as we say this Prayer, to grone in our spirits, and sigh with right sorowfull hearts to see yet how far that is off: To see what disobedience there is in every degree, yea, what stubborn rebellion & defiance, as it were, with this will of God where it is known, but much more to see what thousands and millions there be that know it not, what whole nations, kingdomes and countries.

Countries. And if they know it not, ill can they doe it. But where are theſe groanes and ſighs? Where is that plenty of water that guſhed out of Davids eyes for like cauſe? Aſſuredly beloved, if we had ſent forth theſe meſſengers to the Lord, and delivered theſe tokens of inward zeale for his glory and our brethrens good, ere this day long, they had pierced the heavens, and the Lord of the vineyard had ſent forth Labourers to breed knowledge, knowledge had diſplaced ignorance and rebellion, and wrought true ſubmiſſion in many thouſands of ſoules to this heavenly will that here we ſpeake of.

Sixthly, if we did not ſee this rebellion of the world againſt the Lord plaine enough, yet doth this very Petition ſo teach it, that we cannot deny it. For why ſhould we be taught to pray that his will may be done, and that he may be obeyed in thoughts, words, and deeds, if he were not fearefully diſobeyed in them all. If then both one and other ſheweth it, alas what cauſe have we to delight here to dwell as we doe? Nay, what true matter here-hence may we gather to defie it, and to weane our ſoules from it, as the Lord will ſtrengthen? It is a place of rebellion againſt our God, a ſink of ſin, a cage (the Lord knoweth it) of uncleane birds, a ſepulchre, though outwardly faire and painted, yet full of rotten bones, yea, rotten bodies, and defiled ſoules with horrible pollutions. Mundus totus in maligno poſitus, in hoc virtus & pietas patiuntur; in hoc, &c. This world is wholly ſet on miſchiefe, in it vertue and godlineſſe ſuffer, in it are a thouſand ſubtilties to deceive; which way ſoever thou looke ſt in it, altogether impure is it, and the impurity of it ſtill daily more and more increaſeth: ſometimes tyrants diſturbe the publike peace, ſometimes hereticks oppugn the truth, ſometimes private perils moleſt & grieve, and what ever comfort yeeldeth it that is true and permanent? He that had the moſt proofe of the pleaſure of it that had ever any, and by proofe might ſpeake what he found in them, hath thus delivered to all eares for ever, that they are vanities all and vexation of ſpirit. The world will promiſe her ſeven yeares ſervants faire and wiſhed Rachel, but when performance ſhould bee, then commeth Leah with her ſore eyes, that is, a ſubtill ſleight to diſappoint thy paine, and a worſe reward than thou ſerveſt in hope of. It will promiſe promotion high and lofty to prodigality, but it will pay thee with contempt bitter and grievous for thy beggery, when all is ſpent in hope of that promotion. By mariage it promiſeth many comforts, but how often payeth it many cares with ſops of ſorow, that ſoke full deep.

A profitable meditation, to take us and weane us from the love of this world.

Eccl. 1. The world keepeth not promiſe.

The world is full of falſe Prophets, that will keep Achab from Micheas counſell: full of falſe Merchants that will ſhew forth the better end of the peece, and ſay the reſt is like, when it is far otherwiſe: full of cunning Fiſhers, that under pleaſant baites have hidden hookes to deſtroy us if we bite: full of ſuch golden ſtrumpets as that of Babylon, which in cups of gold give drink that kils even to hell: full of ſmooth alluring Iahels, which ſtand in their tent doores, and ſay to men, Turne in my Lord, turn in unto me and feare not, but if in they come, and fall to ſleep, the naile and the hammer walke, to their wofull end and fall: full of flattering Ioabs, that can ſay with a ſmiling face, how doeſt thou my brother Amaſa? and ſtab him in that hee ſhall not anſwer: full of trecherous Iudaſes, that with a kiſſe betray their deareſt maſter. And alas, what place is this? Run over the greateſt things that here we have, or can have, and ſee what is linked to them. If a man have riches, what feares and cares hath he with them? If honors, what burthens and feares againe of a fall? If a man have friends, what adoe to keep them? Our bodies have diſeaſes, our mindes have paſſions, neighbours be uncomfortable, and to live ſole is ſolitary: yet ſee diſcomforts, one toucheth our goods by law, another our name by ſlander, this hateth us, that envyeth us, another flattereth, another deceiveth, another beareth falſe witneſſe againſt us; with a thouſand ſuch. And if we be diſcontented and croſſed but in one thing (ſee the miſery of this wretched world) though we enjoy a thouſand contents, yet grindeth that day and night upon us, and all our contents are as nothing to us, becauſe of that one diſcontent. The triall was had of that wicked Haman, who though he had many and great preferments to rejoyce in, yet felt he them all eclipſed, and as it were taken from him by this one griefe, the life of Mordacheus before his face. And what ſhould I ſay? Would God we did it often with profit, what we may doe ever with griefe, to the better weaning our ſelves from this world of woes, even ſearch and ſee into the manners of it in every place, in every age, and in every ſort of perſons. Shall we not ſee of all the things that are accounted of, nothing ſo little accounted of as ſinne? Shall we not ſee juſtice ſold, verity wreſted, ſhame loſt, and equity deſpiſed? Shall we not ſee the guilty quit, and the halter put over the innocents head? Shall we not ſee the wicked advanced, and the godly depreſſed, wreaked and wronged, and trod upon? Surely we ſhall ſee fooles ſpeake, and wiſe men bid peace. Yea, we ſhall ſee every mans mouth overflow with looſeneſſe, and few mens lives governed with vertue.

Iudg 4.18.

One croſſe countervaileth a thouſand comforts.

Alas then againe, what a place is this? Shall the ſinnes of himſelfe make the Apoſtle cry, Cupio diſſolvi, I deſire to be looſed, and to be with Chriſt; And ſhall not all the ſinnes of ſo ſinfull a world, together with our owne, make us deſire it? What pleaſure had the good Prophet, who for the very ſinne that he ſaw, he deſired death. Did not our Saviour ſay it when time was, Non rogo pro mundo, I pray not for the world? And ſhall we joy in the place ſo fearefully excepted in the prayer of Christ. If we thinke heaven to be our home, are we not so long from home as we are here? If to depart here-hence be to goe to life, is not to tarry here to abide in death? If that life be freedome, is not this bondage? Finally, if to be with God be our true felicity, to be absent from God, is it not our misery? But whilest we are at home in the body, we are absent from God, saith the Apostle, and therefore think of it. What may you now thinke, you beloved, to stay you from a true and Christian loathing of this wretched life in so vile a world? Truly I know not, except you should unwisely say, there be few that doe it, and many that doe it not. Which if you should say, then must I answer you as he did that said it: Neq; minor erit gloria tua, si fœlix eris cum paucis; neque pœna levior, si miser eris cum multis: Neither shall thy glory be lesse, if thou be happy with few; neither thy punishment lighter, if thou be miserable with many. But I hope you are far from being holden in evill with so bad arguments, and therefore I pray you let us remember what is said to us; Love not this world, neither any thing that is in this world: For if we love the world, the love of the Father is not in us. And the Lord strengthen us.

2 Cor. 5. 6.

1 Iohn 9.

Seventhly, we see here by this petition and forme of prayer, the very true nature of a child of God, namely, to desire and pray heartily, that both in himselfe and others, Gods will may bee knowne and done. Yea, so heartily and earnestly doth he wish this, that to see the contrary is a vexation to his soule, very vehement and great. And he delivered just Lot, saith Saint Peter, vexed with the uncleanly conversation of the wicked. And I saw the transgressors, saith David, and was grieved because they kept not thy word, yea, mine eyes gush out with teares for this cause. But of this something was said before. The Lord enter not into judgement with us ever, for the want of this sorow to see other men doe evill, saying nothing of our selves, and our owne evill.

2 Pet. 2. 7. Psal. 119. 15.

Laughing at other mens faults.

For how may we answer, not our sorowing, but our laughing, even as we were tickled, to see drunkards, to heare rimers and railers, and idle counterfeiters, tearing their tongues against their teeth, to the dishonour of God, the gauling or slander of others, and the death of their owne soules for ever, without repentance, which in many of them God may worke, but it is smally to be hoped of as yet. God that shall judge us knoweth it, and telleth us now whilest we have time to leave it, that we cannot answer it. The Lord therefore change us, and we shall be changed, and make the breach of his will to touch us deeply, both in our selves and others.

Lastly, we may see here, if there were no other Scriptures to shew us, what an acceptable thing to the Lord, the ready and carefull doing of his will is, by this that our Saviour placeth this petition amongst the first and chiefe desires of his children: we may see our dulnesse that must be taught to pray for this obedience: and we may see Gods rich and great goodnesse, that will give us strength to obey him, and then crowne us for so doing with an immortall crowne, as if we had done all of our selves. The Lord give us feeling. And let thus much suffice of this Petition.

The Prayer.

O Sweet and gracious Father, how deare both is and ought to be to a good child, the will of his earthly Father? And if so, how much more deare to thy childe the just and ever holy will of thee his heavenly Father? Indeed hee should pray with heart and soule that it may be done. And therefore feeling our only sweet comfort to be this, that we are thy Children, we againe and againe beseech thy Majesty that it may so be. Concerning thy secret will reserved to thy self, O Lord, let us never be curious searchers and seekers to know above that which is meet for us to know: much lesse let us give our selves by Spirits and devils, and vile meanes, to wring out as it were by force from thee, the knowledge of times and seasons, and matters reserved in thy power: but let us ever concerning this, be thus disposed by thy grace in our selves, that whatsoever this hidden will of thine shall bee concerning us, whether to live or die, to be poore or rich, to be high or low in this world, with the same, and in the same we rest and bee contented, saying in our hearts as obedient children, Let my God and Father, doe with me, and dispose of me at his pleasure: And when it shall appeare, and be revealed to us, then even more, if more may be, to be contented, giving true and hearty thankes to thy Majesty as well for woe as well, for little as much, for low degree as high degree, if so thy pleasure be, taking well in worth, as thy servant Iob, at thy hands, evill things as well as good things, sower as well as sweet, and lowring nights as well as Sun-shine mornings. Deare God, make us ever blesse thy name with a single heart when we know thy will, and till thou shewest it leave it to thy selfe.

Con-

Concerning next thy revealed will, that is, all that which in thy Word thou haſt laid downe, and declared to be the duty which thou wilt have performed of us toward thee: O Lord of mercy we beſeech thee, that whereas our mindes burning with luſts, are commonly carryed to deſire, and to doe thoſe things that moſt diſpleaſe thee, thou of thy gracious goodneſſe wouldeſt vouchſafe ſo to change us by the power of thy bleſſed Spirit, that wee may will and wiſh nothing but that thy holy will alloweth. Give us faith firme and ſtedfaſt in thy Sonne our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt. And to this faith joyne in mercy a pure and cleane life, granting us grace to poſſeſſe theſe veſſels in holineſſe and honor, and not in the luſt of concupiſcence, as the ungodly doe. O pardon herein for the blood of Jeſus, both words and works ſtraying from thy will. To name them it is impoſſible, for we cannot think of them; yet thou knoweſt them, and with thee is mercy even for ſecret faults. Give us of thy ſtrength alſo, O bleſſed Lord God, that we may beare and ſuffer all croſſes, diſeaſes, poverty, contempts, perſecutions, and adverſities, with all the changes and chances of this mortall life, not onely with contented, but with gladſome hearts, knowing that it is thy will that wee ſhould crucifie and mortifie our wils. And when that appointed paſſing houre ſhall come, that earth to earth, and aſhes to aſhes is to returne, O Lord make us ſtrong to welcome in this alſo thy will. And finally what obedience we owe to thy Majeſty, give it us good God, that as thy Angels and heavenly creatures, moſt willingly without grudging, moſt ſpeedily without delayes, and moſt faithfully without affection and partialitie, doe their duties, ſo we may performe and doe it, to our lives end and ever, as it ſhall pleaſe thee to inable us, for his ſake whom thou loveſt, Chriſt Jeſus thy Sonne, and our moſt deare and bleſſed Saviour. Amen.

The fourth PETITION.

Give us this day our daily Bread.

Two things I have to aske you here touching the order, before you come to the words themſelves. Firſt, why theſe three Petitions concerning our neceſſities follow upon the other which concerned Gods glory: Secondly, why of the three this is firſt, ſeeing the other two concerne better things.

TO the firſt I anſwer you, that being warranted by the Lord, after ſeeking of his Kingdome and the righteouſneſſe thereof, which ought to be firſt, to ſeeke alſo at his hands whatſoever wee have need of to the maintenance and good of this life: wee having done the former in the Petitions before, fitly followeth the other now in theſe three. And this is the order that David uſeth in his Pſalme; firſt craving the light of the Lords countenance to be lifted up upon him, and then aſſuring himſelfe next of peace and ſafety, the benefits of this earthly life. Mat. 6. Pſ. 4. 6, 8.

Yea ſir, but doth not our Saviour ſay expreſly, Bee not carefull for your life, what yee ſhall eate, or what ye ſhall drinke; nor yet for your body, what yee ſhall put on: but ſeeke yee firſt the Kingdome of God, and the righteouſneſſe thereof, and all theſe things ſhall bee miniſtred unto you; for your heavenly Father knoweth that yee have need of theſe things? Why then ſhould we expreſly pray for that which both he knoweth we want, and hath in mercy promiſed us? Mat. 6.

Although our Saviour ſay, They ſhall be miniſtred unto us, in that place, yet doth himſelfe bid us pray for them expreſly, in this place: and therefore well we know by thoſe words there; he meant not to exclude this meanes here. The examples alſo of his Children that have done it, and the manifold promiſes made to all them that ſhall doe it, which will appeare to us hereafter, tell us the ſame. If you will know the reaſon why, underſtand you, not for that he would not otherwiſe give them to his Children that ſeeke his Kingdome chiefly, except they were by name asked; or for that he giveth them for asking (which indeed he giveth freely;) or that he hath need to be remembred: but indeed, that by ſuch prayer wee might witneſſe unto the world, that we acknowledge the Lord the very Fountaine and Spring-head of all theſe things alſo also that concerne either body or minde, that wee might thus learne to depend upon him fully and wholly in all things, and whatsoever is wanting to us, to flie to him, not to trust in our selves, or in man, or in any arme of flesh whatsoever.

What say you to my second demand?

To your second demand I answer thus, that albeit the things that are contained in the next Petitions be of more price than those that are contained in this, yet hath the Lord set this before them not without cause, even to relieve thereby our infirmity, which doe not so easily and quickly perceive or pray for heavenly things as earthly things. The fift Petition beggeth remission of sinnes; the sixt, an invincible constancy and holy fortitude in temptation: these are great matters concerning our heavenly life, and therefore not so neare to our dull conceits and knowledge. The matters of this Petition are more easie and better felt of us, and therefore in a most mercifull wisedome our Saviour beginneth with the easier, and so draweth us to the harder by degrees, that having had tryall of his goodnesse in the one, wee might nothing doubt of his mercy in the other: having felt him friendly in matters of lesser good, wee might make full account of favour in things of greater good to us.

Pro.30.8. This order regardeth our infirmity, not the nature of the things.

Yet must I needs object unto you the prayer of Agur, which proceedeth not in this order, but first desiring that God would remove farre from him vanity and lies, (matter belonging to the minde) in the second and latter place asketh food convenient concerning the body.

And I have already answered your objection sufficiently, if you marked it. For I have said in respect of the matters themselves, things belonging to the minde, are to goe before things belonging to the body, and so no doubt would our Saviour have set them, if he had regarded that onely: but looking from that to our infirmities and dulnesse, he hath placed that first that was best known to us, and so from the more knowne draweth us to the lesse knowne; from the easier to the harder, and from the earthly to the heavenly. Like a good teacher that wishing the profit of his Schollers, delivereth to them the lighter lessons first, and milke before meat, that is strong for men.

You satisfie me well, proceed therefore now, if you please, to the words themselves, this is enough concerning the order.

Content, if this be noted in a word before: that although we bee now come to matters that concerne our selves and our owne profit, and have passed over those that concerne Gods glory, yet may we not thinke that wee have now done with the Lord and his honour quite, but this onely is the difference, that then wee respected the Lord onely, wholly, and immediately, now we regard our selves and our necessities with him, as we use to speake, mediately. For otherwise even all the things we wish and doe, must regard the Lord and his holy honor, according to the Apostle, saying, Whether yee eate or drinke, or whatsoever ye doe, doe all to the glory of God. And according to the confession of Saint Augustine, Sufficientia vitæ rectè appetitur, non propter seipsam quidem, sed ut eam habentes commodius Deo serviamus: Things fit for this life are rightly requested, but not for themselves, but that having them wee may better serve God. The true knowledge of this putteth a notable bit in the mouth of our untamed desires, and draweth them ever in these worldly commodities to that measure and manner that may stand with the Lords honor. Whereas otherwise when it is forgotten or not knowne, there is no measure in our coveting, no honesty in our using, no credit in our leaving them.

Panem.

Now come we to the word, and the first as you see is this word Bread, which both in Scripture and in godly writers is taken diversly. In the sixt of John it signifieth Christ himselfe, because as bread and flesh, meate and drinke, are to the use of this transitory life, so is Christ sent from the Father to us, for the getting and keeping of everlasting life. Iosua said, Feare not the people of the Land, for they are but bread for us; that is, a thing that wee shall overcome and devoure. The Preacher saith, Cast thy bread upon the waters; that is, be liberall to the poore. Stolne waters are sweet, saith the Harlot in the Proverbs, and hid bread is pleasant. By bread there meaning adultery and pollution of the flesh. In the Prophet Esay it is called the bread of adversity, in another place bread of affliction. Sometimes again it signifieth the benefits of Christ, as when he said, It is not lawfull to take the childrens bread, and to give it to dogs: that is, the benefits principally appointed for the Jewes, which are children, and to give them to you Gentiles which bee dogges. Sometimes it signifieth doctrine and instruction out of the Word, whereby our soules are nourished with spirituall bread, no lesse than our bodies with materiall bread, and thereupon the want of the Word called a famine, as you have heard: with many moe sundry significations, if it needed to repeate them, but let this suffice. Here in this Petition it is taken in his owne proper sense and signification, for such bread as wee eate and are nourished withall. Yet figuratively it stretcheth it selfe further than to bread onely, and includeth whatsoever is necessary to the sustentation of this life. So saith S. Austen, Necessariam corporis exhibitionem petimus aperte in pane, significante quicquid est nobis necessariũ: All needfull maintenance of the body we ask in this Petitiõ plainly in the word bread, signifying whatsoever is necessary. Nay, so saith the the Scripture in many places, ſhewing this largeneſſe of the Word. In ſudore vultus tui veſceris pane tuo.: In the ſweat of thy browes ſhalt thou eate thy bread. That is, whatſoever thou injoyeſt in this world of theſe earthly things, thou ſhalt come by it by labour and travell, and not by bread onely. When Eliæus bad the King ſet bread before them, you ſee what the King did, he made them very good entertainment. All Iobs kindred came to eat bread with him, that is, to rejoyce and be merry in all good ſort with him: when Abraham prayed the Angels to ſtay and hee would ſet a morſell of bread before them, hee meant by bread more than bare bread. When David ſaid, hee that did eate of his bread, lift up his heele againſt him, hee meant by bread familiarity, truſt and credit, and a very neare conjunction of friendſhip. So was it uſuall you ſee with the Hebrewes, in this word to comprehend all neceſſary ſuſtenance of the life.

And why thinke you?

Happily becauſe bread is moſt uſuall and moſt neceſſary. For many have bread that have no meate, and they that have both, may yet better ſpare the one than the other, although neither well. As I remember the Duke of Saxony Frederike, is ſaid to have cauſed his people to ſee, when going to hawke one day in the fields, ſeeing his ſervants ſo careleſly and badly to ride over the corne, and ſo ſpoile it, when he came home, commanded that their meate ſhould bee ſet before them as plentifully as ever, yea, and better if it might bee, but never a morſell of bread all that day. The ſervice being ſtrange, and no man knowing the cauſe, at laſt the good Duke ſent them word that if they ſaw any uſe of bread to their comfort, let them learne to take more care of corne hereafter, and not for any pleaſure or paſtime to ride over it, and ſpoyle it as they had done that day. A worthy example ſure for all Princes and Nobles to follow, ever making conſcience of the Lords bleſſings to ſpoyle them for any vaine delight and Paſtime.

A good example.

Some other reaſon may be given alſo of frugality, as that we are thus admoniſhed to be content with a little, and to ſay with the Apoſtle chearfully and heartily: I ſpeake not becauſe of want. For I have learned in whatſoever eſtate I am, therewith to be content. I can be abaſed, and I can abound, every where in all things I am inſtructed, both to bee full, and to be hungry, and to abound, and to have want. I am able to doe all things through the help of Chriſt which ſtrengtheneth me. We are not taught to pray for gorgeous cloathes, for ſtately houſes, or for great livings and honours, but for bread, bread, that but for the day, and therefore a ſtint made aſſuredly of our immoderate deſires. If the Lord give more, bee thankfull and uſe it well, but if hee give but bread, that is, a little, be very heartily well content even with that alſo, for therefore is it onely named here to teach us ſo. Sit oratio, quæ pro temporalibus eſt, circa ſolas neceſſitates reſtricta. Let thy prayer which thou makeſt for temporall matters, be reſtrained ever to things neceſſary, ſaith Bernard. For he that would ſay in his prayer, for example, ſaith Auguſtine: Domine multiplica divitias meas, aut da mihi tantas, quantas illi vel illi dediſti, puto eum non invenire in oratione Dominica quo poſſit hæc vota cooptare. That is, Lord increaſe my riches, or give mee ſo much as thou haſt given ſuch a one, or ſuch an one; I think that man in the Lords prayer will finde no ſuch direction. When we have food and raiment, let us therewith be content (ſaith the Apoſtle,) for wee brought nothing into this world, neither ſhall we carry any thing out. And they that will be rich, fall into temptations and ſnares, and into many fooliſh and noyſome luſts, which drowne men in perdition and deſtruction: for the deſire of money is the roote of all evill, which while ſome luſted after, they erred from the faith, and pierced thẽſelvs through with many ſorrows. And moſt ſweetly in the Epiſt. to the Hebrews, Let your converſation be without covetouſnes, and be content with thoſe things that ye have, for he hath ſaid: I will not faile thee, neither forſake thee. So that we may boldly ſay, The Lord is my helper, neither will I feare what man can doe unto me. Finally, take no thought for the fleſh, ſaith the word againe, to fulfill the luſts of it. Thus doe you ſee, then very fitly may wee learne by the Lords naming of bread onely, barely by it ſelfe, and neither of gold nor ſilver, nor other ſtatelineſſe, to be content with any little that the ſame Lord ſhall think good to give us ever: and not greedily to wiſh for any wanton abundance. Pray this prayer then beloved with your heart, and thinke of this note. For the Lord knoweth how fraile fleſh miſliketh little, and ſeeketh much: that wallowing in wealth, it might wallow in woe another day: rechleſſe overtaken with the pleaſures of this life, through ability to have them, further than God will warrant, when he falleth to reckon.

Heb.13.5.

Rom.13.14.

O thinke of this, and God give ſtrength.

Why Sir, is it not lawfull to pray for wealth and riches?

You have heard before that whatſoever is needful to the life of man, is included in this word bread, and prayed for here. And you muſt know alſo that this needfull is meaſured according to mens ſeverall callings and charges, for great men have neede of more than meane men, and of both ſorts they that have more charge either of children, or of neceſſary ſervants about them, have need alſo of more. Wherefore if their neceſſaries be great, aboundance, even great aboundance is lawfully prayed for by warrant both of this Petition and much other Scripture. But if we goe from neceſſaries, to ſuperfluities, (as indeed the deſire of mans is) to the end he might bathe himſelfe in pleaſures, that fleſh feedeth upon moſt greedily, bee cloathed in purple and and fine linnen, and fare most deliciously every day, though woefully hee crie when that folly is faded, for one drop of water to coole his tongue in the burning Lake: then must we remember that a wise man prayed not so, but even flat contrary, saying, Lord give me not riches, (hee meaneth superfluity above need) and addeth this reason, Lest I be full and deny thee, and say, who is the Lord? Which reason the more we meditate upon, the more strong shall we see it: this usually being a fruit of wanton superfluity, to forget our God. Behold, saith the Lord to his people Israel, I will bring thee into a good land, a land in the which are rivers of water, and fountains, and depths that spring out of the valleyes and mountaines. A land of wheat and barley and of vineyards & figtrees and Pomegrates, a land of oyle olive, and hony: A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarcity, neither shalt thou lack any thing therein; A land whose stones are iron, & out of whose mountaines thou shalt dig brasse. But beware, lest when thou hast eaten and filled thy selfe, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein, and thy beasts and thy sheep are increased, and thy silver and gold is multiplyed, and all thou hast increased, (beware I say againe) lest then thy heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the Land of Ægypt, out of the house of bondage, &c. Beware lest thou say in thine heart; my power, and the strength of mine owne hand hath gotten me this abundance; but remember the Lord thy God. For it is he which giveth thee power to get substance, &c. You see what a danger the Holy Ghost hath here discovered in abundance of earthly things to lift our heele against the Lord, what a vehement caveat he hath given, and as sure as we live, it is a thousand to one we doe it. If riches encrease, saith he againe by his Prophet, set not thy heart upon them: as if he should say, thy nature is to doe it. And, Charge them that be rich in this world, saith the Apostle, that they be not high minded, and that they trust not in uncertain riches, but in the living God. Why should men be charged, if there were no danger? What said proud Pharaoh puft up with his Princely pompe, but, Quis est Dominus? who is the Lord? What said Nebuchadnezzar, when his greatnesse was so growne that it reached to the heaven, and his dominion to the end of the earth, when he walked in the royall place of Babel, I say what said he? but in the pride of his heart against the Lord, thus: Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Majesty? And by and by the hand of the Lord was upon him; reade it, and reade many times, it is a great example. What a damnable dreame was proud Haman in, by reason of his grace in Court, forgetting God, hating his Saints, and so carryed in the smoakie cloud of his favour with the Prince, and his great estate, that he never knew where he was, till he was ready to climbe the tree himselfe that he had set up for holy Mardochens? Can our souls wish a better example to tell us the danger of earthly greatnesse, if the Lord assist not sliding nature? But these were strangers all from God, you will say, and therefore no proofes, but that we which know more, may doe better, though we swimme never so much in all aboundance? well see you then the fault of better, even by the same. Hezekias a good one, and yet thus deceived. David a good one, and yet so puft up, that he numbred his people with a proud conceit, & boasted in his wealth, that it would never decay; whereupon Iob glorieth of it as a speciall grace upon him beyond the course of any whom the Lord assisteth not, that he never made gold his hope, neither said to the wedge of gold, thou art my confidence: that he never rejoyced because his substance was great, & so forth. The heathen knew the danger, and therefore usually handled it as a tryed truth, that prosperity is hardlier well endured than adversity. S. Austine said it, and knew it true, Divitiarum morbus superbia; The disease of riches is pride. And would God we knew not too much experience to inferre against all denyals this wofull conclusion in our dayes. And to tell us all, that honours, and ease, and ability to have what either wanton will can wish, or our owne, or other wilde heads devise, banisheth too often religion, and all his exercises, private or publike, cooleth and quencheth all heavenly heats, forceth away, as too melancholike foes, all sweet meditation of spirituall causes, and giveth the bridle to all damnable pleasure and dreadfull security. But they shall know one day, and let us see now, that if the Lord give us but daily bread, that is, things needful, not needlesse, a moderate, a competent or sufficient portion to passe this life along withall, assuredly he doth that which is safest for us, in respect of our great propension to abuse his plenty; & good cause we should without any muttering for more, be contented with it. Yet should greater plenty cause greater piety, greater zeale, greater thankfulnesse, and all good, but alas it is not so. The very devill could say, that it was no marvell that Iob feared God, seeing that God had made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he had on every side, and had blessed the worke of his hands, and his substance was encreased in the land, and yet are not many of us able to reason thus, to the stirring up of our obedience to the Lord for his graces to us, albeit we would be judged great Christians. The Lord quicken us. For assuredly, to whom the Lord hath given much, of them he will require much, and they shall answer him.

It needeth not that we runne over all particulars, seeing thus much now is said, that in the word bread is contained all that we may have need of to this life?

It were an infinite matter so to doe, and indeed not needfull, therefore let us consider that we aske herein, food and raiment, and whatsoever we want, Houses to dwell in, Psal. 107. 36.

That our children bee not vagabonds and begge their bread, *Pſalm.*109.10. Wee begge peace and quietneſſe, private at home, publike abroad: for this is needfull and a comfortable bleſſing. Better is a drie morſell, if peace be with it, than an houſe full of Sacrifices with ſtrife. And it is a great goodneſſe of God when we may ſerve him, as Zacharie ſaith, without feare, in holineſſe and righteouſneſſe all the dayes of our life. Wherefore the Lord of peace, (ſaith the Apoſtle) give you peace alwayes by all meanes. And if it be poſſible, as much as in you lyeth have peace with all men. Grant Lord, ſaith David, that there be no going out, no leading into captivity, neither any complayning in our ſtreets. Pray for the peace of Ieruſalem: let them proſper that love thee: Peace bee within thy wals, and plenteouſneſſe in thy Palaces. Wee pray alſo for the bonds of peace, good Magiſtrates. Againe, for good health and ſtrength of body, whereby we may bee able to walke in our vocation. For honeſt name and fame, credit and favour with men as ſhall bee good for us, and a thouſand things moe that this life hath need of. Neither doe we aske theſe things in a bare and needy meaſure onely, but even in ſome comfortable meaſure, that wee may not onely our ſelves live with ſome cheare, which the Lord alloweth, but that we may be alſo helpfull unto others. So you have ſome taſte of the particulars of this generall word Bread.

Pro.17.1. Luke 1. 2 Theſ.3.16. Rom.12.18. Pſa.144.14. Pſa.122.

I ſee here their doubt is plainly diſſolved, that make a queſtion whether a Chriſtian may pray for the outward things of this world, becauſe the Church muſt be ſubject to perſecution.

It is very true: for here is a ſhort commandement to doe it, Give us this day our daily bread: beſides other generall charges in the word. Secondly, wee have his promiſes many and mercifull concerning theſe things, and what he promiſeth to give we may be bold to aske. Thirdly, we have the examples of his children, as of Iacob when he went to Padan Aram, ſaying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this journey which I goe, and wil give me bread to eat, and clothes to put on, ſo that I come againe unto my fathers houſe in ſafety, then ſhall the Lord be my God. Of Salomon that prayed for food convenient, and neither for riches nor for poverty. Of Lepers that prayed to bee clenſed; of blinde men that prayed for ſight; of men and women many in the Goſpell that prayed for their divers diſeaſes and infirmities, and were healed of our Saviour without any rebuke ever for their ſo doing. Fourthly, becauſe the Lord muſt ever have a Church but that cannot be without food, government, peace, health, and ſuch like: therefore it is lawfull to aske them. Laſtly, becauſe the asking and expectation of theſe things is a notable exerciſe of our faith, hope and truſt in Gods promiſes. For wee cannot aſſure our ſelves of theſe corporall goods, neither aske them, except wee bee in Gods favour, and feele in our ſelves good comfort of his good will towards us. By asking therefore, wee exerciſe our faith to beleeve the Lord to be our good God: from which goodneſſe of his we looke for theſe things, ſo farre as they may be good for us. Otherwiſe the Lord might ſay to us, you are none of that number that I promiſed theſe things unto. But yet this ever muſt we note concerning the manner of our prayer, namely, that it be, Cum conditione voluntatis, with condition of his good pleaſure, will and liking, and, In hunc finem, ut ſerviamus Deo, & proximo; for this end, that we may ſerve God, and our neighbour, by them, and with them. For who thus begge them not, are not heard: that is, theſe things are not given them to their good; but although they receive them according to their deſire, yet is God offended with them, and they receive them to their judgement. But ſpirituall things we may aske ſimply and without condition, becauſe God ſo hath promiſed them, and they ever profit us: as we may ſimply deſire the holy Ghoſt, becauſe the Lord hath ſimply and expreſly promiſed him to them that ask him, and ſo of other matters: whereas theſe earthly things now are good, and now evill for us; and therefore left to the pleaſure of him that knoweth what is beſt.

Mat.7.7. Pſa.55. Mar.20.29. Pro.30.7.

Earthly and outward things are lawfully prayed for, but ever with a condition.

What is the reaſon of the next word Our, and why is it called Our bread?

Not of merit or of due debt, but in reſpect of our neceſſity which cannot bee without it. And ſee then I pray you, what great gods we are become by our firſt Parents eating of the forbidden fruit, ſurely, even ſuch as are not able to live and have beeing in this world, without a peece of bread to ſupport & hold us up, which peece of bread we are not able to give our ſelves, if we periſh ten thouſand times for want of it, but we muſt have it given to us by him that is God indeed. This is the truth of that Serpents ſaying, You ſhall not die at all; but God doth know that when ye ſhall eate thereof, your eyes ſhall be opened, and you ſhall be as Gods, knowing good and evill. Yet cannot this and many thouſand lies moe make me leave hearkning to his hiſſing. Secondly, it is called our Bread, to teach us to be content with that portion which he vouchſafeth to give us, and not to bereave any others of that which is theirs: Either our neighbours of their livings, our ſervants of their wages, our workmen of their hire, or any one whatſoever of his owne; for that is not ours, that is another mans: and therefore wee cannot make this Petition to the Lord, but our owne tongues ſhall bee our accuſers to the Lord. For wee ſhall in words aske but ſo much as may truly be counted our owne, (as being got by ſuch meanes as hee alloweth) and yet indeed are not ſo contented, but rake and rob, and pull from many men that which is theirs, and not ours. How this toucheth many a man, I wiſh very heartily may be conſidered by privy feeling of ſecret guilt, and not in any broader termes laid open by mee. Surely beloved,

We bee goodly gods that cannot give our ſelves a piece of bread. Gen.3.4,5.

ved, it is a grievous matter to disable my selfe to pray the Lords Prayer, or any part of it: but so doe all they that are not content with so much bread as is their owne, of which they may truely say, it is ours: and therefore beware. Thirdly, this word Our, truely confirmeth the propriety of goods, wives, children, servants, and such like amongst Christians, contrary to all prophane and bruitish community, either Anabaptists or other heretikes whatsoever sought to be established. A long and a large matter if it need a confirmation or a confutation.

And why doe we say Daily Bread, or bread for the day?

The Lord hath pleased so to call it, first, to note out unto us our mortality and fading estate if he should not even daily feed us. Secondly, to teach us, that it is our duty daily to aske what daily we need, and not to make our prayer at once for a yeares, or many yeares provision, because we would take our liberty to pray no more. Thirdly, that thus he might bridle somewhat our raging hearts, and our needlesse, greedy, and unsatiable desires. For many of us are never satisfied, never pleased with any measure of blessing given us by the Lord, but ever craving and crying more, more. This immoderate humour, and sinfull vaine the Lord seeketh here to helpe, teaching us to be so farre from wishing heaps, or any wanton delicates, that we are content with daily bread, that is, with so much as serveth for that day, and shall be fit to preserve life honestly, not wantonly. Knowing it and feeling in the faith of a child of God: that a small thing unto the just man is better than great riches to the wicked and mighty: and again, that nothing wanteth to them that feare the Lord; that is, no profitable and necessary thing. The wise man saith it; The Lord will not famish the soule of the righteous, but he casteth away the substance of the wicked. The King and Prophet saith, I have beene young, &c. Cyprian saith, Quum Dei sunt omnia, habenti Deum nihil deerit, si Deo non deerit. And, Fides famem non timet. That is, since all things be Gods, how shall he that hath God want any thing, except God be wanting to himself. Faith fears no famine. Lastly, to assure us that so well our wants are knowne to the Lord, as that for every day he can tell what is sufficient, and what wee have need of. Therefore when it is said in the Gospell, Your heavenly Father knoweth what yee have need of, we may adde, every houre, every day, and doe it by warrant of this word in this Petition. A most comfortable thing truly to every one, and especially to them that have any great carke upon their hands, either of Children, or otherwise. For it assureth them, that their God is privie to their estate, yea, so privie, that he knoweth for every day in the weeke, and for every day in their lives what they have need of, both for themselves and their charges: and even for that cause, namely, that they should know it to be so, he hath caused them to pray but for their daily bread, not naming any quantity, but leaving that to himselfe, who knoweth better than themselves what will serve the turne, and will most assuredly ever send it them. I pray you then think of it, and so earnestly thinke of it, as the knowledge and remembrance of it may ever keep us from distrust in such a God, and from the effects of distrust, namely, the use of any bad meanes to relieve our wants by. For the Lord knoweth our need, and every dayes need, yea, every houres need, and his word is past, that he will not onely know it but relieve it, as shall be best. I will care for thee, I will not faile thee, neither forsake thee, saith the Lord. And therefore cast thy care in comfort upon me. What an incouragement also may this be ever to us, to goe to our knees, and to call upon our God by prayer, when we heare how privie he is to our estate? If we have a petition to a man, our speeding often lyeth upon our utterance; if we speake well, we speed well, but if either for feare or bashfulnesse our tongues faile to tell our case in such full sort as it is needful it should be known to the winning of our reliefe for it, then faile we also often, either of all, or part of that we seeke. But (O happy wee) it is not so with God. If we cannot utter a word, oppressed with some woe, or otherwise hindered, if we but figh, he heareth, he seeth, knoweth, and knoweth more fully than we could tell him our selves in any words if we did speake. With what a cheare then may wee fall before him for any thing wee want, and say, Lord thou knowest what I would have, though my tongue faulter, my want speaketh: looke upon me in thy mercy.

Mat.6.32.

1 Pet.5.7. Heb.13.5.

It seemeth by this that laying up is unlawfull.

You judge amisse, for Ioseph in the cheape yeares laid up for deare, and so saved his owne, his masters, and many lives moe, and the Lord directed him to this providence. The Disciples of Antioch sent their ability to the brethren in Iudea, and it was reserved and laid up, till the famine came that Agabus had propheſied of, Acts 11. 28. Christ bad gather up the broken meate, let none of it be lost: the holy Ghost saith, the Children lay not up for fathers, but the Fathers for the Children, warranting, as you see, a laying up: and much more proofe if it need is there. Wherefore by praying for daily bread, or bread for the day, wee are taught to bee content if the Lord give no more, for the Lords gifts may not bee cast away by any negligence coloured from this place. Yet must our reservation be void of covetousnesse, made onely in reverence of the Lords gifts, to lawfull ends, and not to trust in any store, and to robbe the poore and needy when want is.

What shall we answer then to those words of Christ, Care not for to morrow, for the morrow shall care for it selfe, &c?

We

We muſt anſwer thus, and anſwer truly, that our Saviour there forbiddeth us to thinke of the morrow with diſtruſtfulneſſe, but not with prayers and labours.

How can rich men pray this prayer, that have bread for many dayes and yeares?

Becauſe all uſe and comfort and ſafety of thoſe riches commeth from the Lord. Which except the Lord give, either they loſe by ſome accident their goods, or having them, they have no power to uſe them; or uſing them, they nouriſh not, as after is proved.

But if it be Our bread, why ſhould we pray the Lord to give it, the uſe being to aske that which is not ours?

If it were ours by duty, you might be thought to ſay ſomething, but if it be ours but by mercy, as you have been told, you ſay nothing, for things in mercy given, muſt in a feeling of miſery be asked: and that it is mercy, let Iacob tell us, that great ſervant of the Lord, who yet confeſſed that he was not worthy of the leaſt of all the mercies that God had given him, much leſſe are wee. See yet further, and I pray you mark them, what profitable things this word may teach us. Firſt, it teacheth us that God is the author and very ſpring head of all good, bee it ſpirituall or corporall that commeth unto us. And conſequently, wee are admoniſhed of our miſery, that are not of our ſelves worth a peece of bread, but made beggers of it at his hands that onely doth, and can give it. If we be not worth ſo much, ſurely, we are not worth the kingdome of heaven and everlaſting life. This, little thinke they that like bruite beaſts ſit downe to eate their given bread, and riſe againe when they are filled, not once either in heart or voice, remembring the giver of it. Let ſuch remember what the Apoſtle teacheth, that the creatures of God are not ſanctified unto us, ſo that we may uſe them with a good conſcience, but by the word and by prayer. Let them looke upon the little birds, which ſing ſo ſweetly in their kinde, before they ſeeke for meate in the morning. It teacheth us againe, ever ſo to get our wealth and riches in this life, as we may truly ſay and comfortably feele that the Lord hath given them, which we cannot if ſtealth bee the meanes, or uſury, or oppreſſion, or any condemned way whatſoever. For then the devill helpeth us, and when any loſſe happeneth of them, there is a double griefe, one at the loſing, and another at the ſecret thought of the judgement of God over things not well come by. When as if the meanes be good, as right inheritance, or true labour with Iacob, to our maſters or ſuch like, then are our gettings the gift of God, the bleſſings of his mercy upon our labours, and enjoying it ever with a good conſcience, we loſe it alſo, if ſo the Lord will, with a quiet minde, ſaying with Iob in a Chriſtian comfort, The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: bleſſed be the name of the Lord. Fourthly, in ſaying Give, we are taught that albeit wee labour never ſo much, being ſo commanded to doe, yet except the Lord beſtow the bleſſing, our labours cannot attaine to any thing, according to the Prophet, Except the Lord keepe the City, the Watchman waketh but in vaine, yea, in vain doe we riſe up early, and goe late to bed, eating the bread of ſorrow, except the Lord beſtow a mercy upon our paines and travell. With the Lord we have all things, and without him wee have nothing. If the earth fructifie, it is not tilled without God. Pſal. 108. 33. Micah 6. 15. Ag. 1. 6. If he ſaid it truly, Regnum Perſicum creviſſe, Deo ducente, & ipſis Regibus prompte ſequentibus, That the kingdome of Perſia flouriſhed becauſe that God lead, and the Kings readily followed. Surely, all men muſt ſay, that by the ſame meanes, and not otherwiſe, either their countries, townes, or houſes, have their good whatſoever it is. Reſpublica Dei ope & auxilio multò magis quàm ratione hominum & conſilio gubernatur: the common-wealth (ſaith Tully) is governed by the help and hand of God, much more than by any reaſon or counſell of men. And Vbi non Deus, ſed mortalis aliquis præeſt, ibi malorum nullum effugium. Where man not God governeth, there is no avoiding of evill when it commeth upon them, ſaith another. Againe, Scitis quod neque multitudo, nec robur in bello victoriam adfert, ſed qui Deo juuante, magno animo in hoſtes impetum faciunt, eos non ſuſtinent hoſtes. Ye know that neither multitude or ſtrength getteth victory in battell, but if any ſtoutly aſſaile their enemies, God ſetting to his helping hand, ſuch aſſault is not ever to bee abidden. So have heathens acknowledged what here Chriſtians are taught, that labour availeth not to get any bread except God give it, and give it daily. It comfortably aſſureth us againe of Gods readineſſe to give, for otherwiſe hee would never have commanded us to aske, and ſay Give. Laſt of all, wee meaning in this Petition not onely that God ſhould give us bare bread, but the healthfull nouriſhment alſo of it, and the ſtrength of it, and not onely goods and living according to our places and needs, but the godly and honeſt uſe alſo of the ſame, wee learne by this word Give, that as well this alſo commeth from God, as the other, a thing either not knowne or foully forgotten of a number. And therefore they rob God of his glory, and aſcribe to the creatures that which is the power of the Creator; and to the meanes, that which they cannot have, except the Lord bleſſe them as meanes, I meane to nouriſh us, and to ſuſtaine us healthfully and well. For marke you what the Lord ſaith to his people Iſrael: When I ſhall breake the ſtaffe of your bread, then ten women ſhall bake their bread in one oven, and they ſhall deliver your bread again by waight, and you ſhal eate, but not be ſatisfied. The ſtaffe of bread is the ſtrength and power to nouriſh, which you heare the Lord himſelfe ſay is given and taken away by him. If he take it away, the dainties and delicacie of Princes feed them not, but they pine away in the midſt of them all, and if he give this ſtaffe to it, the pulſe and water that Daniel fed upon maketh a fairer face, and giveth a better liking than any portion of the Kings meate. See this in rich and poore mens children alſo plainly, the one fully and coſtly fed, yet proſpereth not, the other ſeldome fully and ever courſely fed, and yet both fat and faire, and healthy: Such is the gifts of God that now wee ſpeake of, and here in pray for, yea, ſo farre may it be from nouriſhing us, that it may choke us, if the Lord give not gift unto gift, and mercy to mercy, for ſo did the ſlie Adrian the 4. and an haire another. The Lord was able to make his Prophet Eliah to walk forty dayes and forty nights in the ſtrength of a courſe cake, baked on the coales, and of a pot of water: and the Lord was able to nouriſh Moſes as long in the mount without any meate at all, to tell us that man liveth not by bread only, but by every word that commeth out of the mouth of God. I ſaid alſo, the uſe of riches came of the Lord, and ſee your ſelves if it be not ſo. Doth not the Preacher ſay, that he had beheld an evill under the Sunne, and it was a great one, and much among men, even a man to whom God hath given riches and treaſure, and honour, and he wanteth nothing for his ſoule of all that it deſireth, but God giveth him not power to eate thereof, but a ſtrange man ſhall eat it up. See you and marke it, how God is not only the giver of riches, but even of the uſe alſo and power to eate of them, which gift he beſtoweth and withholdeth at his pleaſure. The rich man laid up for many yeares, but the Lord would not have him to live and enjoy then the things hee had: the uſe he had not, longer than God gave it. But even when he leaſt thought, his ſoule was called for, and then like a foole he had heaped too much up for other men. This is that which the wiſe Syrach ſaith: Some man is rich by his care and niggardſhip, and this is the portion of his wages, (meaning his reward is to have them, but not to uſe them) for when he ſhould begin to eate of them, the time draweth neare that he muſt leave all theſe things unto other men, and die himſelfe. Wherefore I ſay, praying in this Petition not onely for the things, but even alſo for the uſe and comfort; when we ſay Give, we are taught that even the uſe alſo is of the Lord. And thus doe you ſee what great profit this one word hath in this Petition, and what we may learn by it.

Firſt, to teach us to remember our brethren as well as our ſelves, to be carefull for them, and to wiſh them all needfull things as to our ſelves: according to the true nature of Chriſtian charity, which ſeeketh not her owne things only, but even other mens alſo as well. Which when it is conſidered, what (O Lord) may thoſe men ſay for the quiet of their conſciences, that have never enough themſelves, but even as if God and all his bleſſings belonged onely to them, and that they onely ſhould dwell in the world alone, rake and ſcrape to themſelves onely with all might and maine, but of their deare brethren they never thinke. No, ſo far are they from praying for them, that God would give them their daily bread, as that if they have any part or portion of it, they are heartily deſirous to have it from them, yea, ſicke upon their beds often, as was wicked Achab, till they have gotten Naboths vineyard and inheritance: do theſe men pray, Da nobis, Give us good Lord our daily bread? that is, give my brethren as well as to mine own ſoule, what is needfull to them, and give all thy Children as to me their daily wants. No, no, if they might ſay it for ſhame, they would ſay, give me all, and let the reſt receive of me if they will have ought. But what they ſhame to ſay, they ſhame not to wiſh: and therefore as often as they ſay this prayer, they abuſe the Lord, and it is his mercy that preſently he ſtriketh not ſo great hypocriſie, as to ſay, us with lips, as if they meant many, and me with heart, meaning but themſelves. Learne therefore (beloved) by a common word, to have a common heart. It liketh the Lord that we love our brethren, and it liketh him not that wee love only our ſelves. We ſay not, give me, but give us: and let us doe thereafter, even joyne them in prayer with our ſelves, and wiſh them bread as to our ſelves, that is, all neceſſaries. Secondly, wee are by this manner of ſpeaking taught the true uſe of ſuch portion as God giveth us, namely, ſo to have it, as that others have part with us: For we are but the Stewards of the Lords gifts. And non tibi ſoli datur quod habes, ſed per te dat Deus aliis. It is not given what thou haſt to thy ſelf alone, but by thee God giveth the ſame to others. His minde being that thou ſhouldſt ſo impart them. Thy meate is given to comfort others as thou maiſt, and a joy it will be if thou canſt ſay with Iob, I have not eaten my morſels alone, but the fatherleſſe hath eaten with me. Thy wool is given thee to clothe the naked, and a comfort great it is when a man may ſay with Iob againe, I have ſeene none periſh for want of clothing, neither any poore without a covering, but their loines have bleſſed me, becauſe they were clothed with the fleece of my ſheepe. Iob had lodging, and he thought it given to releeve the ſtranger: he had authority, and he thought it given to help the poore in judgement, not to oppreſſe them: And ſo ever have others of Gods Children poſſeſſed for others and not only for themſelves, what the Lord beſtowed upon them. Wherefore if no other mouth ſhould ever judge them, their owne mouthes ſufficiently charge all miſerable wretches and wretched miſers of the earth, as often as they pray this prayer, becauſe they ſay, Give us, in the plurall plurall number, and yet where they have received they uſe it ſcarce in the ſingular number, being ſo far from releeving others with any comfort they have, as that they little may finde in their hearts often to releeve themſelves. Let us be warned before we ſmart for wretchedneſſe. We pray not for our ſelves alone, but for others: we receive not for our ſelves alone, but for others: and therefore let us impart the Lords given graces both to our ſelves and to others. So ſhall we ſhew our ſelves children of our heavenly Father, who is bountifull to all, and hard to none, dealing his gifts in ſuch favour and fulneſſe ever, that all tongues may ſpeake of his praiſe, and all hearts conceive of his mercy. That God and Father make us like him in this and all our duties. Amen.

The Prayer.

MIghty God, and moſt loving Lord, after things concerning thy glory, it is thy gracious favour to us fraile wretches, that we ſhould boldly aske what concerneth our neceſſities and wants, promiſing even therein alſo to be mercifull unto us, and to heare our prayers. Wherefore both in obedience to thy Commandement, and Faith in thy promiſes, we throw downe our ſelves here before thee, and beſeech thee to give us this day our daily bread: that is, good Lord, as thou haſt taught us, all things needfull to the maintenance of this life, Give us meate, drink, and clothing for our bodies. Give us of the dew of heaven, and fatneſſe of the earth as thy bleſſed pleaſure ſhall vouchſafe us to our good. If it pleaſe thee to give more, O Lord make us thankfull, and faithfull Stewards to diſpoſe thy mercies to our brethren that ſhall have need. If it pleaſe thee to give leſſe, and changing thy hand to bring us with thy ſervant Moſes out of the Court to keep a flock of ſheep, and with David from high favours, to many feares, O God and Father mercifull, even with that portion of bread make us well content, and thankfull alſo ever to thee for it. Remembring well with our ſelves how thou caredſt for theſe thy ſervants and others many in their eſtate, and haſt even by this word bread, taught us to be content with a little. Thy mercies, O Lord, we beſeech thee give us according to our charges, thou knoweſt our number and our needs, and thou feedeſt the very Ravens that call upon thee. The eyes of all things waite upon thee, O God, and thou giveſt them meate in due ſeaſon. Thou openeſt thy hand and filleſt all things living with plenteouſneſſe. To theſe favours O Lord, grant peace, and quietneſſe, private at home, and publike abroad. Let there be no going out, no leading into captivity, nor any complaining in our ſtreets. Peace bee within the walls of Hieruſalem, O Lord, to thy good pleaſure, and plenteouſneſſe in her Palaces, that is, to thy Church mercy and favour, we beſeech thee. To this end give us, O heavenly Father, the bleſſing of prudent and godly governours. Confirme their hearts in zeale and love to thee, and make them ever carefull of thy glory. Confirme our obedience and truth againe to them in thee, and both one and other, make us thankfull greatly for thy preſent mercy in this behalfe upon us. If ever people found favour at thy Majeſties hands, O Lord, our portion hath beene great, muſt we ſay, and this daily bread with a liberall hand above other nations now many yeares given unto us. O deare Father touch us with the feeling of it, and make us thankfull, and continue this mercy and loving kindneſſe ſtill upon us, giving us ſtill theſe comforts of thine. What wee have need of, deny us not, and what we have, with thy favour, O Lord, and to our good, let us ever have it, not to our harme and judgement. So we that be thy people and ſheepe of thy paſture, ſhall give thee thankes for ever. Heare us, O Lord, O God, and Father gracious, not for our ſakes, but for Jeſus Chriſts ſake, our onely Lord and Saviour,

Amen.

The fifth PETITION.

And forgive us our trespasses, &c.

Now are ye come to a Petition (as our estate standeth) most sweet and comfortable, most necessary and profitable, wherefore I pray you, even as fully as you shall thinke convenient, to speake of it, and first of the order as you have done in the former.

The order of this Petition.

TOuching the order of it, Tertullian saith very well: Quid alimenta proderunt, si illis reputamur revera quasi taurus ad victimam, what will any nourishments in the life profit us, if with them we be accounted as Oxen to the slaughter? Cyprian more plainely, Post subsidium cibi, petitur & venia delicti, ut qui à Deo pascitur, in Deo vivat, nec tantum præsenti & temporali vitæ, sed & æternæ consulatur, ad quam veniri potest, si peccata dimittantur: after the ayde of meate, is begged pardon of offence: that he which of God is fed, in God may live, and care had as well of eternall life as of temporall, unto which eternall life then is the way open, when all sinnes be forgiven. Wherefore since in the former we have craved of the Lord what concerneth this life, in these two latter we beg what concerneth that hereafter. In the former desiring him to forgive what is past, and in the latter to strengthen against what is to come. Both which our requests have ground upon his own promise, and are directed thereby. For the Lord in the covenant which it pleased him to make with his Church, hath promised both, saying; Their iniquity will I forgive, and remember their sins no more: which is the thing we now beg: And I will put my Law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts, and will be their God, and they shall be my people, &c. that is, I will assist them with a new power of Spirit, and confirme them with a further strength to stand hereafter, which is the matter of our next question.

Ier. 31. 34. & 33

It might seeme to some, by the order of the former Petition, and this, that the remission of our sinnes were a matter lesse to be cared for than our daily bread, because it is set after in this Prayer.

If it had not been said before in the beginning of the former Petition, that this order is observed of the Lord in regard of our rudenesse, that he might leade us from a matter better knowne, to a matter lesse knowne: yet truly they be very raw in Religion that would thinke things only respecting this life to be preferred before things touching life eternall. God forbid therefore but this order of these petitions notwithstanding, every Christian man and woman should make it their chief care to find mercy with the Lord from their transgressions, rather than to enjoy ten thousand worlds with all the glory that might be in them, for what would all these worlds profit them when they had lost their owne souls, in them all not able to find what to give for the recompence of the same againe? but without remission of sin there can be no salvation, God not so much as hearing sinners, much lesse saving them: And therefore justly our chiefe care to have sin pardoned, that we may be saved.

Mat. 16. 26.

Religion is not cause of want, but sin.

Deut 32. 14.

If you would conclude any thing of the order of this petition following the other, conclude this, and that you may doe both truly and profitably, namely, that true Religion is not the cause of want of daily bread, but our sinnes. And therefore presently after request to the Lord for that, we adjoyne the other as the true stop and let of the former, if it be not taken away by his mercy: as if we should say, we request Lord the comforts of this life, the fruits of the ground, and the fruits of our cattell, butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambes, and rams fed in Bashan, the blessing of wheate, and the red liquor of the grape, but neither these nor any such may we looke for, except in mercy thou take away our sin, the very stay of all thy goodnesse from us, if thou deale in justice. And therefore Lord forgive us our trespasses. Let no man then accuse Religion for dearth and scarcity, for famine and hunger, but consider his owne deserts, and the deserts of thousands more, and remember ever both how these Petitions lie, and what also for more plainnesse the Lord himselfe hath spoken by the Prophet Ieremy, saying: Your iniquities have turned away these earthly blessings from you, as raine both early and late in due season, with a pleasant harvest and such like: yea, your sinnes have hindred good things from you. Againe by Esay: Behold, the Lords hand is not shortned, that it cannot save, neither is his eare heavy that it cannot heare: but your iniquities have separated betwixt you and your God, and your sin hath hid his face from you, that he will not heare. For your hands are defiled with blood, and your fingers with iniquity, &c.

Ier. 9.

Esay 49. 1. &c.

Now to the words themselves if you thinke good, and of them in order: for that is plaine.

The first word is Forgive, of it selfe so plain that it needeth not any explication, and therfore not standing in that sort upon it, let us consider the conclusions that arise thereof to a Christian minde that carefully weigheth what God hath spoken. First, then it containeth a plaine confession feſſion of our miſerable eſtate unto the Lord, and ſo teacheth us that before pardon and forgiveneſſe, ought to goe a true, and faithfull, and unfained knowledging of our evill whatſoever. For why ſhould God vouchſafe to pardon, what we not able in truth to hide from him, as being God, yet in the ſtrong corruption of our untamed hearts endeavour to cloke, and doe not lay open in woe and godly ſorrow before him. Very mortall man looketh for confeſſion of a fault, and we uſe to ſay, that halfe the mends is made when it is ſo done, yet may we cover from man very great offences: how much more may the Lord our God juſtly require that being not able to blinde him, we ſeek not to doe it, but in all reverence of his Majeſty and vehement diſlike of our ſelves and our ſins, we lay them at his foot and beg his mercy. That notable place in the Pſalme of David teacheth us this, when he ſaith: Whilſt I held my tongue my bones conſumed, or when I roared all the day long: For thy hand is heavy upon me day and night, and my moiſture is turned into the drought of Summer, then I acknowledged my ſin, neither hid I mine iniquity. For I thought I will confeſſe againſt my ſelfe my wickedneſſe unto the Lord, and thou forgaveſt the puniſhment of my ſin. See how before he confeſſed he found no comfort, and after confeſſion, how hee found no puniſhment. Look in the law of the Lord, and marke theſe words to Moſes: When a man or woman ſhall commit any ſin that men commit, and tranſgreſſe againſt the Lord, when that perſon ſhall treſpaſſe, then they ſhall confeſſe their ſin which they have done, and ſhall reſtore the dammage, &c. Confeſſion God required, and confeſſion they performed. Although the Lord ſhould kill me, ſaith faithfull Iob, yet will I put my truſt in him, but I will reprove my wayes, for all that, in his ſight, that is, I will confeſſe my evill freely and fully with a ſingle heart, as a wretched ſinner ſhould doe: He that hideth his ſin, ſaith wiſe Solomon, ſhall not proſper, but he that confeſſeth them and forſaketh them, ſhall have mercy. If we ſay we have no ſin, then we deceive our ſelves, and there is no truth in us, but if we acknowledge and confeſſe our ſin, God is faithfull to forgive us our ſinne, and the blood of Ieſus Chriſt cleanſeth us from all ſin. This is not that filthy ſhrift in the eare of a filthy liver, invented in Rome, and throwne downe in Conſtantinople upon juſt experience of ugly pollution by it, but this is the Lords ordinance performed ever of the Lords people, to the Lord himſelfe. David a ſinner hideth it not when the Prophet ſpake, but cryed peccavi, with a feeling heart and with a grieved mind that he had ſo fallen. That David when he had numbred the people, and the Lord offended had ſent a plague amongſt them, cryed in his woe; It is I, it is I Lord that have offended, and theſe ſilly ſheep what have they done? And again in another place: therfore I ſaid, Lord have mercy upon me, and heal my ſoul, for I have ſinned againſt thee. The ſtraying ſon returning to himſelfe and to the eſtate of a ſonne, ſeeth and ſigheth for paſſed folly, and confeſſeth it freely as his bounden duty, Father, Father, I have ſinned againſt heaven and againſt thee, and I am no more worthy to be called thy ſon. The humble Publican beſeecheth God to be mercifull unto him, not a juſt proud Phariſie, but a poore ſinfull and wretched Publican. We are here juſtly, ſaid the theefe on the Croſſe, and we receive things worthy of that we have done, but this man hath done nothing amiſſe: a very plaine confeſſion of a feeling heart. When Paul had preached againſt conjuring and ſorcery, as we reade in that place: what was the fruit of his ſpeaking, and their hearing, but this? Many that beleeved came, and confeſſed, and ſhewed their workes. Iohn alſo baptized in the wilderneſſe, but whom? ſuch as confeſſed their ſinnes againſt the Lord. Ever therefore before pardon muſt goe confeſſion, for ſo ever hath it done, as by all theſe proofes is now plaine. Private to God, if the ſin be private, publike to the Church, if the ſin be ſuch; as ſhall more appeare hereafter in another place. Wherefore let us end this note upon this firſt word, Forgive, and know it ever that we are taught, if we ſeeke mercy, not to hide ſinne. For the Lords pardon requireth the ſinners confeſſion. Covers and clokes, they doe but cover the light of Gods countenance, that it ſhine not upon us, and yet doe what wee can, we can cover nothing indeed from his eyes. We ſhew our will, and we want our wiſh: ſin unto ſinne we grievouſly adde, and we deale with our ſoules as ſome ſore ones with their bodies, concealing their ſore till the time be paſt, and the body periſhed. Wherefore even as often as we ſhall ever hereafter ſay this prayer, let us adde this confeſſion to it: O Lord our grievous treſpaſſes, our many and great tranſgreſſions, this blot of our bodies, or ſpot of our ſoules, whatſoever it is, in that mercy that hath no meaſure forgive it, daſh it, and waſh it out, that it never appeare againe before thee.

The whole Petition teacheth two things. Quid petamus, & quid facere debeamus, Petitoremitte nobis, &c.

Note.

What ſecondly?

Secondly, it teacheth us the long ſuffering of the Lord, wonderfull and unſpeakable towards mankinde. Whereby he beareth, and beareth with us wretched creatures, and although wee daily and hourely, ever and continually ſinne againſt him, yet caſteth he not away ſo unprofitable ſervants, but deferreth his anger, ſpareth his judgements, and if we turne to him, he turneth moſt mercifully to us, and forgiveth heapes of ugly ſinne againſt him. If we wormes and duſt ſhould be uſed of any, as he is uſed of many, we ſhould ſhew our corruption quickly, and reckon up the faults committed and pardoned by us, thinking wee had ſhewed great favour, and done much for our brethren if we had twice or thrice been intreated by thē to forgive them, we would deny at the laſt and ſay plainly to them, we might not ever, if they ſo ever would offend.

The Lords great mercy, and our great corruption.

Yet what are we? as bad as they, if not to them, yet to others: and therefore no such cause we should be so strict in measure, when often our selves must need the same courtesie, and request a favourable hand to strike but softly. But see the Lord. His purity blotteth both Sunne and Moone, the heaven and the earth, and all the creatures in them both, he offendeth never, neither needeth that any should forgive him, and yet is he more favourable to his very enemies, than we are to our liked and loved friends. For he spareth the worst, more than we the best, and though they sin often, yet forgiveth he still. They aske and he granteth, they knock and hee openeth, they cry and he spareth, yea, though they have cryed ten thousand times Forgive us our trespasses, and he ever hath forgiven very great and grievous ones, yet is he not weary when we cry againe, and casteth us off, but he is patient towards us, saith S. Peter, and would have no man perish, but all to come to repentance, and to be saved. O dearest God what favour is this, what goodnesse is this to so great offenders! Yea, mark here how we are commanded whilest we live and breathe to pray this prayer, Forgive us Lord, and therefore plainly taught, that even so long there is mercy with God without wearinesse, a gracious open eare to a sinfull suter, and pardon for that sin that frailty hath fallen into, and now seeketh in a better grace to have done away. This is great patience that endureth till death, being so often provoked to deny such favour; and with ravished hearts for the sweetnesse of it may we heare and learne it, yet let us not abuse it, (as some have done,) but remember well what the Apostle said when it was objected: Shall we sin that grace may abound? God forbid. How shall we which are dead to sin, live yet therein, and so forth, as followeth there at large. The riches of his bountifulnesse and patience, and long suffering leadeth to repentance, saith the Apostle. If to repentance, then not to presumption; if to amendment, then not to continuance in evill, and therefore take heed. Punit Deus serò quidem, sed duriter. Long doth the Lord stay ere he smite, but he smiteth home when he doth smite. Conclude we then with wise Syrach, Say not, I have sinned, and what evill hath come unto me. For the Almighty is a patient rewarder, but he will not leave thee unpunished. Because thy sin is forgiven, be not without feare, to heap sin upon sin. And say not, the mercy of God is great, he will forgive me my manifold sins: for mercy and wrath come from him, and his indignation commeth down upon sinners. Make no tarying to turne unto the Lord, and put not off from day to day: For suddenly shall the wrath of the Lord breake forth, and in thy security thou shalt be destroyed, and thou shalt perish in time of vengeance. That houre that the wicked hope for is often denyed, and suddenly they perish without repentance. Therefore presume not.

Rom. 6. 1. Rom. 2. 5.

Thirdly what?

Thirdly, we learne by this first word, that the remission of our sinne is of meere mercy and favour, not for any merit of ours. For marke I pray you how we are taught to say, not as the debtor said in the Gospell, Lord refraine thine anger toward us, and we will pay thee all: but absolutely and plainly, Lord forgive, that is, quite rase out, and pardon without any recompence or satisfaction from us or by us. So that even this Petition, if there were no more Scripture, assureth the truth of that doctrine to us, that by grace we live and are saved. Mercy pardoneth, mercy healeth, and mercy doth whatsoever God doth for us. Merit dare not peepe to speake unto the Lord. Just as the Apostle saith: We are justified freely by his grace, not of works, nay, if of grace, therefore not of workes, else were grace no grace. Againe, we have the forgivenesse of our sinnes according to his rich grace. And againe, By grace ye are saved through faith, and that not of your selves, it is the gift of God: with a number such like places. Just also as the Father said, Meritum meum miseratio Domini: My merit is the only and free mercy of God: and so long abound I with merits as hee aboundeth with mercies: but take the one from him, and take the other from mee: For my merit, I say, is his meere mercy. Wherefore most grievously doth that doctrine of Popery rob the Lord of his true and due honour, when it teacheth satisfaction by man to God for his sinne. For who can satisfie God, but his onely Sonne, in whom onely he is pleased? And of whom flatly it is said, that he is the propitiation, that is, the full, whole, perfect, and all the satisfaction that God requireth or can like of in this sense. Mary knew no other, the Publican knew no other, Peter knew no other, nor the old Father, when he said of Peter, Lachrymas lego, satisfactionem non lego. Peters teares I read of, but of any satisfaction that he made himselfe to purge his sinne, and to please God with, I reade of none: but of this also more in his proper place, if God will. Let us see the truth, stand in the truth, thanke the God of heaven for it, and detest those Popish blasphemies against the Lord and his deare Son Christ. In that precious blood is the Father pleased and satisfied for all our sinnes, if we lay hold of it: and for our workes they carry greater corruption in their bones and bowels, than that so pure a God should be pleased with them, or so ugly sinnes ever purged by them.

Grace proved and satisfaction improved.

Rom. 3. 14. 9. 11. 11. 6. Ephes. 17. 28.

Chrysostome.

Why is it said, Forgive us, and not forgive me?

To teach us that which we are dull to learne, namely, not to bestow our whole love and care upon our selves, but to divide it also to our brethren, and even as heartily and earnestly to beseech the Lord to blot out all their offences as our owne, and to bee mercifull to them as to our ſelves. But alas beloved, where is this affection amongſt us? Where is this care of the ſpirituall good of our neighbours? Truly it is moſt rare, yea, much more rare than can ſtand with right and true profeſſion of Jeſus Chriſt.

If wee doe thinke of our brethren at any time, and wiſh them well, ſurely that reacheth but to earthly bleſſings, to riches, to honors, to favour and friends in this ſinfull world, and ſo wee might ſee them magnified and exalted in this reſpect, our deſire were anſwered, and wee fully contented. A great corruption in us.

The pardon of their ſinnes, and favour with God by his beloved Sonne, their future joy, in a place of joy endleſſe ard eternall; alas we thinke not of, we care not for, God knoweth we ſeldome (if ever) pray for. Yet is this all in all; for how ſuddenly fadeth all worldly pompe, if it be obtained; and how often faile we, and never doe obtaine it? Wherefore even in this, and every petition of this daily Prayer, the Lord hath quickened our earthly minds, to love in a better ſort our neighbours and brethren; and I pray you let us learne them.

Remember how vehemently Moſes felt the miſery of the Jewes, if God forgave them not their committed evill, and how earneſtly hee prayed for that forgiveneſſe. Oh (ſaith hee) this people have ſinned a great ſinne, and have made them gods of gold. Therefore now if thou pardon their ſinne, thy mercy ſhall appeare; but if thou wilt not, I pray thee raſe mee out of the Booke which thou haſt written. Exod. 32. 31.

Remember the words of the Apoſtle Paul to the like effect: I ſay the truth in Chriſt, I lie not, my conſcience beareth me witneſſe in the holy Ghoſt, that I have great heavineſſe and continual ſorrow in my heart. For I would wiſh my ſelfe to be ſeparate from Chriſt, for my brethren, that are my kinſmen according to the fleſh. Rom. 9. 1.

See beloved, and marke wherein the beſt love of man to man conſiſteth and is ſhewed, namely, by wiſhing his ſpirituall good, the good of his ſoule, the forgiveneſſe of his ſinnes: and as the Prophet David ſaith, the lifting up of the light of the Lords countenance upon him. O patternes of Love in this behalfe to their brethren, Moſes and Paul, inimitable of us, unleſſe the Lord aſſiſt! For where is this heavineſſe of heart, and continuall ſorrow to ſee our brethren ſinne, and by ſinne to endanger themſelves here for ever? Where are thoſe floods of teares which David ſaid guſhed out of his eyes, becauſe men kept not Gods commandements? Alas how ſtrange a tale is this to us! Well, it ſhould not bee ſtrange: Neither Moſes nor Paul would have wiſhed themſelves accurſed of God, to have gained to their brethren ten thouſand worlds, or any worldly good whatſoever, but to gaine them ſpirituall good they did it: and therefore much more are we to care for the ſalvation of our brethren, than for their glory in this earth, if we well imitate them. David would never have guſhed out teares to ſee them want wealth, but to ſee them want grace he did. Pſalm. 4. Pſa. 119.

VVherfore let us learne how to love our brethren well; let us learne what moſt pleaſeth and diſpleaſeth God; what moſt profiteth and hurteth our neighbours, and more heartily pray for the remiſſion of their ſinnes, than for any worldly good. It is good love to wiſh God and his comforts to our friends, and to be greatly touched with their miſdoings toward God. It was for ſinne and the effects of ſinne that Ieremy ſaw in the people, and ready to fall upon them, that made him wiſh his head full of water, and his eyes a fountaine of teares, and that hee had a cottage in the wilderneſſe to ſit and ſorrow in. Therefore much doe we ſeeke for our brethren, when wee ſeeke the pardon of their ſinnes at Gods hand for them. Ier. 9. 1.

Now beloved, if we be bound to beſeech God to forgive them their ſinnes againſt him, judge your ſelves if we bee not bound to forgive them our ſelves their ſinnes againſt us. And againe, what their caſe is, that will every day ſay this Prayer with their tongues, and deſire God to forgive both them and their brethren their ſinne, and by and by both goe themſelves, and with many flattering baits, earneſt allurements, and even alſo with violent conſtraints pull the ſame their brethren to ſinne againe, without remorſe and feeling. Can wee both be mediators for pardon, and tempters to miſchiefe, with God his good liking? Fearefully therefore doe thouſands offend, and thinke not of it. If wee will pray for remiſſion for our ſelves and others, wee muſt keepe our ſelves and others, as the Lord will ſtrengthen, from ſuch evill againe when wee are pardoned. If we be bound to beſeech God to forgive our brethren their ſinnes, are not we our ſelves bound to forgive them?

Away then with this good fellowſhip that tempteth unto ſinne: and if any allure you my brethren, if other denyals will not ſerve, aske them whether they have ſaid any prayers that day or not; if they have not, judge if that be good company to goe withall, or no? if they have, aſk them if they have not therein beſought God to pardon both their owne ſinnes and other mens: if they have, how may they then with one breath ſend forth good and evill, pray for good, provoke to evill: aske pardon, and doe the thing againe. So ſhall Satan flie from you. Allurers of others to ſinne.

The next word is Our, and what doth that note unto us?

It ſheweth us what is the qualitie of our riches and wealth, for wee have played the Merchants, and traficked with an out-landiſh rover called the devill, and with him wee have dealt by exchange. Our barke was fraughted with knowledge, with love, with humility, with joy, with A lamentable exchange made with peace, with long-suffering, with gentlenesse, with faith, with meeknesse, with temperance; and to goe no further, with all grace and innocency. So that we might say of these jewels, that they were ours: but now ye have unladed the barke by subtile perswasion, and fraught it anew with this rovers wares, with ignorance, with hatred, with pride, with sorrowes, with adultery, with fornication, with uncleannesse, with wantonnesse, idolatry, witchcraft, debate, emulations, wrath, contentions, seditions, heresies, envy, murther, drunkennesse, gluttony, and such like; yea, with all want of grace and impurity. So that now we must say the former were ours, and these are ours. This is our lading now, and this have we profited by this rover now. Now we may say, Forgive us our trespasses, then might we say, continue thy graces: then was Grace our lading, now are we fraught till we sink againe with sinnes and trespasses. Alas that this word Ours, should be applyed to these. But thus are we fallen, and of us it is now said, that all the imaginations of the thoughts of our hearts are onely evill continually, that we are borne in iniquity, and conceived in sinne, and that wee are not able so much as to thinke a good thought of our selves. Wherefore, as I say, this word in our Petition, telleth us the quality of our wealth, and that our gardens have growing too much Rue in them, and too little hearbe of Grace. Trespasses be ours now, but no trespasses were ours once. This thought S. Ambrose of, when he said, Dives eras, ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus, perdidisti quod habebas, perdidisti pecuniam, accepisti à diabolo debitum quod non erat necessarium, &c. What is our debt but sinne? thou wast rich, and made to the Image and similitude of God, but thou hast lost what thou hadst, thou hast lost thy money, and taken of the devill a debt that was not necessary. The best way for us is to unlade againe this bad merchandize that we have got of this roving merchant, by humble prayer to the Lord to forgive us our trespasses, and to drowne them in the bottome of the sea, that they never more may bee seene, ayding us, strengthening us, and confirming us against our great and grievous weakenesse: which the Lord for his mercies sake doe.

What is ours now.

Gen.6.5. Ps.51.5.

Our gardens now have too much Rue, and too little herbe of Grace.

If you will proceed in order, the word Trespasses is next.

The Greek words which the holy Ghost hath used in these places here noted, are divers, yet tending to the same matter as our English words doe; Debts, trespasses and sinnes. Debita vocantur quia nos obstringunt apud Dei tribunal, & debitores constituunt: Debts they may be called, because they binde us at the judgement seat of God, and make us debters, saith one. Et debita vocat, ut gravitatem peccati notaret: He calleth them debts, that he might note out the grievous nature of sinne, saith another. Which the more we know and feele, the more heartily and vehemently will we make our cry to the Lord to release us from it, or at the least from the sting of it, that is the condemnation of our soules. For who cryeth more for the bodily Physitian, than hee that seeth the greatest perill in his disease? Who seeketh more, or looketh about him with more pitifull lookes for some to ease him, than he that is ready to sinke, and be crushed to death, if he doe sinke under his burthen that he beareth? Our sinnes therefore are called a debt, that bindeth us not to a yeares imprisonment, or a longer captivity in this world, but to perpetuall imprisonment, and to the curse of Gods bitter wrath in the fiery Lake for ever, that rouseth out of security with so significant a terme, we might crie with heart, with tongue, and every member of us, till the heavens ring againe; O Lord forgive, forgive, for thy mercy sake our sinne, our trespasses, our debts, so fearfully binding us to so lasting a woe. And for his sake thinke of it, what the world so sporteth her selfe withall many times. These pleasant sinnes, these painted sinnes, these soft sinnes, these joyes and pastimes of a benummed heart. Thinke what sauce this sweet meat will have in the end. Our bodies, our soules, our hands and our feet, and wee wholly are made bound and thrall to the power of cursed Satans malice by them, to doe with us what he list, to boyle us, to burne us, to seethe us, to tread downe and triumph over us in this fiery furnace for ever. And is sinne then nothing? God awake us for his mercies sake, that both this word of debt, and all other meanes may make us not to crie, but shrike in a feeling heart, Lord forgive us our trespasses.

Mat.6.12. Mark.11.25. Luke 11.4. Why our sins be called debts

O thinke of it.

I have heard some make a difference of sinnes greater and lesser. Doe we pray for the forgivenesse of them all in this Petition, or but for some?

You have heard happely of sinnes, some to be veniall, and some to be mortall, and that was Popish, wicked and false. For, the reward of sinne is Death, saith the holy Ghost, not of this sinne or that sinne, but of sinne indefinitely, that is, of all sinne. For indefinite propositions in Divinity are ever taken for generals, unlesse the nature of the thing let, or an instance may bee brought out of the Scripture: The soule that sinneth shall die the death: He doth not say, that sinneth thus or thus, but simply, that sinneth, meaning any sinne. Againe, Whosoever transgresseth the Law is accursed; but whosoever sinneth transgresseth the Law: therefore whosoever sinneth is accursed. Againe, whosoever loveth not God with all his heart, with all his soule, and with all his strength, that man is accursed; but whosoever committeth the least sinne faileth in this love: therfore whosoever committeth the least sinne, is accursed. Upon which ground being the strong truth of evident Scripture, you may turne their folly thus upon them that hold that distinction of sinnes. All sinne deserveth death, for as we have shewed the reward of sinne is death, but veniall

Rom.6.

Ezek.18. Deut.27. 1 Iohn 2.4.

Deut.27. Rom.7. Sinnes veniall and mortall.

veniall sinnes deserve not death; therefore veniall sinnes be no sinnes by a consequence in their doctrine. And thus they say, and unsay againe, by force of falsehood, being not able to stand ever against the truth. I pray you also mark againe how absurd a thing it is to say, that the death of Christ doth satisfie and purge mortall sinnes, which are greater, and not veniall, which are lesse. Is this good doctrine?

Yea sir, but by your favour, they doe not say, that Christs death cannot purge away veniall sinnes, as well as mortall, but that he will not have it so.

You are a good Proctor for them, but such truth, such Prophets. For, I pray you, who can tell us better what he will, than his holy Spirit, than his beloved Disciple that leaned on his brest, guided by that Spirit? And hee, you see your selfe plainly, saith, The blood of Iesus Christ which cleanseth us from all sinne, ab omni, from all. This therefore shall suffice to teach me to give that precious blood his due and full honor, against all wicked detractions and distinctions whatsoever.

Their Popish shifts serveth not.

It may be you have also heard of sinnes, some to be greater, and some to be lesse. This was true and is: For, He that knoweth, and doth not, saith our Saviour, shall be beaten with many stripes. Therefore his sinne is greater, and he that knew not, and yet did things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes: Therefore his sinne is lesse. And againe, Therefore he that delivered me to thee hath the greater sinne. Marke it, the greater sinne, with divers such other places. But be they never so little, you have heard before that they be mortall, for the reward of the least sinne is death: therfore in this petition there is no question, but we pray for their pardon at the Lords hands; and if for the lesser, then for the greater, and so consequently for all. Wherefore your question must bee answered, that whatsoever distinctions you have heard of sinnes, or whatsoever there be, yet for so much as our Saviour Christ here in this place maketh no distinction, but generally biddeth us aske the forgiveneſse of our sinnes: therefore neither doe wee make any, but generally also beseech him to forgive all whatsoever wee are blotted and spotted withal before the piercing power of his heavenly eyes, be they greater, be they lesser: for whatsoever they be, the burden of them is too heavy for us to beare, except he refresh and ease us. And this to doe, his promises most chearfully embolden us, being to the unspeakable comfort of our soules most generall; I will put all his wickednesse out of my remembrance; all, all, whatsoever it is. And as you heard even now, If we acknowledge our sinnes, God is faithfull to forgive us our sinnes, and the blood of Iesus Christ cleanseth us from all sinne; from all sin whatsoever it is, with a number such like promises. Wherefore if it please him to offer all, why should we refuse any, or feare to pray for all? You see we need not, and this knew well the Prophet David, when hee said, Turne thy face from our sinnes, and blot out all our offences: wash me throughly from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sinnes. What is meant there by to wash, but to wath all away? Boldly therefore may we aske what the Lord so lovingly doth offer: and therefore the Lord in mercy forgive us, now and ever, all our trespasses.

Luke 12.47.48

1 Iohn 1.

Psalm. 51.

You shall have all my doubts, because objections cause answers, and answers breed knowledge. I marke therefore in the Scriptures you named, that mention is made onely of our sinnes, as also that in this Petition we are taught to pray for the pardon and remission of them, and neither there nor here is any mention of the punishment of our sinnes to be taken away; and therfore me thinke that distinction of Papists, de pœna & culpa, standeth still unremoved.

You doe well object whatsoever either doth, or may trouble any, so neare as you can remember and see it: for so may you cause the truth more fully to bee laid downe. Concerning then this doctrine of Popery, that God forgiveth sinne, and yet retaineth the punishment to bee inflicted upon them that have sinned: see I pray you a little, how strange, how bad, yea, how blasphemous a doctrine it is against the rich goodnesse of our heavenly God, and the precious merit of the red blood of Jesus Christ. For what is it to forgive sin, but to take it away; and if so, how then can that which is taken away, and now is not, have a punishment? Ejus quod non est, non est pœna, peccatum remissum non est. Ergo peccati remissi non est pœna: That which is not, hath no punishment, but forgiven sinne is not. Therefore fogiven sinne hath no punishment.

Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sinnes of the world.

Again, whosoever requireth the payment of a debt forgiven, is unjust; but whosoever requireth punishment of a sinne forgiven, requireth the payment of a debt forgiven; therefore whosoever doth so, is unjust. I trust they will not say God is unjust, and if they will not, they must never charge him with punishing of any sinne that he hath forgiven.

Thirdly, by the Law of contraries, why followeth not the argument, God when hee doth not forgive sinne, retaineth the punishment, and therefore when he doth forgive, hee doth not retaine it? But see yet further: Hath not the Lord made a covenant with his Church, that he will not remember her sinnes any more? And what is it, not to remember sinne? Let another Prophet tell us, where the Lord saith; If the righteous turne away from his righteousnesse, and commit iniquity, &c. All his righteousnesse that hee hath done shall not be mentioned. And if the wicked returne from all his sinnes, and keep my Statutes, he shall surely live, and all his transgressions that he hath commited, they shall not be mentioned unto him. Looke then in the first place what the Lord meaneth meaneth in the ſecond place, by not mentioning the unrighteouſneſſe or tranſgreſſions. In the former he meaneth, that if a man have done never ſo well a long time, yet if he give over and fall from that well doing, it ſhall never be mentioned or thought upon to have any reward, needs muſt he meane then in the ſecond, that if the ſinner turne from his evill, that greatly and long he hath been drowned in, he ſhall live, and all his former faults ſhall not be mentioned alſo, to wit, to be puniſhed with any puniſhment, but mercy ſhall ſwallow wholly and fully whatſoever hath been amiſſe. For if the not mentioning of the one take away the reward, how ſhall not the mentioning of the other take away puniſhments. Can the Lord ſpeak more comfortably to us to aſſure us of mercy both for fault and puniſhment, than to ſay he will never once make mention of our tranſgreſſions any more? If he ſhould puniſh them either here or in Purgatory, he ſhould not onely make mention of them, but a very ſharpe and bitter mention, if their Purgatory paines be ſo hot as they ſay. Therefore cleave to Ezekiel, or to the Lord rather by Ezekiel, and truely this diſtinction of fault and puniſhment is fled and gone.

Eſay 38.17. Eſay 44.22. Mich.7.19. Pſal.32.1. True comfort againſt that Popiſh diſcomfort, that God forgiveth the fault, but not the puniſhment

Meditate of theſe phraſes often, and let them have their full ſtrength, to declare a truth to us: I will caſt them behinde my backe, I will take away like a cloud, I will drowne in the bottome of the ſea, I will not impute, I will cover and hide; with a number ſuch. And ſhall they not aſſure us, think you, of the pardon as well of all puniſhment, as of all ſinne? Truly they ſhall, and mightily they ſhall, if the Lord give them a bleſſing, againſt all Popiſh Hereſie to the contrary. For if the Lord impute not, he puniſheth not, if hee remember not, hee revengeth not, if hee cover, hee calleth not to judgement, if he caſt behinde his backe, he examineth not, if he take away like a cloud or a miſt, he doth not looke upon them, and if hee drowne in the bottome of the Sea, aſſuredly hee ſcanneth not, hee ſifteth not, hee puniſheth not. This knew Saint Auguſtine full well, and therefore ſtrongly ſetteth his foot to ours to maintaine this truth. Si texit peccata, noluit advertere, ſi noluit advertere, noluit animadvertere, ſi noluit animadvertere, noluit punire, noluit agnoſcere, malnit ignoſcere: If ſaith he, God hath covered our ſinnes, then would hee not ſee them; if not ſee them, then not cenſure them, then not puniſh them; no he would not take notice of them, hee would forgive them. Let us not bee robbed then by any of ſo ſweet a truth.

Yea, but there be many examples to the contrary, as Moſes whoſe ſin though it were pardoned, yet dyed he, and entered not into the Land of Canaan: of David, that both with the childes death and Abſolons wickedneſſe was puniſhed, and of many moe.

Were there ten thouſand of them, yet would they not inferre this Popiſh concluſion which wee ſpeake of, but confirme another diſtinction, which is moſt true in divinitie, namely, that Gods rods upon men ſometimes be puniſhments, ſometimes but chaſtiſements. Puniſhments they be when the Lord is angry, and hath not forgiven the ſinne, chaſtiſements when the Lord is otherwiſe. And therefore this latter beareth ever teſtimony of love in it toward ſuch as indure it, and they welcome it with a great content and comfort, whereas the former they moſt earneſtly and heartily pray againſt. As for example, the Prophet Ieremy when he ſaith: O Lord correct me, but with judgement, not in thy anger, leſt thou bring me to nothing: and the Prophet David in his Pſalme, O Lord rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chaſtiſe me in thy diſpleaſure. The ſame Prophet ſaying of the other, The Lord hath chaſtened me ſore, but he hath not delivered me over to death. And, it is good for me that I have been in trouble, that I may learne thy Statutes. The Wiſe-man alſo ſpeaking of it thus: My ſonne refuſe not the chaſtening of the Lord, neither be grieved with his correction: for the Lord correcteth him whom he loveth, even as the Father doth the childe in whom he delighteth.

Pſa.6.1.& 38.1 118.8. 119.71. Pro.3.11.

This difference of the Lords dealing the Fathers knew very well, and have left it teſtified unto us by their word. Chryſoſtome very plainly, Verberatur filius, verberatur & famulus, ſed hic ut ſervus qui peccavit punitur, ille verò ut liber & filius diſciplina indigens, caſtigatur. Huic correctio in probationem & emendationem cedit, illi in flagella & pœnas: The ſonne and the ſervant, ſaith he, are both beaten, but the ſervant for his offence is puniſhed, and the ſonne as a free-man, and a ſonne needing diſcipline, is but chaſtiſed. To the ſonne it availeth as a tryall and amendment, to the ſervant it is his whip and his puniſhment. More plainly againe yet the ſame Father: Propter hoc imponit nobis pœnam, non de peccatis ſumens ſupplicium, ſed in futuro nos corrigens. For this cauſe doth the Lord inflict upon us ſome puniſhment, not thereby meaning to puniſh any ſinne in us, but to ſchoole us againſt what is to come. Marke how expreſly he ſaith, that the Lords rods are not ever puniſhments of ſinne, but in his choſen, when ſinne is forgiven, chaſtiſements againſt like acts any more. Saint Auguſtine alſo as plainly as hee: Quod pateris unde plagis medicina eſt non pœna, caſtigatio non damnatio. Noli repellere flagellũ, ſi non vis repelli ab hæreditate. Tota hæc miſeria generis humani in qua gemuit mundus, noveritis fratres, quia dolor medicinalis eſt, non ſententia pœnalis: That thou ſuffereſt ſome griefe, it is to thee a medicine, it is not a puniſhment, it is a chaſtiſement, not a condemnation. Doe not caſt from thee thy rod, if thou wilt not be caſt from the inheritance. All this miſery of mankinde wherein the world mourneth, know ye my brethren that it is a griefe medicinall, it is not a ſentence penall.

Gods rods to ſome be puniſhments of their ſinne, to ſome but preſervatives againſt ſinne.

Where-

Wherefore to goe no further in ſo true and plaine a matter, conſider you well the words of the Apoſtle, and meditate of them: When we are judged, ſaith hee, we are chaſtened of the Lord, becauſe we ſhould not be condemned with the world. 1 Cor.11.32.

See then the end of Gods rods upon his children, even to worke in them amendment, and care to avoid all future faults, not ever to puniſh what already he hath forgiven. Other ends alſo and fruits have they, as examples to others alſo to beware, exerciſes of faith, declarers of Gods juſtice and mercy, and hatred of ſinne, with many ſuch like. Divers ends of Gods rods.

What an argument then is this? Moſes dyed according to Gods ſaying, and entered not into the Land of Promiſe; therefore this death was the puniſhment of Moſes his want of faith when he ſtrucke the Rocke, which yet God had forgiven: and ſo the doctrine proved, that though God fogive ſinne, yet he forgiveth not the puniſhment of ſinne. As though that death inflicted upon Moſes in the end, and told him before, had not then to himſelfe whileſt he lived, and to all that people, and hath now to us, and ſhall have to all after us this notable uſe and end, to tell us what a grievous offence it is to weaken the Lords power, to doubt of his ſpeeches, to ſtagger at his Commandements, and what a great and hearty repentance is due, if ſo ever wee fall? So of David, the death of the Child and other accidents, they ſhewed the fulneſſe of the fault, the juſtice of God, and yet a great favour to juſtice, they ſchooled David to repentance great, for ſo great a crime, taught to beware for times to come, and inflicted upon ſo deare an an one as David was, they mightily admoniſh us, not to preſume in hope of impunity to offend the Lord, with many ſuch good uſes. Neither theſe therefore, neither ever any were, or are puniſhed for the ſinne which the Lord hath pardoned, but both theſe were, and all ſhall be chaſtened as the Lord thinketh beſt, if they offend. If this be not too much in ſo knowne a matter, yet I truſt it is enough, and therefore no more of it. Not to preſume in hope of impunity.

Now then proceed if you will, to the words following, As we forgive them that treſpaſſe againſt us. Rom.3.24. Chap.11.6. Gal.6.4.

Some have ſaid that theſe words containe a cauſe of God his remiſſion to us, but this is wicked, for then ſhould not that grace of his be free, as we are plainly taught throughout the whole Scripture. And (which were horrible to affirme) it ſhould not lie in the Lord, but in our ſelves when we would have our ſinnes forgiven. Others ſay, they include a promiſe of our to the Lord, that we will forgive all the world heartily and unfainedly. Tertullian and Cyprian think they expreſſe an injunction and law, whereunto the Lord will have all men bound that looke for mercy at his hands. And ſome thinke they containe a note for us, to be aſſured of our pardon with God, when we finde that it hath pleaſed him ſo to over-rule our hearts with his Spirit and grace, as that we have forgiven others whatſoever they had offended us in or by. Theſe judgements are none of them contrary to piety, and therefore good leave have we to retaine them as we liſt. This onely let us know, that whatſoever wee thinke of it, either as a promiſe made of us to God, or as a law made of him to us, or a teſtimony and comfort to our ſoules, touching our owne pardon with God, it is a clauſe moſt fitly added of our Saviour, and teacheth us what we are better to know, and moſt bound to performe and doe.

For firſt, it cutteth the mouth of a moſt vile faſhion of this curſed world, namely, to ſay wee forgive and forget with all our hearts, ſhaking hands, and promiſing all favour and good uſage after, when in truth we carry it moſt quicke within us, and onely expect a better opportunitie of ſhewing it, when it may pinch indeed. Doe wee looke for ſuch forgiveneſſe at Gods hands, as in this? If we doe not, why doe we uſe our owne mouthes againſt our ſelves, and beſeech the Lord to powre his vengeance upon us, begging of him to forgive us, as wee forgive others; and we forgive others as I have ſaid? Wherefore as in all ſincerity, wee deſire our ſelves to be looked upon with the eyes of grace and mercy from heaven without any fraud, or hollowneſſe, or diſſimulation in the Lord: ſo are we taught by this clauſe, our ſelves to deale with others, ſo truly, ſo honeſtly, ſo heartily, ſo ſincerely and unfainedly forgiving ever, as wee may boldly ſay; So Lord to me, as I to others. Which that we may be able to doe (theſe hearts of ours being ſo ſturdy and ſtrong in their corruption,) let us pray with the careſull ſervant of God and noble King, that we never be of the number of thoſe, which ſpeak friendly to their neighbors, when malice is in their hearts, having words in their mouthes ſmoother than oyle, & yet in truth being very ſwords. And let us remember it often, as a moſt wiſe mans ſaying, nay as the Lords mighty and eternall truth: That he that diſſembleth hatred with lying lips, and he that inventeth ſlander is a foole. Hypocriticall forgiveneſſe. Pſa.28.3. 55.22. Pro.10.18.

Secondly, it condemneth all lame and maimed halting, and halfe remiſſion to our brethren, forgiving ſome truly and willingly, but carrying a piece unforgiven. Wee deſire him to forgive all, and except he doe it, woe to us. For as we have proved before, the leaſt ſinne unpardoned ſtriketh to hell both our bodies and ſoules. Wherefore we alſo muſt needs forgive all to our brethren, or elſe wee cannot pray this prayer: if wee doe, wee moſt fearfully pray againſt our ſelves; and for as much as we reſerve a piece of malice againſt our debtor, we beſeech the Lord to reſerve alſo a part of his wrath againſt us, forgiving us but even as we forgive others, which I ſhake to thinke of, that ever ſo dreadfully our own tongues ſhould crie for the conſuming vengeance Halfe forgiveneſſe.

geance of Almighty God. Consider it therefore even again, and againe, and as sincerely and truly, so fully and wholly let us forgoe all malice against offenders, or offences against us.

Thirdly, it most notably teacheth the necessity of concord and unitie amongst men, as without which wee can never open our mouthes to the Lord, and pray this Prayer, unlesse wee will pray against our selves. For, Vide quod dicas: Quo modo dimitto, sic & tu dimitte mihi. Si dimiseris, bene convenis ut dimittat: si non dimiseris, quo modo eum convenis, ut dimittat tibi? See what thou sayest: even as I forgive, so forgive thou mee: If then thou thy selfe forgive, well doest thou aske to be forgiven; but if not, how dost thou seeke of him to forgive thee?

Ambrose.

Yea sir, but as long as I cannot finde in my heart to forgive my enemie, I will never say the Lords Prayer, but some other good Prayer.

A notable shift sure to deceive your selfe, but not the Lord: For God is not mocked. And therefore know you, that it is not the saying of the prayer that God onely regardeth, but the being in that estate that you may say it: which if you be not, what forme soever you use, you pray against your selfe; your prayer being turned into sinne to you, that you make. And as God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him: so all quite contrary if we be out of love, what words soever wee use. For praying for the pardon of mercy, and shewing no mercie your selfe, you are so farre from dwelling in God, and God in you, as that you offer him a wrong to thinke he will shew mercy to such an one. The Lord hath said it, and the Lord will stand to it: Judgement without mercy shall be to him that sheweth no mercy himselfe to others. And in another place, With what judgement ye judge, ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you againe. Therefore you see this shift is but fearfull against our selves, provoking the Lord further against us. And there is no prayer in any forme whatsoever, that can pierce the heavens, except it proceed from one that forgiveth others, faithfully and truely, as he wisheth himselfe the same with God.

Mat. 6. 14. Saith simply, if we forgive not, we shall not be forgiven: Ergo no shift in the forme.

Iames 2. 13. Mat. 7. 2.

What further thing may we learne by this clause, As we forgive them that trespasse against us.

Cyprian saith, that we may learne by it, that in the day of judgement we shall bee without all excuse. For God may say to us, Nonne tu potuisti ignoscere fratri? si fecisses, & ego tibi remissionem promiseram. Couldest not thou have forgiven thy brother? If thou hadst, then had I also promised thee remission and forgivenesse. Chrysostome saith, we may learne by it, that Nihil Deo hominem tam similem reddit, quam remissio offensarum: Nothing maketh a man more resemble the Lord, than pardoning of offences. And how well it becommeth children to imitate their fathers vertues, judge we all: Muchmore if the same Father very vehemently exhort us to it, and pronounce a blessing upon us for it, &c. Both which we know our heavenly Father doth, saying: Be ye mercifull, as your heavenly Father is mercifull: And, Blessed are the mercifull, for they shall have mercy. We are also in this clause very specially to marke, that the Lord nameth no degrees of persons, as Parents, brethren, friends, kinsfolke, or such like, but simply them that trespasse against us: thereby most fruitfully teaching us, that our forgivenesse may not goe by affection of men, or by any such respects as these degrees might inferre, but in generall to all that have offended us, of what sort soever they be, knowne or unknowne, friends or no friends, rich or poore, and whether they seeke pardon at our hands or no. Remembring with our selves, that there is nothing more incident unto mans nature, than to offend, and nothing more worthy than easily to be entreated to pardon so common a frailty.

Nothing maketh man more like to God, than to forgive trespasses against him.

Socrates, we reade, on a time being spurned at, and abused of a vile person with his feet, put it up quietly, and let it goe; and when divers others abhorring so great indignity to so good a man, would have perswaded him to commence an action against him at the law: hee smilingly asked them, whether if his Asse should smite him with his heeles, he should sue him at the law: Notably teaching thereby even us Christians, himselfe being none, that wee are to passe by many matters of offence against us in this world, with just consideration of the parties offending, how farre they are from either wisedome or honesty. And therefore to seeke to deale with them, were but to spot our selves. Marke it againe in these words, that our Saviour nameth no manner of trespasses, as little ones, or great ones, old ones, or new ones, but speaketh simply. And therefore where God hath not distinguished, wee may not distinguish, but what sort soever they be of, we must forgive them all. Truly a thing that we can never marke enough, we are all so ready to make exceptions, and to say, the matter is so grievous, so prejudiciall to this and to that, and we could forgive many offences before this, and our friends shall entreat us for any thing else, but not for that, with a number of such like speeches, never remembring this which now we note, that God in this prayer maketh no exceptions: and therefore biddeth us most straitly to make none. There is no offence committed against us by man, but God forgiveth us as great committed against him by us: and why then should we not forgive, being so forgiven? If we say, we deserve better, so doth God of us: If wee say wee meant him no harme, no more doth God us: If hee be our inferiour, so are wee the Lords inferiours: If we live not of him, no more doth God by us: If wee have many times forgiven him with warning to doe no more, so hath God to us, and much oftner: so that no cause can we finde to retaine any malice,

A good story for these hasty dayes, wherein every man hasteth so to law for every trifle.

A good note also for these dayes.

Consider this.

if

if wee weigh things well. Wherefore moſt carefully marke it. Laſt of all, here is no number of times noted, and therefore even ſeventy times ſeven times wee muſt forgive, that is, ever, and as often as we are offended: as the Lord forgiveth us times without number. No number of times noted.

Truth is all this, and I confeſſe it; but O hard for fleſh and blood to performe.

So was it to beleeve as hee ought in a powerfull God, but yet what doth he? Lord I beleeve, helpe my unbeliefe. So doe you ſtrive with your ſelfe, fight with frailty hand to hand: forgive as the Lord will enable moſt willingly, and what corruption or imperfection cleaveth in ſo liked an action, pray to the Lord of mercy to daſh it away, and daily to ſtrengthen better to doe what ought ever to be done; and aſſuredly he will, feare not. Mark 9.

And doe not theſe words, thinke you, prejudice any thing Magiſtracy, and the puniſhment of offenders that have treſpaſſed againſt good lawes?

No indeed not a whit: for it is farre from the Lords meaning, in theſe words, to prohibite theeves and murtherers to have their due deſert given them by ſuch men and lawes as are provided in that reſpect. And therefore even the ſame Lord that appointed this forme of prayer, appointed alſo that ſinne ſhould bee taken away by puniſhment, either expreſſed by himſelfe, or left to the Magiſtrate his appointed officer to appoint, according as the circumſtances of times, places, perſons, and facts ſhould require. And touching this moſt lawfull authority of all the places of Scripture that might be brought (which indeed are many) let theſe two ſuffice.

Firſt, that it was ſaid by good Iehoſophat to the Judges, ſo carefully by him appointed, when the Lord had a little awaked him, that they ſhould take heed what they did, becauſe they executed not the judgements of men, but of God: which God, ſaith he, will be with you in the cauſe of judgement. Therefore let this feare be upon you, take heed and doe it; for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, neither reſpect of perſons, nor receiving of reward. Gen. 8. Exod. 18. Deut. 1. 2 Chro. 19.

The ſecond place is out of the Apoſtle to the Romans: where after declaration of this authority to be from heaven, we are in expreſſe words told, that if we doe evill, we have good cauſe to feare; for the Sword is not borne for nought, but the Magiſtrate is the Miniſter of God to take vengeance on him that doth evill. Rom. 13. 3, 4.

Moſt plaine therefore you ſee, that forgiving our brother his treſpaſſes, taketh not away any publike or private puniſhment, either of magiſtrate, or parent, or maſter, that by law both of God and man ſhall be due. For the ſame God that biddeth the one, commandeth alſo the other, and hee never overthroweth his owne commandements one with another, as one contrary to himſelfe, but they ſtand together.

May then a Chriſtian proſecute by law before a Magiſtrate a wrong done unto him, and ſeeke the puniſhment of it?

You ſee by that which hath been ſaid, he may. For how can the authority of Kings and Princes, Judges and magiſtrates, be good and from God, and the uſe of that government and power, by us or any that are abuſed be ever evill? Surely if they may puniſh, they may alſo be complained unto and deſired to puniſh. Nay, if diſtreſſed, wee uſe not the ordinance of God for our helpe, we tempt God, and we doe not well. The Apoſtle Paul diſtreſſed, ſent a meſſenger to the chiefe Captaine to open unto him the Jewes conſpiracy againſt him, that by his good helpe his life might bee ſafe. And afterward diſtreſſed againe, hee appealed from a corrupt bench to Ceſar, in hope of more juſtice. Yet was Ceſar alſo an Infidell; thereby notably teaching us, that if of two evill Conſiſtories, it might be lawfull to chooſe the leſſer evill, then more lawfull is it to uſe the helpe of a good one, I meane of magiſtrates that feare God and maintaine true Religion, and proceed according to Chriſtian lawes. But yet herein take mee with you, and runne not away, as a man that had got what a troubleſome nature deſired. You muſt therefore know alſo how you may uſe the magiſtrate and the benefit of law, for ſo much as all uſe is not lawfull. How a man may go to law.

Firſt then, it is a good mans duty to try all meanes before this, even as wee doe before wee proclaime open warres againſt any, I meane the helpe of brethren and neighbours at home to arbitrate betwixt us, and ſuch like, and if it will not bee reformed, but that wee muſt needs uſe the publike magiſtrate, then let us beware that wee diſtruſt not God, and put our hope in them, for he is worthily of the Lord accurſed, that truſteth in men, and maketh fleſh his arme. Let us retaine love with that perſon unfained, whom wee deale againſt, and account him not preſently, as moſt men doe, an enemy, and ſuch a one as wee may not ſalute, nor eate or drinke, or come in company withall. For theſe heads the Lord abhorreth, and we were better loſe the matter we ſue for ever, than make ſhipwracke of love and lenity, of curteſie and humanity, and ſuch other vertues as adorne a Chriſtian. Wee muſt not alſo be contentious and quarrellous for every occaſion, running to this courſe. For it is neither tolerable in our ſelves, nor convenient for our Governours. that with every matter they ſhould bee hindered from weighty matters. Nay even in ſuch our cauſes, as have ſome moment in them, wee muſt yet coole our heate, to proſecute them often with true and due conſideration of mans frailty, as even of our owne frailty, who may as well offend the law as others, by treſpaſſing ſome way our Deut. 27.

neighbours, and yet would be loath that extremity ſhould bee ſhewed. Saint Auguſtine ſaith, Accuſandi ardorem hoc modo frangi: That the heat and haſt to accuſe is broken and ſtayed, by this good conſideration with our ſelves of mans weakneſſe. And you ſee that our Saviour Chriſt cooled thoſe haſty accuſers, when hee bad him that was without fault, throw the firſt ſtone at her. Iohn 8.

Conſider alſo muſt every good man ſomewhat, the delay that is often in law, ſometimes by juſt occaſion of the matter, becauſe it is intricate, and ſo wrapped in ſubtilties of man, as nothing well may diſcover, as time and leaſure of proceeding, which indeed many times openeth what no wiſedome ſoever could ſee; ſometimes by covetouſneſſe and unfaithfulneſſe of Lawyers, Judges, or Officers: and ſeeing that theſe delaies are moſt chargeable, both to the one party and other, therefore they muſt moderate us many times, and cauſe us to ſpare our poore neighbour, though happily it be to our loſſe, leſt wee thus utterly undoe him and all his, he being obſtinate and crooked, that he will not give over whileſt he hath to ſpend. For this feeling heart of another mans harme, this love and lenity, this tender compaſſion and care for them that have not grace to care for themſelves, is precious before the Lord. And hee often rewardeth loſſe in this reſpect ſuſtained, with better meaſure than law would have given either coſts or damages. Rare charity now adaies.

Finally, forget not alſo many times to reaſon with your ſelfe thus, I ſee the fatherleſſe and widow many times oppreſſed for want of helpe, and weakneſſe go to the wall for want of countenance, yea, I ſee ſinne borne out, and vertue borne downe many times, to the great diſhonour of God, and offence of his Church, and I am not touched thereat, or at leaſt I ſpend not a peny, neither a daies travell to helpe therein, but now that my ſelfe am touched, and my tranſitory ſubſtance endangered, I am ready to goe to law, and to ſpend much; ſure this may I doe, but that other ſhould I not leave undone. Yet how am I more forward for riches than for vertue, for every cauſe of mine owne, than for any of my neighbours? Thus I ſay, to reaſon with your ſelfe is moſt profitable, and will greatly direct a good mind in this matter we ſpeake of, namely, how he may uſe law. Now then I truſt you ſee a bridle put in our mouthes from haſting to law, as we doe for every occaſion, troubling our ſelves and whole countries with the unquietneſſe of our natures, and ungodlineſſe of our hearts. Theſe conditions and ſuch other obſerved, let us know our liberty to uſe the Lords good ordinance for the maintenance of peace and right, and for the due puniſhment of oppugners of either of them, or of them both. But let us not abuſe to our owne revenge, what to thoſe ends in Gods mercy to man is ſo graciouſly ordained.

God make this coole the unregenerate humors of a number, and I thank you for it. Now, to proceed, I pray you how may we be ſaid to forgive to our brethren their treſpaſſes, ſeeing none forgiveth ſin, but God onely.

You muſt conſider that in ſinne there be two things: firſt, the evill of the action; and ſecondly, the detriment that ariſeth to man. The evill of the action, is that impurity and fooliſhneſſe wherewith the Law of God, againſt which it is contrary, chargeth it. And this concerneth the Lord, becauſe being by him prohibited, the committing of it, is alſo againſt him. This properly is ſin, and the remiſſion of it only is in the Lord himſelfe. No man is able to do it. But the ſecond, which is the detriment, or hurt that ariſeth by that treſpaſſe to a man, either in fame, in body, or goods, as it is againſt man, ſo man may remit and pardon it, without any impeachment of the Lords glory. Thus therefore doe we forgive treſpaſſes, when we forgive the harme that hath ariſen to us by them, together with all conceived anger, ſwelling, indignation, and wrath for the ſame. The Lords forgiveneſſe is a raſing out of the ſinne it ſelfe, I meane a full remiſſion of the tranſgreſſion of his Law, by any treſpaſſe whatſoever. Let that man of ſinne therefore looke about him, and all his adherents well conſider it, how their pardons may runne with remiſſion both à pœna & culpa, from puniſhment and guilt. They are in theſe daies of light, when the Lords mercy hath made the Sunne of underſtanding ſhine upon his Church, and the day Starre ariſe in his childrens hearts, compelled to excuſe their Pope, by affirming that he remitteth but only the puniſhment, which by law is due to ſuch offence, and medleth not with the ſin, as it concerneth God. But let them looke if they ſay true, when his pardons be extant in this forme that I have named, releaſing for mony, both pœnam, the puniſhment, and culpam, the fault. I wis they will ſee it, if the Lord be ſo gracious to them, a pride prophecied as a note of Antichriſt. And never did the Jewes more wrongfully miſlike our Saviour, being God as well as Man; then we may very rightly abhorre this Monſter, being onely man, and a moſt miſerable man in many reſpects, for that he preſumeth to forgive ſins, which none can forgive but God alone. For, it is I, it is I, ſaith the Lord, that put away iniquity, and forgive ſinnes. And, the Lord hath done away thy ſinne, ſaith Nathan to David, not I, nor any man. And this might wee learne even by this forme of Prayer, if there were no other Scripture. For unto whom doth the Lord teach us to ſay, Forgive us our treſpaſſes, but onely to God? Surely if any man or woman, Saint or Angel, could forgive us, then were it, and ſhould be lawfull for us to pray to them to forgive us, and ſo to change this Prayer from Pater to Mater, or Frater, from Our Father, to our Mother, our Brother, to holy Peter, holy Paul, or ſuch like. But how ſpend I words in a plaine matter? It is enough.

Man doth not forgive the evill or vice of the action, but the detriment ariſing by it to man.

The Popes pardons, à pœna & culpa, blaſphemous.

Eſay 43.23.

Are

Are all men and women to pray this Prayer, or but onely ſome?

Surely you remember me of that which is worthy noting, as well as any thing that hath been ſaid, namely, how our Saviour Chriſt hath ſaid unto all the world, that there is juſt cauſe to acknowledge themſelves ſinners, and to pray for the pardon of their ſinnes. For whoſoever have need to begge any thing at God his hands, thus he teacheth them to pray, but the whole world ſtandeth in need to beg at Gods hand, all the whole world therefore muſt pray thus, Both Iewes and Gentiles, ſaith the Apoſtle, are under ſinne, as it is written; There is none righteous, no not one that underſtandeth, there is none that ſeeketh God. They have all gone out of the way, they have been made altogether unprofitable: there is none that doth good, no not one. Their throat is an open ſepulchre, they have uſed their tongues to deceit, the poyſon of Aſpes is under their lips. Whoſe mouth is full of curſing and bitterneſſe, their feet are ſwift to ſhed blood. Deſtruction and calamities are in their wayes, and the way of peace have they not known, the feare of God is not before their eyes. Againe in the ſame Chapter, All have ſinned, and are deprived of the glory of God. And to the Galatians, The Scripture hath concluded all under ſinne. And if any man ſay he hath no ſinne, he deceiveth himſelfe, and there is no truth in him. With a number ſuch like places. Enter not into judgement with thy ſervant, O Lord, ſaith the Prophet David, for no fleſh ſhall be juſtified in thy ſight.

Rom. 3. 9. Aug. de natura & gratia.

Verſe 2, 3. Gal. 3. 22.

Wherefore it is not for modeſty that we muſt pray to the Lord to forgive our ſinnes, as moſt wickedly the Pelagians affirmed, but for conſcience and truth, and as Hierome ſaith, Ex humanæ fragilitatis, & noſtræ miſeriæ conſcientia: Upon true feeling and feare of mans frailty and miſery, and the judgements of God due to it. For a prayer conceived for modeſty onely, ſhould be a lie and a fained humility. And as S. Auguſtine pretily ſpeaketh, Humilitas ſtatuta in parte falſitatis, perderet præmium veritatis: Falſe humility ſhould loſe the bleſſing that truth ſhould have. Non ergo debemus ſic laudare creatorem, ut cogamur dicere, immo vero convincamur dicere perfluum ſalvatorem: We muſt not ſo praiſe our Creator, as we be compelled, yea, convinced to ſay, that ſuperfluous is a Saviour. And againe, Quia nos creavit, ita ſimus grati, ut non ſimus quia ſanat ingrati. Let us ſo bee thankfull to the Lord for creating us, as wee bee not unthankfull to him for healing us. With many ſuch like ſentences, noting our too true corruption, and their moſt high pride, that thinke they have attained to ſuch holineſſe, as that they need not ſay, Remitte nobis debita noſtra: Forgive us O Lord our treſpaſſes. Is there any man now adayes better than the Diſciples? Yet the Lord teacheth them wee ſee to pray this Prayer. And ſurely as our garments, though daily bruſhed, yet daily and ſtill need bruſhing againe, becauſe ever when they are bruſhed, new duſt and fouleneſſe lighteth upon them: even ſo our ſoules and bodies, though many times altered by a gracious pardon from God in Chriſt, yet daily and ſtill ſo gathering duſt againe, as daily and ſtill they need to be cleared. And therefore ever muſt all men pray this prayer.

The error of the Pelagians.

Furthermore even here alſo have the Novatian Heretiks a plaine fall with their moſt uncomfortable aſſertion or hereſie, thinking and avouching that there is no pardon for any, that after he is baptized committeth any publike ſinne. For doth our Saviour here make any diſtinction of publike or private offences, of men baptized or unbaptized, of times before or after. No, no, to our great comfort hee doth not as hath before beene ſhewed, but all men hee biddeth pray thus, at all times he biddeth pray thus, and for all offences he biddeth pray thus indefinitely. And except wee ſhall make a mocker of the Lord, what hee biddeth aske, hee is ready to give, and a ſure comfort by his commandement to pray, may be drawne to my ſoule that I ſhall obtaine. And therefore little children theſe things I write, that yee ſinne not. But if any man doe ſinne, wee have an Advocate with the Father, Jeſus Chriſt the righteous, and hee is the Propitiation for our ſinnes, and not for ours onely, but alſo for the ſinnes of the whole world. Yea, let us adde to his words, but not to his meaning, for ſinnes both before and after Baptiſme.

Catha. &c. Anabap. Some in the Scripture are called juſt and upright: but this is to be underſtood before God: or as Auguſtine ſaith, affectu, non effectu; by deſire, not by deed.

Sinne after Baptiſme pardoned.

Now doe you put me in mind of a queſtion which I only alſo will ask you: namely, what comfort there is for a fraile creature, that after repentance and purpoſe never to offend ſo any more, yet ſhall fall againe, even into the ſame fault, of frailty, not of malice.

Surely you name a very notable teſtimony of our moſt vile corruption, that ſolemnly profeſſing our repentance for any bad behaviour, and vowing to the Lord, and with our ſelves that no more we will doe ſo, yet contrary both to promiſe and purpoſe we fall againe into the ſelfeſame offence and ſinne. And if the Lord ſhould never receive us againe after ſuch a tranſgreſſion, we had but what juſtly and greatly we deſerved. Yet is this mercy more, not to imbolden to ſo great impiety, but to comfort grieved ones with ſo great frailty. Wherefore with deſire to ſtand, and all poſſible endevour againſt ſuch ſecond falls, let us heare yet what the Lord ſaith, if in our great weakeneſſe we doe fall, I meane into the ſame offence againe after repentance. Firſt, wee ſee the Prophets in every place exhort men to repentance, not which had once offended, but which with an obſtinate contempt of God had not ſtayed to runne into all kinde of wickedneſſe, and which after a ſhew of repentance yet returned to their ſinfull courſe againe, the Prophet Ieremy of all other is full of places, if you liſt to reade any. Againe, the Lord in his Law would have daily ſacrifices offred ſometime in the name of the whole people, ſometimes in the name of a private perſon, as well for offences committed by ignorance, as for voluntary tranſgreſſions and falls, which aſſuredly ſhould not have beene done, except there had beene mercy even for ſecond faults. For the Lord would not deceive his people with vaine figures.

Pſal. 78. Thirdly, in the Pſalme we very plainly ſee, that God was intreated to forgive moſt hypocriticall and obſtinate ſinnes. And now in the time of his Goſpell his goodneſſe is not ſtraited or diminiſhed, but even now alſo more plainly it is proclaimed to the world, that at what time ſoever a ſinner ſorroweth from his heart, there is pardon with the Lord, without exception againſt often committing of the ſame offence. When the Lord enjoyneth us to forgive our brethren ſeventy times ſeven times, doth he meane new offences onely, ſuch as they never committed againſt us before, or he meaneth all, whatſoever, or how often ſoever fallen into by their frailty? And if ſo, doth he require more mercy of man, than he the God of mercy will ſhew? Or ſhall the creature excell the Creator in any goodneſſe? God forbid. See it therefore, and bee with comfort moſt aſſured of it, that if we ſinne not ſeven times, but ſeventy times ſeven times againſt his Majeſty, and even in the ſame thing; and ſo often with weeping eyes and ſobbing ſoule fall at his feet for mercy to ſo great frailty, there is mercy with him, and pardon to true repentance. But take heed wee turne not the grace of God into wantonneſſe and preſumption. For if I ſucke the liberty out of this doctrine, bee ſure, I ſavour it to death, and not to life, and what know I whether ever I ſhall have grace truely to repent, what ſo boldly and preſumptuouſly I have dared to commit. When the Apoſtle ſaith, If any man ſinne, we have an Advocate with the Father Ieſus Chriſt the righteous, and hee is the propitiation for our ſinnes: Doe you thinke we may tie this onely to ſuch ſinnes as were never committed before, without a very plaine and great injury to that place of Scripture? No, no, wee cannot, and therefore a true ground of comfort even for ſinnes often fallen into, ſo that frailty and not looſeneſſe bee the cauſe. And reade the ninth Chapter of Daniel, and the ſixt verſe, and ſee if he confeſſe not ſin often committed, and as it were in a continued courſe, and yet deſpaireth not of mercy? What meaneth that Article of our faith, I beleeve the forgiveneſſe of ſinnes? Shall we gloſſe upon it thus, that it is of ſuch ſinnes as I never committed but once? Surely if wee doe, it muſt be ſaid, Curſed be the gloſſe that corrupteth the text. For that Article compriſeth all ſinne, before Baptiſme, and after Baptiſme, before repentance and after repentance, even through the courſe of my life in this world, whatſoever it is, how often ſoever it is, how often ſoever I have ſlided into it through frailty, yet God giving mee true repentance for it, Credo remiſſionem, I beleeve the forgiveneſſe of it. Yea, it is the comfort ſpirituall, that cannot be ſpoken of, that God would have his children ſo ſure of the pardon of their ſinnes, even of all their ſinnes, without exception, whereof he giveth them a diſlike and true abhorring, as that he would have it an Article of their faith, ſo that they ſhould not be found Chriſtians if they beleeved it not.

Laſtly, even this Petition of the Lords Prayer, craving daily forgiveneſſe of daily treſpaſſes, dare you reſtraine it to treſpaſſes committed onely before repentance, and exempt all ſecond fals after ſuch repentance and purpoſe to amend? The Lord forbid. And therefore take it alſo with the former, as a ſure proofe of pardon alſo for theſe offences. So doe you ſee what anſwer your queſtion hath out of Gods Booke, onely therefore beware preſumption, beware looſeneſſe, beware negligence, and due care to avoid theſe ſecond falls, ſay not God is merciſull, and therefore I will ſinne. For as hee is gracious to a ſorrowfull ſinner, ſo is hee dreadfull to a preſumptuous offender, and frailty ſhall finde mercy, when boldneſſe ſhall finde judgement and wrath for ever.

Surely I ſee it is a great comfort to a Chriſtian conſcience, that the Lord hath put into our daily Prayer this Petition, and it mightily aſſureth us of his mercy.

Indeed it is ſo, but yet this appeareth nothing ſo much as it would, if our eyes ſaw, or our hearts felt, what loathſomeneſs lodgeth in us, and what juſt matter of eternall confuſion we have both in body and ſoule, if mercy were not. For this is it that giveth a feeling of the ſweetneſſe of this Prayer, when the Lord ſhall grant us a true ſight of our owne eſtate, and piercing eyes into our inward deeps: when the Lord ſhall enable us truely to ſee what a maſſe of corruption we are, how vile, how miſerable, how polluted in our thoughts, works and deeds, in body and ſoule, in heart and minde, within and without, and all over, how filthy, how loathſome, and abominable we are; and when hee ſhall joine unto this ſight a terrour and a trembling, at the true view of Gods moſt fearefull judgement due unto this eſtate, and moſt firmely tied unto it, even as God is juſt. And I ſay when the Lord granteth it, for moſt aſſuredly we have it not of our ſelves, nay we flatter and deceive every man his owne heart in this point, we thinke all is well with us, and we know not our ſelves. But what are we? O my beloved, my heart underſtandeth not the ſinnes of man, and therefore my tongue cannot lay them open before you. I ſay with David, my owne ſinnes are ſecret to me, and therefore much more all your ſinnes, and moſt of all the ſinnes of all mankinde. Yet ſomewhat heare you of the meditation of my heart, to the better opening of the neceſſity and goodneſſe of this Petition, and learne by this little to thinke of more, and to wade your ſelves into the deepes that you know, and I know not, when I have led you the way as farre as I doe know.

I have before in this Petition ſhewed you how the Herald of heaven blazeth our armes, and expreſſeth our colours, namely, that we are all become abominable, and there is none that doth good, no not one. That no fleſh living is able to bee juſtified in his ſight; that none can ſay, my heart is cleane, I am pure from ſinne. That the very imaginations of our hearts are evill, even from our youth; that wee are not able to thinke a good thought of our ſelves; with a number ſuch. All which places are not ſo to bee taken, as if they charged any of us with a little evill, or few ſinnes, and ſmall, but they convince us of huge and great ſinne, and of generall corruption, even in our waies, which will very well appeare, if alike we compare our ſelves with the Lords choice children commended to us in the word. Stand before me then I pray thee, whoſe heart quaketh not for any ſinne you know in your ſelves, and tell me whether you dare, either with your tongues ſay, or with your hearts thinke, that you are in as great a meaſure ſanctified as David was? If you dare not, conſider well then what David notwithſtanding his great graces given him, ſaith of himſelfe in his Pſalmes, There is no reſt in my bones becauſe of my ſinne: for mine iniquity is gone over mine head, and as a weighty burthen, they are too heavy for mee to beare. Had David no reſt in his bones for his ſinne, and have you reſt in your ſelfe, and yet dare not compare with him in ſanctification? How commeth this to paſſe, but becauſe you neither ſee nor feele what is in your ſelfe as he did? Innumerable troubles, ſaith hee againe, have compaſſed mee about, my ſinnes have taken ſuch hold on me, that I am not able to looke up, yea, they are moe in number than the haires of my head, and my heart hath failed mee. O the dulneſſe of our feeling, how ſhould I lay it before us better than by ſuch examples? If Davids ſinnes were moe than his haires, how many are ours thinke you? Surely moe than the ſand of the Sea: if they had taken hold on him, what have ours done on us? If he could not for them looke up, how may we look downe? And finally, if his heart began to ſhake, how Lord may ours both ſhake and quake, if we knew our ſelves? Judge even your ſelfe any one that is here, if it be not ſo, ſeeing you grant me you dare not compare with David. Wounded then are we even to many deaths, and yet we know it not.

Pſal. 40. 12

Ponder it with your ſelfe alſo, what that great ſervant of God, Ezra, ſaith of himſelfe in this caſe: O my God, ſaith he, I am confounded and aſhamed to lift up mine eyes unto thee my God, for our iniquities are increaſed over our head, and our treſpaſſes are growne up to the heaven, and we cannot ſtand before thee, becauſe of our ſinne. And Daniel againe, We have ſinned: wee have committed iniquity: we have done wickedly, yea, we have rebelled againſt thee, and departed from thy precepts. See how no words can content him to expreſſe his guilt withall. Therefore, I ſay, when the Scripture chargeth us with ſinne, it is no ſmall ſinne that we muſt dreame of, but monſtrous corruption and horrible before the Lord, if wee could ſee it all. Yet doth every one deceive his owne heart, and being in this moſt dreadfull and deſperate caſe, feeleth it not, but thinketh all is well, till even the laſt houre overtake us, and then Satan chargeth us to the full, and wee deſpaire. But truely if we learne to charge our ſelves now in the time of health, our burthen ſhall not be ſo great in the time of ſickneſſe: And therefore, I pray you doe it, either by many times comparing your lives with theſe great Saints of God, or by viewing the Commandements, or by any meanes whatſoever, that may be good and profitable to this effect. And thinke with your ſelves, that if theſe choſen veſſells, notwithſtanding ſo great graces given them, yet groaned under ſuch weight of deadly ſinnes: alas what may we doe, that want many thouſand degrees of their goodneſſe, ſave only that we feele not, through a deadneſſe of heart, the burthen of iniquity that is upon us. By their feeling then, judge what you ought to feele: by their confeſſions, what you ſhould confeſſe, and by their ſhivering feares, what you may many millions of times more juſtly feare.

Ezra 9. 6.

Thinke alſo of the puniſhment temporall, and of the death eternall, in that flaming Lake of dreadfull woe, due and aſſured to all ſinfull creatures for evermore, And ſee then, if it bee not ſweet to heare of remiſſion of all this evill. See if this Petition be not thrice needfull to conſciences crying, our load is great. O deareſt God, that would bid us aske, teach us, and tell us, yea, will and command us every day and houre, to pray for pardon for iniquity. For thus doe wee ſee thy willingneſſe to give, never uſing to bid us aske, but what thou art ready to grant even before we aske.

Dei dicere eſt facere.

Thus doe wee ſee our pardon is ready, and though worthy we be never once to feele any inward joy, or outward comfort, yet in thy mercy we ſhall finde both, by thy gracious forgiveneſſe of our ſinnes. And Lord of mercy make us thankfull.

The Prayer.

O Lord and Father, ſweet and mercifull, we fall down in our hearts here before thy Majeſty, and beg mercy. For we have ſinned, O Lord, wee have ſinned and done wickedly, and our conſcience crieth, thy wrath is due, if we find not mercy. Our thoughts, our words and works have been againſt thy bleſſed will and commandement, and ſtill, ſtill our moſt grievous corruption pulleth us from thy wayes. Wee may be aſhamed and confounded to lift up our eyes to thee, ſo encreaſed over our heads are our iniquities, and our ſinnes ſo growne up even to the heavens. But with thee there is mercy, and therefore thou ſhalt be feared. O Lord in that mercy lift up the light of thy countenance upon us, and ſave us. Let that precious blood of Jeſus Chriſt daſh and waſh out all our offences, for wee flie unto it, and with the armes of our faith claſping faſt that deare Saviour, we ſet him before thee as our atonement, peace, and propitiation for ever availeable with thee. For his ſake, not for ours, O Lord heare, O Lord forgive, O Lord conſider, and doe it, defer not for thy mercie ſake. Comfort our conſciences with that ſweet and dropping dew of mercy and grace, for they ſhake and tremble at thy judgements. Strengthen our ſteps hereafter for Jeſus Chriſts ſake more and more, that they may be ſtreighter, and we poſſeſſe theſe veſſels of ours in more cleanneſſe, holineſſe and righteouſneſſe, than we have done. And for as much as it is all repugnant and contrary to our ſinfull nature and rebelling blood, to forgive other men their treſpaſſes committed againſt us, without revenge, and to love them that hate us, to pray for them that perſecute us, as thou haſt willed; deare Father, wee beſeech thee to helpe us therein, and by thy working power within us, make our hearts ſo meeke and gentle, that wee may gladly and unfainedly, heartily and wholly forgive all men, that have hated or hurted us by word or deed, and that wee may behave our ſelves unto all men, friends and foes, with ſuch mercy, gentleneſſe, and kindneſſe, as wee would deſire, not onely that they, but alſo that thou, good Lord, ſhouldeſt uſe unto us. Finally, deare Father, in life have mercy, in death have mercy, and evermore have mercy upon us, in that bleſſed kingdome of thine, for Jeſus Chriſt his ſake our bleſſed Lord and Saviour. Amen.

The ſixt and laſt PETITION.

Leade us not into temptation, &c.

Wee draw now neere an end of this labour, and are come to the laſt requeſt in this Prayer, wherein proceeding as you have done in the former, I pray you firſt ſhew the order of it.

THe order is marvellous fit, that wee having in a ſtinging woe for them, begged of the Lord our God moſt heartily and earneſtly, the forgiveneſſe of all our ſinnes and treſpaſſes already paſt and done, wee ſhould next as obedient children, bee carefull, not againe to grieve ſo deare and good a Father, beſeeching him for his mercies ſake, to aide and ſtrengthen us againſt that which is to come, that wee may not offend and fault as wee have done, but by an happy new birth and Spirit of power, vouchſafed from his heavenly grace unto us, bee able to fight againſt all ſinfull corruption daily and ever vexing us more and more. For in this order ſpeaketh the Lord ſtill, ſtill in his word, that if we be made whole wee ſhould ſinne no more. That if the grace of God, that bringeth ſalvation unto all men, hath appeared, wee ſhould thereby learne to deny ungodlineſſe and worldly luſts, and that wee ſhould live ſoberly and righteouſly, and godly in this preſent world. And in this order reaſoneth even the Spouſe her ſelfe, I have waſhed my feet, and therefore how ſhould I foule them againe? Wherefore, I ſay, as concerning order, after pardon begged for paſſed ſinne, moſt fitly doe wee next the power of his grace againſt what is to come.

Iohn 5.14. Iohn 8.11. Titus 2.11,12. Cant.5.3.

Surely

Surely it is not onely fit in regard of order, but moſt neceſſary alſo in reſpect of the thing.

Indeed it is, and that for theſe cauſes: firſt, in reſpect of our owne corruption and vileneſſe, of whom the Spirit of God hath ſaid by Iob, that man is abominable and filthy, drinking iniquity like water, that is, even ſo deſiring to ſin, as he that is thirſty to drinke. Iob.15.16.

Secondly, in reſpect of the infinite allurements and delights that ſinne hath to pull us on to it from God, which we are ſo farre from repulſing and gainſtanding, that we readily and moſt willingly yeeld to them, except the Lord aſſiſt us, and inable us by his Spirit. Yet are thoſe delicates our death both in body and ſoule for ever, if we follow them. For it is true of all men which the Apoſtle ſpeaketh of the widow, that ſhee living in pleaſure is dead whileſt ſhe liveth ſo. And againe, If yee live after the fleſh, yee ſhall die. Of theſe allurements and delights in ſinne ſpake the holy Ghoſt when he called them the pleaſures of ſin. And David when he ſaid, Incline not my heart to evill, that I ſhould commit wicked workes with men that worke iniquity, and let me not eate of their delicates. There is alſo a ſubtilty in ſinne to deceive us, a deceitfulneſſe in riches to choake us, and therefore moſt needfull is this prayer, that we be not hindered through the deceitfulneſſe of ſinne. 1 Tim.5.6. Heb.11.25. Pſal.141.4. Mat.13.22. Cant.2.15. Heb.3.13. Epheſ.6.12.

Thirdly, in reſpect of the power of the enemy which is very great. For we wreſtle not againſt fleſh and blood, but againſt principalities and powers, and againſt worldly governours, the Princes of darkneſſe of this world, againſt ſpirituall wickedneſſe, which are in the high places, and which farre exceed us in ſtrength, and therefore great need have we to beſeech the Lord to ſtand with us, in this battaile to helpe us: Which we doe in this Petition. For Quicquid humana fragilitas cavere aut vetare non prævalet, hic à nobis ab illo propitio conferri petimus. Whatſoever (ſaith Auguſtine) mans frailty is not able to take heed of or avoid, that doe we beſeech the Lord here may be given us in his mercy. Aug.Ser.135.

Laſtly, the diligence and endeavour of our adverſary to winne, and his cruelty if hee doe winne, is ſo great, that we have neede and neede againe to uſe this Petition: Bee ſober and watch (ſaith the Apoſtle) for our adverſary the Devill goeth about like a roaring Lyon, ſeeking whom he may devoure. His continuall walking ſheweth his diligence, and his bloody devouring noteth his cruelty. 1 Pet.5.8.

Thus have wee the equity of this prayer, yea, the neceſſity of it ever, whileſt wee live in this wretched vale of theſe aſſaults and dangers. In reſpect of which neceſſity, no doubt both our Saviour firſt taught it, and alſo in his word ſo often repeateth it; Watch yee, and pray yee, that yee enter not into temptation. The Spirit indeed is willing, but the fleſh is fraile. With ſuch like places. And very truly ſaith Hierom, Non eſt noſtrarum virium cum hoſtibus noſtris ſpiritualibus congredi. & eos vincere, ſed Dei. It is not our ſtrength that may joyne with our ſpirituall foes, and overcome them, but the Lord muſt do it. Mar.14.38. 1 Theſ.3.5. 2 Tim.6.9. 1 Cor.10.13.

Is all this but one Petition?

They that make ſeven petitions in the Lords Prayer, doe divide this laſt in two, to make up the number, of which ſort is Thomas of Aquine, Lyra, and others. But the better judgement is theirs that make but ſixe Petitions in all, and but one of this. Of which ſort againe are Auguſtine and Cyprian, who make this latter, as indeed it is, but an expoſition of the forme, as if he ſhould have ſaid, to that end that wee may be delivered from evill, O Lord lead us not into temptation. And this whole laſt Petition may fitly be divided thus, into the Petition it ſelfe, Ne nos inducas in tentationem, and into the expoſition or interpretation of the ſame, ſed libera nos à malo.

But men do not agree in reading this Petition, For ſome ſay, Lead us not, and others ſay, let us not bee led.

Indeed it is true. Some are afraid, and have beene, that if they ſhould ſay, Lead us not into temptation, they ſhould fall into that foule error of the Manichees, that God might be the author of evill. And therefore to avoid that, they have thought rather good to ſay, Let us not bee led. But both the beſt and ancienteſt tranſlation and reading is the firſt, and ſo tranſlated and read it many a yeere agoe Tertullian and others of the elder Fathers.

And doth not, thinke you, that reading give ſome advantage to the enemy, that we make God the author of ſinne?

Not a whit juſtly. For as you have heard before in this booke, it is one thing to bee the author of a matter, and another thing to bee the author of the forme: in plainer termes, to bee the author of an action, and of the evill in the action, or of the action. When the Apoſtle ſaith, In him we live, we move, and have our being: what meaneth he, but that God is author of all our actions in reſpect of the matter, as wee ſpeake, that is, the motion, power, and ſtrength of body, to go hither or thither, and to do this or that, is of God: for without his helpe we could not ſtirre: but as for forme if it be evill, that is, as for the corruption, fault of evill of our actions, that is of our ſelves, and not of God as author and worker, though even of that alſo hee is the guider and governour, that it ſhall not paſſe the limits that he liketh. As in Ioſephs brethren, and many other examples are plaine. Wherefore wee may not for want of true under- Acts 17.28.

ſtanding how to take them, alter the phraſes, and conſequently the truth of God. You ſee how the Spirit ſpeaketh: God hardned the heart of Pharaoh: God gave them up to vile affections, and delivered them up into a reprobate minde. The Lord mingled among them the ſpirit of error: God ſhall ſend them ſtrong deluſions: and a number ſuch. Hee doth not ſay, God ſuffered Pharaohs heart to be hardened, God ſuffered them to bee given to vile affections, or to a reprobate mind, &c. But God hardened, and gave, and delivered, and mingled, and ſent. Theſe are all as much as to ſay, Leade us not into temptation. And therefore if theſe may bee uſed without making the Lord any author of evill, then may this Petition alſo no doubt in this order, and if in theſe places wee need not to change the Text and to ſay, God let Pharaoh be hardened, or God let them be given over, &c. No more neede wee here to tranſlate or interprete this Petition thus; Let us not be led into temptation. But to remember even that though the Lord doe, and bee ſaid to lead into temptation, yet is there never any evill in him, but either juſtice to ſome to puniſh ſinne with ſinne, or mercie to others to trie them and exerciſe them, that after they have ſhewed patience, and faith, obedience, humility, love and comfort in their tryals, hee may ſet a Crowne of great glory upon their heads, to their everlaſting life in a glorious kingdome. And in the meane time by thoſe their vertues glorifie his name amongſt men here, and incite others to tread the ſteps of ſo happy a courſe. So that what the Lord doth, is ever good: and for further treatiſe of this thing, turne backe againe to that which hath beene ſaid before.

If God ſuffer then doth he it either againſt his will, or with his will, if againſt his will, then is he not omnipotent: if with his will, then may we as well ſay he doth it, as he ſuffereth it, underſtanding it rightly. See alſo the Tom. Pa. 18. &c. Pet. Martyr. in 2 Sa. 24.

Yet it ſeemeth we croſſe Saint Iames by this reading, who ſaith, If any man be tempted, let him not ever ſay, he is tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted of evill, neither tempteth he any man. But every man is tempted when he is drawne away by his owne concupiſcence, and is intiſed, &c.

Nothing at all truly, if you marke things well. For Saint Iames there deſcending from outward temptation, to wit, afflictions whereby God trieth us, to inward, that is, to thoſe luſts whereby wee are ſtirred up to do evill, ſheweth that every man is author of thoſe temptations to himſelfe, and not God, foraſmuch as we beare about in our boſomes that wicked corruption, which taketh occaſions by what meanes ſoever to ſtirre up evill motions in us, whence out at length proceeds wicked doing, and in concluſion followeth death the juſt reward of them. All which is no other than the very ſame that hath beene ſaid. For wee ever confeſſe, that although God tempt and lead into temptation, yet never tempteth he any man to evill And why? Saint Iames giveth the reaſon, For God cannot be tempted with evill, neither tempteth he any man (to wit, unto evill) that is, he deſireth not evill, and therefore he cannot be the author of evill doing in us. Non de exploratione, ſed de incitatione ad peccandum loquitur Iacobus. Saint Iames ſpeaketh not of the temptations of tryall, but of ſtirrings up unto evill, ſaith an Interpreter. And it is apparant enough.

Vrſin.

Now of the next word if you will, to wit, Temptation.

It is a word that will miniſter much matter profitable for the Lords children to be ſtill better and better acquainted withall whilſt they live. And I could heartily wiſh to ſpeake ſo of it, as moſt of this company might be benefited, and every man, at one time or another, in one thing or another, feele mee in his boſome. But ſuch grace is the Lords to give, and not mine nor any mans to take: and therefore with humble commending both my ſpeech and your profit to his moſt mercifull direction, let us ſet upon this treatiſe. It is therefore ſaid of the learned, that Tentatio eſt opus Diaboli, qua homines pios vel per inſtilliationem cogitationum malarum, aut per objectorum occaſionem, vel per vitioſæ naturæ inclinationem & affectus, vel per res ſecundas, aut adverſas ſolicitat, & impellit ad peccata & calamitates, Deo permittente, ut aut certo judicio propter peccata puniantur, aut explorata & probata fide eorum & conſtantia coronam vitæ accipiant: That is, temptation is a worke of the Devill, whereby he ſoliciteth, and driveth men into ſinnes and miſeries, either by infuſion of vile thoughts into them, or by meanes of objects laid before them, or by inclination of their corrupt nature and affections, GOD ſuffering them, either that their ſinnes by juſt judgements may have their due puniſhments, or elſe their faith and conſtancy a due crowne of life after that it hath beene tried and made manifeſt.

What temptation is.

This diſtinction or deſcription rather, will fully by all his parts appeare either by the ſtory of Iob, of David, or by divers others in this treatiſe, if you marke it. Againe, it is ſaid of them alſo, that temptations bee of two ſorts generally, Tentatio probationis, tentatio perditionis, The temptation of triall, and the temptation of perdition, according to which diviſion Cyprian may be thought to have ſpoken, when he ſaid: Poteſtas dupliciter Satanæ adverſus nos datur, vel ad pœnam cùm delinquimus, vel ad gloriam cum probamur. Power is given to Satan againſt us after two ſorts, to wit, either for puniſhment when wee offend, or for glory when wee are tried. But deſiring altogether a very great plainneſſe in this matter for divers cauſes, I chooſe rather another diviſion obſerved alſo of ſome, to ſay, that temptations are of three ſorts, to wit, either of God, of man, or of Satan. For all theſe are ſaid to tempt. And according to theſe ſeverall authors as it were of temptations, the word is diverſly and in ſeverall ſignifications taken. When God in the Scripture is ſaid to tempt, then is the word taken and commonly tranſ-lated in Engliſh to prove or to trie, becauſe that the drift of the Lord is thereby not to hurt by leading to evill, for ſo God tempteth not, Iames 1. but to make open and known by tryall, either to our ſelves, or to the world, or to both, either our corruption and malice againſt him, or elſe our faith and patience, and many vertues. Thus is it ſaid of Abraham in Geneſis, After theſe things God did prove Abraham, &c. What was this prooving or tempting of Abraham, but a mercifull opening both to Abraham himſelf, and al other, even to us at this day, what a wonderfull meaſure of Faith, love and zeale to his God hee had vouchſafed unto Abraham. So that both he ſaw then, and we ſee now, what neither we, nor happely he himſelf knew till after this tryall or temptation had his place. This reade wee againe in the Law, Then ſaid the Lord to Moſes, Behold, I will cauſe bread to raine from heaven to you, and the people ſhall go out and gather that that is ſufficient for every day, that I may prove them, whether they will walke in my Law or no: That is, that it may appeare both to themſelves and others, whether receiving but that which is ſufficient onely for one day at once, they will patiently depend upon my providence from day to day. Probat enim Deus homines, non quaſi ipſe experimento indigeat, ſed quò magis ſeipſos norint, & poſita omni arrogantia & inani perſuaſione, humiliter ſe in poſterum Deo ſubmittant. For God proveth not, ſaith one, as though hee had neede of any triall to know any of us all, but that men may themſelves thereby know better what is in them, and laying aſide all arrogancy and vaine perſwaſion, humbly ſubmit themſelves afterward to God. Againe, when at the giving of the Law the people ſaw the thunders and lightnings, the ſound of the trumpet, the mountaine ſmoaking, and for feare thereof fled, &c. then Moſes ſaid to the people, Feare not, for God is come to prove you, and that his feare may be before you, that yee ſin not. And againe in Deuteronomy, Thou ſhalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God lead thee this forty yeeres in the wildernes, for to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thy heart, whether thou wouldeſt keep his Commandements or no. For in affliction either by patiently abiding, or by ungodly grudging and repining, wee ſhew what was in us, though hidden before. Moſt plainly againe in the thirteenth Chapter: If there ariſe among you a Prophet, or a dreamer of dreames, and give thee a ſigne or wonder, and the ſigne or wonder come to paſſe which he hath told thee, ſaying, let us go after other gods which thou haſt not knowne, and let us ſerve them: Thou ſhalt not hearken unto the words of the Prophet, or unto that dreamer of dreames, for the Lod your God proveth you, to know whether yee love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your ſoule. Laſt of all in the booke of Iudges, I will no more, ſaith the Lord, caſt out before them any of the nations which Ioſhua left when he dyed, and why? it followeth in the next verſe: That through them I may prove Iſrael, whether they will keep the way of the Lord, to walke therein, as their Fathers kept it, or not.

Thus doe we ſee then how the Lord is ſaid to tempt man, namely, when by ſuch meanes as pleaſeth him, he tryeth and proveth man, not to winne any knowledge to himſelfe, that he had not before, for how ſhould he that made the heart, bee ignorant of any thing in the heart? no, hee underſtandeth the thoughts long before: but to the end that the parties themſelves that are thus proved, and others alſo by them, and in them, may ſee what before was not ſeene either of good unto praiſe, or evill unto puniſhment, and example to beware. And thus much of this for a while.

Your next member is how man tempteth.

How man tempteth.

Man is alſo ſaid to tempt ſometimes man, and ſometimes God. His tempting of man is alſo ſometime in the better part, ſometime in the worſe. In the better, when he doth but prove and trie whether further he may truſt, as it is wiſdome alwaies to do to our friends. For utendum amicis tanquam prætentatis aquis, aptæ ſint vado, an non. We muſt uſe friends, ſaid that wiſe heathen once, as waters that we have tried before, whether they may ſafely bee adventured upon, or no, to paſſe over. Alſo when the father or maſter leaveth ſome looſe money to ſee whether his child or ſervant will ſteale, or no, this is a kind of tempting or trying, yet but in good part, with a number ſuch like, that men to men muſt and may, as they ſhall ſee occaſion, uſe. To this kind may be referred the Queene of the South, who hearing the fame of Salomon concerning the name of the Lord, came to tempt him or prove him with hard queſtions. In the worſe part, man doth tempt man either by queſtions or actions. By queſtions, when they deale as the Phariſees did about the tribute of Chriſt, ſeeke to ſnare and catch their brethren to deſtroy or hurt them.

1 King. 10. 1.

Such tempters and temptations were thoſe daies of perſecution full of under Queene Mary, when no ſooner was any apprehended and convented before them, but their interrogatories inferred either death of ſoule by denying a truth, or death of body by affirming the ſame. Neither doth yet this world want theſe tempters by queſtions, where true Religion and knowledge of God ruleth not tongue and heart, and all. Whereupon many innocent ſoules are trapped ere they wit, and harmeleſſe hearts not ſpying hidden drifts, put the collar about their owne necks to deſtroy themſelves, that is, ſpeake or do ſimply, what is wrinched to a vantage they never feared, nor thought of againſt themſelves.

Thrice needfull therefore with the ſimplicity of the dove is the wiſdome of the Serpent.

By

By actions man tempteth, when either by words or deeds of bad example they allure others to sinne and evill. Thus tempted Eve her husband to eate of the Apple, Iobs wife her husband to curse God and die, Tobias wife her husband to be weary of well doing, Putiphars wife her servant to filthinesse, and those wicked Priests that said, Come let us imagine a device against Ieremy, with many such in the Scriptures: of which tempters and temptations that wise Salomon warneth when he saith: My son, if sinners entice thee, consent not unto them, if they say, come with us, wee will lay wait for blood, and lye privily for the innocent without a cause, cast thy lot in amongst us, we will have one purse, &c. And truly, blessed is that man and woman that walketh not in those counsels of the ungodly, standeth not in the way of those alluring sinners, nor sitteth in the seate of those reprobate scorners.

Psal.1.

And how tempteth Satan?

Satan tempteth when he moveth us to leave God and that obedience that we owe unto him any way, and to do evill, and therefore looke how many branches of well doing are in the law of God implyed, even so many contrary waies doth this enemy assault and tempt us. Of this temptation doth the holy Ghost speake, when he saith, Then was Iesus led aside of the spirit into the wildernesse to be tempted of the devill. And Peter, when he said, Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart that thou shouldest lye unto the holy Ghost? And Paul, when he saith, Let man and wife come againe together that Satan tempt them not for incontinencie. Againe, For this cause when I could no longer forbeare, I sent that I might know of your faith, lest the tempter had tempted you in any sort. With a number of such like places, in all which assaults of his, he useth our owne corruption and our filthy concupiscence, the world, the wicked, and many meanes, but the Lord is stronger than they all, if we cleave to him, either wholly to keepe us that we fall not at all, if it please him, as others do, or else to raise us up againe, when they have us downe under their feete, and to give us victory.

Mat.4. Acts 5. 1 Cor.7.5.

1 Thes.3.5.

And which of these kindes of temptations do we pray against in this Petition?

Surely, even against them all in some sort. For first, as concerning Gods temptations which more properly may be called trials, we beseech his Majesty in this prayer that he would deale in mercy and favour with us for evermore, and never lay more upon us than he will make us able to endure, but that he would give issue with the temptation, and helpe us. Thus farre do we pray even against these, as shall further be declared when we come to the second part of this Petition. Touching mans tryals or temptations we likewise herein begge of his mercy, that for any questions moved to us he would tender his owne glory and never suffer our wants to make answer to prejudice his truth with the unbeleevers, but that he would helpe in time of need, and either keepe us from opposings above our power to satisfie, or else give a mouth and utterance, that no haters of his glory may be able to resist, that in our weakenesse he being strong, the glory may be his, as it is due ever, and we that be the sheepe of his pasture, may give him praise for ever. The third sort, which is, Satans temptations, it is our meaning, that the great mercy of our gracious God would so farre support us, that wee may never bee vanquished and overcome of any of them, but delivered and saved by him from all evill. And thus you see how we pray against them all in this order, as we shall further shew (I say) hereafter. Yet is this last chiefly meant, to wit, that forasmuch as our whole nature is corrupt and given to sinne, if the Lord forsake us we are headily carried to what allurements and provocations soever wee see before us, the Lord in mercy would deliver us from this promptnesse and aptnesse of our natures to admit of sin, and by his grace deliver us from evill.

Gen.6.

Let us not now leave these things thus, but even yet further thinke of them. And to begin with the first, to wit, Gods temptations or tryals, and of those, first, with those that are of the right hand, alas how few consider thus much in prosperity, thereby the Lord trieth them, and searcheth out what they are, and how they will shew themselves to him for all these blessings?

1 Cor.6.7.

Most true it is, the more pittie. And yet doth the Lord so indeed, whensoever he powreth his mercies upon man and woman in this world. For as with a gager hee gageth them by those blessings, openeth and revealeth what manner of stuffe they are within, thankfull or unthankfull, kind or unkind, humble or proud, carefull or careless to please the giver: finally, whether good or bad, hee maketh it seene. Wherefore a little to helpe us in this triall, it is good to consider many times of these points. First, how in truth I come by the blessings that I enjoy: Secondly, to what manner of persons the continuance of them is promised: Thirdly, the true end and right use of them: and lastly, the teare full examples of abuse. These things will profit us if we know them well. Concerning the first therefore, it is too common with both great and small, to sticke in second causes, and to light short of the chiefe fountaine and well-head indeed. Why we have health, wealth, friends, mariages, honor, credit, offices, children, and a thousand of Gods comfortable favours in this life, we can alledge many reasons that I will not stand to repeate. But the reason of reasons, either wee alledge not ever, or it pierceth no further within the teeth than the tip of the tongue is, The Lord hath given. Whereas indeed the whole course of Scripture teacheth, that this is the head, and roote of all our joy full dayes and and dealings, and ever was, and onely is, and can bee, either for our good, if we uſe them well, or for our plague, if we do the contrary.

Ioſeph a poore mans childe came to a great place in the land of Ægypt, if wee marke it well, when the King ſaid to him, onely in the Kings throne will I be above thee : when he was over all the Kings Court, and ever all the Land, when the King commanded all his people to bee armed at his word, tooke his owne Ring off his owne finger, and put it upon his hand, arayed him in garments then of the richeſt, with a chaine of gold about his necke, ſet him upon the beſt Charret he had ſave one, and all the people cryed before him as he rid, for honors ſake upon their knees, tender Father. Ioſeph was alſo wiſe and full of the Spirit of God. Yet leſt we ſhould prattle prophanely of fortune and lucke, or dote undutifully upon his gifts, and ſo robbe the Lord of his due honour, it is expreſly ſaid, that the Lord was with Ioſeph, and made all that he did to proſper in his hand. The Lord therefore author of his proſperity and advancement whatſoever. David the youngeſt brother, that little ruddie cheeked Shepheard, from his hook and his cloake, his ſling and his ſcrip, came to the famous kingdome of Iſrael, and therein ruled with great honour and princely majeſty for his time, yet neither by wiſdome nor policy of himſelfe or his friends, but the Lord tooke him from following the Ewes great with young, and made him ruler of his pleople. And David proſpered and grew, for the Lord God of Hoſts was within him, ſaith the Text. So that God was the fountaine of all his good. Which as a true child, and thankfull to his God, the ſame David afterward remembred to his Sonne Salomon, when he told him, that hee ſhould build a houſe for the Lord, and ſhould therefore proſper becauſe the Lord ſhould be with him. Salomon againe confeſſed it, when hee ſaid that every man eateth and drinketh and ſeeth the commoditie of his labour, this is the gift of God. Behold, I will ſend you corne, and wine, and oyle, and you ſhall be ſatisfied therewith, and I will no more make you a reproach among the Heathen, ſaith the Lord. And againe by another Prophet, The ſeed ſhall be proſperous, the Vine ſhall give her fruit, and the ground ſhall give her increaſe, and the heavens ſhall give their dew, and I will cauſe the remnant of this people to poſſeſſe all things. So ever it is the note that the Scripture keepeth, that all proſperity and well doing in this world is the gift of God, and cannot bee attained againſt his will. Which likewiſe might be ſhewed in any particular that can bē named, if we would take that courſe. All which we note not now ſo much to teach a thing unknowne, as to remember a thing not thought of, or at the leaſt not ſo duly, and often and earneſtly thought of as it ſhould be. I ſpeake what I know, and what hidden conſciences muſt needs confeſſe to be too true. For could it be if we did thus thinke, that there ſhould be ſo little care of ſuch a God in many as there is, whoſe backs bee laden, yea, and even preſſed, as it were, downe to the ground, with the heape of Gods mercy? Whoſe tables richly he hath deckt in deſpite of their foes, whoſe head with balme he hath refreſhed, whoſe cups do overflow? No, no. But if our wretched hearts did feele it, with ſuch power, as theſe motions have in Gods Saints; O my ſweet God and deare Father, this is thy doing for thy wretch, and all theſe things that I enjoy (goe to particulars) they are thy gifts, who mighteſt have ſet mee at the doore with my Pitcher to beg my food, and farre otherwiſe have dealt with me, if thou wouldeſt, I tell you it would wring forth other love and fruits to ſuch a God againe, than appeare in many. And therefore aſſuredly wee thinke not of the fountaine and giver of theſe things as we ſhould. Amend then what is amiſſe, and give the Lord his due. It is he that hath lifted out of the myre, and ſet any with the Princes, even with the Princes of the people. It is he that bleſſeth the baſket and the dough, it is he that hath given whatſoever good thing we enjoy, and curſed wee if we deny it, or careleſly neglect the ſweet meditation of it ever. But to what end now hath he done all theſe things? Truly even to prove me and try me what I will doe to him againe, and that it may appeare to the world, and to mine owne eyes, what manner of man or woman I am within and indeed; one that will be puft up and forget both God and my ſelfe in proſperity, or one that will even weepe water of mine eyes in that zeale of my ſoule to pleaſe ſuch a Father, and grieve that I cannot, as I wiſh, and moſt heartily would. And if I bee the former, that the Lords juſtice may bee warranted, if he change my copie: if the latter, that my ſoule may feele comfort in ſo ſweet a God, not onely heaping his mercies upon me greatly, but giving me further a childs heart withall to love my kind Father ſo much the more, which is above all. And which indeed is the very end of Gods mercies and bleſſings.

Let David ſpeake, that man according to Gods owne heart. What did Gods kindneſſe worke in him whileſt the ſpirit prevailed? O my God, what ſhall I render againe unto thee for all thy mercies that thou haſt beſtowed upon me? What I ſay ſhall I render, render againe, as if he ſhould ſay, I know theſe bleſſings require a duty of me, a love, a zeale, a heart, a ſoule, a mind, a life to the glory and praiſe of ſuch a God. And in truth it is ſo. For wee our ſelves for our petite benefits require men to be ours in all lawfull ſort faithfully, firmely, with tongue, and heart, and hand, with body and goods and all: And what compariſon with the Lord? O loving God, what can man doe for us like thee, and yet how care wee to pleaſe them, and forget thee? O Lord awake. Remember alſo what the Prophet complaineth of, ſaying, But this people both an unfaithfull

And especially marke it, that because they did not thus, therefore hee saith they had rebellious hearts, and were gone away. A fearefull sentence of a true judge concerning all unthankfull users of prosperity. Againe, the same Prophet in another place, They shall come and rejoyce in the light of Sion, and shall come to the bountifulnesse of the Lord, (why?) even for the wheat, and for the wine, and for the oyle, and for the encrease of sheepe and bullocks, and their soules shall be as a watered garden, &c. See still what Gods mercies should worke in us, even a rejoycing in so deere a Father, and not in going, but in running to his service and worship that is so kind unto us. Knowest thou not, saith the Apostle, that the riches of his bountifulnes, and patience, and long suffering, leadeth thee unto repentance? In effect, knowest thou not that if God bee thy deare, sweet, and tender Father, that thou againe art bound to be his loving, carefull, and obedient child? In truth it should be so. And if the Lord were not in his goodnesse past the reach of any mortall braine, hee might say also his benefits had caught a goodly reward or catch of my goodnesse, for alas, what are we? or what is our love? yet since it is his mercy unmeasurable and unsearchable to stand so contented, and to seeke no more, pardoning in his deare Jesus, all imperfections, O my beloved fathers and brethren whatsoever, that vouchsafe your eyes to read these papers, let us not deny him, what if hee were not such a God as hee is, were not worth having when we gave it, namely, our poore hearts, our weake love, our hearty obedience, our care and diligence to be what with so many mighty mercies received we are bound to be. For truly, if giving man must have of all honest receivers not the words onely of our mouth, but the sincere affection of the soule, our giving God must have the very soule of our soule, and all that is within us for his goodnesse to us. And blessed is that man and woman that loved of the Lord above all measure, by his given grace loveth him againe in their measure as they can. Truly to such shall be even a continuance of mercy as shall be good. For then shalt thou prosper, if thou observe his statutes, saith David to his sonne Salomon, and therefore my sonne, the Lord give thee onely wisdome and understanding to do this. Vzziah sought the Lord, and the Lord made him prosper, saith the Text, Iotham became mighty because he directed his way before the Lord his God. What man is he that feareth the Lord, him will he teach the way that he shall choose. His soule shall dwell at ease, and his seed shall inherit the Land. If yee consent and obey, yee shall eate the good things of the Land, but if yee refuse and be rebellious, you shall be devoured with the sword, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. With a number such places in the Scripture. Finally, there is no good thing, saith the Prophet, that he shall withhold from them that live a godly life. But I will even marry thee unto me for ever, saith the Lord, yea, I will marry thee unto me, in righteousnesse, in judgement, in mercy, and compassion. I will ever marry thee unto me in faithfulnesse, and thou shalt know the Lord, and I will heare the heavens, and they shall heare the earth, and the earth shall heare the corne, and the wine, and the oyle, and they shall heare Israel, &c. But if prosperity and the Lords blessings have not this effect in us, then are they the Lords gagers to discover worse matter than haply either the world or wee our selves did thinke before to bee in us, or at least so much to be in us, as pride, envie, disdaine, spite, malice, cruelty, unthankfulnesse, wantonnesse, uncleannesse, with a number such. So that still our ground-worke standeth fast, that this prosperity is one of Gods temptations, that is, one of Gods tryers and teachers of man what he is and will be that way. It discovered in David both to the world and to Davids owne eyes his great wickednesse. For in his prosperity he said tush, tush, this wealth and weale shall not decay, in his prosperity, peace and rest from many former griefes, he looked from his Turret upon Barsabe Vriahs wife with a sinfull thought and deed in the end. It discovered in Salomon overmuch loosenesse, weakenes of minde, and unkindnes to GOD. For his wives were not as they should have beene, they were chosen amisse of him, and he made an Idolater by them, &c. Manasses exalted to a kingdome bewrayed manners farre unseemely for the meanest in the world. The Israelites in their prosperity, how ever, ever forgat they God and waxed wantons, yea, grievous sinners against his Majesty. How sad was that young man that was so wealthy when hee was bidden sell all? So that what should have lift up both heart and soule to a good God, that pressed downe mightily, and revealed a secret both to himselfe and others, even an unwillingnesse to forgoe, for God, what God in mercy had lent upon that condition: what bewrayed that rich glutton in his prosperity, but pride, covetousnesse, wanton delicacie, contempt of the poore, and such like. Those unkind guests bidden to the wedding, what bewrayed they in their prosperity, the rich farmer, the wealthy merchant they would not come, and the married man drowned in his pleasures, hee could not come. Herod in his robes and chaire of estate bewitched with the flattery of them that cried, the voice of God and not of man, revealed what hee was in his most fearefull and sudden fall. The Lord smote him, and hee was eaten of lice.

Charge

Charge therefore them that are rich in this world, ſaith the holy Apoſtle, that they be not high minded, and that they truſt not in uncertain riches, but in the living God, &c. As if hee ſhould ſay, they have need, not of gentle and ſoft admonition, but even of deepe and dreadfull charges to take heed. So dangerous a thing is proſperity to a fraile man. When thou ſhalt come into the good land that I ſhall give thee, that floweth with milk and hony, that is, with all bleſſings, wherein are rivers of waters, and fountaines, and depths that ſpring out of vallies, and mountaines, a land of wheat and barley, of vineyards, figtrees, and Pomegranates, a land of oyle olive, and hony, a land wherein thou ſhalt eate bread without ſcarcity, neither ſhalt thou lacke any thing therein, a land whoſe ſtones are Iron, and out of whoſe mountaines thou ſhalt dig braſſe, and when thou haſt eaten and art filled, comming to houſes that thou buildedſt not, and vineyards or gardens that thou plantedſt not, then, then, beware thou forget not thy God, and him that gave thee all, neither be lifted up, ſaith the Lord. As if he ſhould ſay, then is the danger, if ever, that thou ſhalt waxe wanton, bathe thy ſelfe in pleaſures, melt away in dainty curioſity, or curious dainties, and lift up thy heele againſt a kinde God, bid him adue, and take thy leave of true and due obedience for all theſe mercies. And therefore then, then take heed and beware. Which aſſuredly that wiſe Agur remembring and conſidering well, prayed that he might not have too little, leſt I ſteale, (ſaith he) and take the name of my God in vain, neither yet too much, leſt I be full, and deny thee, and ſay, who is the Lord. Others in their times knew it, and therefore wrote divers things this way. Fœlicitas & moderatio diviuum contubernium habent; Proſperity and moderation dwell in two houſes. His meaning is, hardly they are found dwelling together. Raro bona fortuna bonaq; mens homini datur; Seldome is good fortune (that is proſperity) and a good heart given to a man together. Magnæ fœlicitatis eſt à fœlicitate non vinci; It is great felicity not to be overcome of felicity. With a number ſuch like ſayings.

Prov.30.8.

Wherefore to goe no further, we ſee how the Lord tempteth us, tryeth us by proſperity, to the diſcovering and opening of our hidden ſecrets, either good or evill, and for the Lords ſake thinking ſeriouſly of it, let every man and woman particularly view what breaketh out of them, for all the mercies that are upon them. And I ſay no more.

You ſaid another of the Lords temptations or trials of man was adverſity, and therefore I pray you alſo touch that.

True it is: ſometimes the Lord tryeth one way, and ſometimes another, and many and often-times by this deep gager of men, adverſity, and the croſſe. For ſo ſaith the Scripture:

Thou ſhalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee this forty yeares in the wilderneſſe, for to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thy heart, whether thou wouldſt keep his Commandements, or no. And, Feare none of theſe things which thou ſhalt ſuffer. Behold, it ſhall come to paſſe, that the devill ſhall caſt ſome of you into priſon, that ye may be tryed, and ye ſhall have tribulation ten dayes: Be thou faithfull unto death, and I will give a crown of life. Againe, Becauſe thou haſt kept the word of my patience, therefore I will deliver thee from the houre of tentation, which will come upon all the world, to try them that are on the earth. Which places with many moe that might be alledged, teacheth us evidently, that thus the Lord tryeth his children, when it pleaſeth him, even in the furnace of adverſity, cauſing them thereby, not unto him, who knoweth all things before, but unto themſelves and the world, to diſcover and open what before was not ſo knowne, namely, either patience or grudging againſt the Lords viſitation: as in examples plainly we may ſee.

Deut.8.2.

Chap.3.10.

Abraham waited a long time for his wiſhed Childe, and that delay of the Lords was his great tryall. What opened it in Abraham, but a moſt ſingular faith, before not ſo well known unto men, that even above hope he beleeved under hope, that he ſhould have what was promiſed, and not weake in faith, conſidered neither his owne body, which was now dead, being almoſt an hundred yeares old, neither the deadneſſe of Saraes wombe: but without doubting reſted fully aſſured, that what the Lord had ſaid, he was able to do. Iacob wonderfully toſſed with the waves of much bitter adverſity by his wives, by his children, by his friends, and every day almoſt by one thing or other, yet ever ſhewed forth a patient heart, a beleeving heart, and many great vertues, of all Gods Children to be many times thought of. And ſo was affliction a diſcoverer of his good graces to the praiſe of God the giver, the true commendation of himſelfe the receiver, and all our examples that conſider them. How did adverſity manifeſt in Ioſeph againe the gifts of God? What a faith did affliction in her daughter bewray and lay open to all men in the woman of Canaan, when the Lord Jeſus gave this teſtimony of her, O woman, great is thy Faith, be it unto thee as thou wilt? So that you ſee where the Lord had wrought any good, there this tryer and gager of the Lords, adverſity opened it, and revealed it to his glory. Now looke at other ſome, and you ſhall ſee another courſe or other effects of this temptation. The children of Iſraels caſe in Ægypt is knowne unto us, how grievous and even marvellous their bondage was, as alſo how the Lord ſent Moſes and Aaron to deliver them. Who at their firſt comming were welcome and reverenced of all the Elders greatly, they then expecting by them a releaſe from thoſe woes. But after a while when the King encreaſed their affliction, and charged the task-masters to deliver them no more straw, and yet to require the whole number of bricke, upon sharp punishment, if they performed it not; what then bewrayed this tryall in them? O see and consider. They flye upon the Lords Ministers and messengers with an open mouth, with raging passions, and the Lord looke upon you, and judge you, say they. For you have made our savour stinke before Pharaoh, and before his servants, in that yee have put a sword in his hand to slay us. When they were in feare of Pharaohs Host pursuing them, after they were delivered, they did the like: when they wanted water they did the like: when they wanted victuals they did the like: and their murmurings, grudgings, and cursed speakings are even fearefull when we reade them. So that we see now in these how adversity bewrayed corruption, incredulity, impatience, and many foule faults, hidden before from men, and haply even from their owne eyes. The like might be shewed in many moe. Even the Apostles themselves declared their weakneſſe when they were thus tryed by the apprehension of their master, and they fled away. Peter more than all the rest, when a poore maide made him deny, and every question redeny, and forsweare. Every way therefore adversity is a tell-tale. And being sent in the wisdome of the mighty God to any man or woman with commission to examine them and to discover them, it doth indeed effectually, and quickly shew what is within. If faith, patience, hope, humility, love of God, and such like vertues be there, so hee sheweth by and by: and if not so he sheweth also without partiality, and maketh even a world of witnesse of it.

Exod. 5.20.

Chap. 15.24.
Chap. 16.3.

Truly therefore saith Iesus Syrach, The furnace tryeth the potters vessell, and affliction tryeth the just and godly. And Solomon, as silver and gold is tryed by fire, so doth God prove and try the hearts of men. Your Fathers (saith Iudith) were tempted, that they might be tryed and proved, whether they truly from their heart worshipped God. The want of the true knowledge hereof maketh many hasty judges and judgements in the world, men by and by entring into some evill conceit of their estate with God, whom they see in this case.

Syrac. 27.5.
Prov. 17.3.

Iudit. 8.21.

Truly it is too true. For even as the Prophet saith of the head, so is it found in the members, they are judged and plagued and smitten of God, we hide as it were our faces from them, they are despised, and we esteeme them not.

Esay 53.3,4.

A very grievous fault in whosoever do so, and checked with the practice ever of the living God upon his children, and many sweet and true comforts out of the word. For What son is it, saith he, whom the father chasteneth not? As if he should say, there is none, neither ever was or ever shall be: But even all and every one lesse or more is thus tempted, tryed and proved of God in time. And therefore, if ye be without correction, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sons. Whosoever will be my disciple, let him take up his crosse & follow me. For, through many tribulations must the entrance into Gods kingdome be. Wherfore forget not (saith the Apostle) the consolation which speaketh unto you as children: My son despise not the chastening of the Lord, neither faint when thou art rebuked of him. For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, & he scourgeth every son that he receiveth. And Iames again most comfortably: Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, for when he is tryed he shall receive the crowne of life which the Lord hath promised to them that love him. But my purpose is not to enter into this common place now, I have done it elsewhere, and there is scarce a leafe of the whole Scripture that stayeth not our hearts against this hellish conceit, that adversity, affliction, and these crossing trials, or trying crosses should import an angry God towards us ever. God forbid, the truth is otherwise, as I say.

In the conference of faith and frailty.

And I also very willingly confesse it. But yet give me leave I pray you a little. This generality in my opinion contenteth not every man: for oftentimes when a man confesseth the generall, namely, that the Lord by adversity proveth his children, yet faileth he in the particular, & looking at his own estate, entreth into some feare, that yet not in such and such a sort he dealeth with any but whom he hath cast off. And therefore in my opinion it should not be amisse to derive the generall into particulars, and to shew some severall trials of this kinde, with their comforts or examples out of the word of God.

Afflictions inward or outward.
Iob 6.4.
How to know our election if we be tempted with any doubt of it.

Let it be so since that contenteth you. And then taking this course, let us remember that these things are either inward in the soule and conscience, or outward in body, goods, children, friends, fame, and such like. Of the inward speaketh with no little vehemency Iob, when hee saith, The arrows of the Almighty are in me, the venome whereof doth drink up my spirit, and the terrors of God fight against me. For hereby he declareth that he was not onely afflicted in body, but wounded in conscience, which is the greatest battell the faithfull can have. Now of the inward conflicts, the great maine one is, when a man or woman falleth into feare and faintings, concerning election, doubting in themselves, after some sort, lest they belong not therunto, & therfore let us make this our beginning, yet speaking but briefly of it because many have handled the point right well. Know we then our comfort herein if the Lord ever please to try us thus. Election is a thing revealed by steps, and whosoever will surely and safely finde it out, must keepe the same. For as it were a madnesse if I desire to climbe a ladder, to seeke to set my foot at first upon the highest step, so shall it be if I seeke out my election first before I looke unto other things. And as there the highest step is truly trod upon at the last, if I begin at the lowest, and so goe upward: so is election certainly found if we keep the like order. This spirituall ladder then then ſtandeth thus; Whom the Lord electeth before all time, them doth he ever call in time, either at morning, at the ninth houre, or eleventh houre, or ſome houre. Then whom he calleth, them doth he juſtifie, that is, whom he effectually calleth : Whom he juſtifieth, them doth he ſanctifie, and whom he ſanctifieth, them doth he glorifie. So now then if I would come to my election, and conſequently my glorification, which is the higheſt ſtep, and is in heaven with God, then muſt I begin at the loweſt ſtep, to wit, Sanctification, which is in my ſelfe; and aſcend thus : If I be ſanctified, then juſtified; if juſtified, then called; if called, then elected, and ſo ſure to be glorified. Our ſanctification every one of us knoweth, feeleth, and findeth, and how truly it carieth with it a note of Gods Childe, choſen in time to inherit heaven, marke the Scriptures; As the branch (ſaith our Saviour Chriſt) cannot beare fruit of it ſelfe, except it abide in the vine, no more can yee except ye abide in me. I am the vine, ye are the branches, he that abideth in me, and I in him, the ſame bringeth forth much fruit, for without me ye can doe nothing. Here you ſee a conjunction conformable, namely, of holy fruits and Chriſt, of fruitfull branches and the vine, ſo that if the Lord have wrought this bleſſed worke in us, that we are dead to ſin and alive to righteouſneſſe, then are we in him and he in us, yea, even ſo ſurely as it is certaine that the bearing bough is not broken from the tree, which if it were, it could not beare. It is a marvellous proofe to us of this good, therefore marke it well. The Apoſtle againe ſaith, There is no condemnation to them that are in Chriſt Ieſus. Yea, but who be thoſe? See what followeth; Which walke not after the fleſh, but after the Spirit. So then if I would know whether I be in Chriſt Jeſus or no, I muſt looke how I walke, that is, ſtill how I am ſanctified. And if I finde that the God of mercy by his perpetuall Spirit hath wrought in me a change, that whereas once I walked after the fleſh, that is, was ruled, guided, and governed by my corrupt nature, now it is not ſo, but the holy Ghoſt leadeth me into a fervent love of God, and true hatred of evill, then is the concluſion inferred by the very Spirit of truth himſelfe, I am in Chriſt Jeſus, and there is no condemnation to me, nor for me. So that Sanctification, the loweſt ſtep leadeth me ſurely to election, the higheſt of the ladder. Give rather diligence, ſaith Saint Peter, my brethren, to make your calling and election ſure. Yea, but how (might they ſay) ſhall we doe it? Peter telleth them, If ye doe theſe things, you ſhall never fall. And what be thoſe things? Hee alſo ſheweth them, namely : If you joyne vertue with your faith, and with vertue, knowledge; and with knowledge, temperance; and with temperance, patience; and with patience, godlineſſe; with godlineſſe, brotherly kindneſſe; and with brotherly kindneſſe, love, &c. Now what is all this but ſanctification of life. So that ſtill our rule is proved, that if we would know whether we be elected to live in heaven, we muſt ever looke how we leade our lives in earth. And if there the Lord hath changed us from careleſſe to carefull men and women, to pleaſe him in holineſſe and righteouſneſſe all the dayes of our life, then in this ſanctification a note of juſtification, juſtification, of vocation; vocation, of election, and ſo heaven is ours. But now take heed that in this ſearch for holineſſe of life, we be not caryed away with outward ſhews. For ſuch holineſſe holdeth not either in premiſes or concluſion of our former argument. The Lord abhorreth reproaching lips and reproaching hearts. And Except your righteouſneſſe, ſaith he, exceed the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſies, you ſhall never enter into the Kingdome of God. That is, except you have more than a painted viſard which they had moſt glorious, and a counterfeit hypocriticall ſhew of holineſſe, your reckoning of heaven will bee without your hoſt, and you will faile of it. Write ſaith the Lord to the Angell of the Church of Sardis, I know thy workes, for thou haſt a name that thou liveſt, but thou art dead. It is not then a name only that will ſerve thy turne. Having a ſhew, ſaith Paul, of godlineſſe, but have denyed the power thereof. As if hee ſhould ſay, vaine and thrice vaine is the ſhew without the power, and truth, when this ſearch of our election is in hand.

Rom.3.1. 2 Tim.3.5.

O beloved, conſider then of this earneſtly, and thinke with your ſelves, if there bee no comfort to bee had in our hearts that wee are the Lords, appointed to life and bliſſe in the world to come, but onely by a true eſpyall of ſanctification of life in our ſelves, how carefull ſhould wee bee by hearing of the word, by praying, by reading, and by all appointed good meanes to have this change wrought in us, that our light ſhining forth may not onely make others glorifie our heavenly Father for his grace in us, but even unto our ſelves as Saint Peter ſaith, make your election and future eſtate in the glorious Kingdome of God ſure. Truely there ſhould bee no cares greater than this, neither any diligence as the Apoſtle ſpeaketh, more faithfull whileſt we live. And ſee with your ſelves in your ſecret meditations often, this difference of holineſſe and unholineſſe, of ſanctification and prophaneneſſe, the one proveth unto me my everlaſting joy with God, when this courſe is ended, and the other my aſſured woe with the devill and his angels in the blackneſſe of darkneſſe for ever. O what are the pleaſures of ſinne then for a ſeaſon, when ſweet meate ſhall have ſo ſowre a ſawce? Could the Lord with a more piercing argument prick us forward to holy life, or with a ſharper knife cut in ſunder the cords of vanity, iniquity, and ſinne, wherewith thouſands of us are ſo fettered and hampered, than to teach us that the one aſſureth us of laſting life, and the other of laſting death in the world to come. Truly he could not. And therefore every one lay his hand upon his ſoule betimes, beleeve the Lord and wee ſhall not bee confounded. Had I wiſt, ſaith the old Proverbe, commeth ever too late. Now live like a Chriſtian amongſt men, and ever live like a Saint among the Angels of heaven. For the Lord hath ſpoken it. But now ſoake in ſinne with the bit in thy teeth unreſtrainable, and then rot in the reward of it, an everlaſting curſe from God and all his joyes, for the Lord hath alſo ſaid it. And if this ſanctification, beloved, may not be in ſhew only, as hath been ſaid, but in truth and verity, how deſperate, how woſull, how wretched and miſerable is the eſtate of that man and woman, that hath not ſo much as a ſhew? If there be no comfort got by a gliſtering outward appearance, what comfort may be in the ſoule, if the Lord awake to thinke of it, where even this alſo utterly wanteth, and the contrary, to wit, all liberty, looſeneſſe, and ſinne aboundeth marvellouſly? Shall we forget the curſe of our Saviour Chriſt in the Goſpell upon the figtree, that yet had goodly leaves freſh and greene, becauſe alſo with the leaves it had no fruit. If ſo feareſull a curſe light upon that, O curſe of curſes, how many ſhall bee upon thoſe trees that have not ſo much as leaves, no, not one greene leafe, but are altogether withered, twice dead and pluckt up by the rootes. Wherefore I pray you, as you love your life with God another day, and deſire any aſſurance of it to your ſoule in this world, Give your bodies daily a living ſacrifice, holy, and acceptable unto God, which is your reaſonable ſerving of God. And faſhion not your ſelves like unto this world, but be you changed by the renewing of your minde, that you may prove what that good and acceptable, and perfect will of God is. And whatſoever things are true, whatſoever things are honeſt, whatſoever things are juſt, whatſoever things are pure, whatſoever things are worthy love, whatſoever things are of good report, if there be any vertue, or if there be any praiſe, thinke of theſe things. For as you have heard and ſeen truly proved, theſe things ſhall aſſure us, that we are the Lords, cared for here, and choſen elſewhere to be with him for ever and ever. And the want of this reformation preacheth nothing unto us, but that as yet we know no intereſt we have to thoſe laſting joyes, and that heavenly Father. The Lord ſtrengthen us, and the Lord change us that we may be changed, Amen.

Note.

2 Pet.1.18. Verſ. 18.

Rom. 12. 1.

Phil 4 8.

You ſay this ſanctification muſt be true and right, or elſe it doth not prove unto us our election: I pray you therefore how may this be knowne, namely, when it is true and right, and when not?

Matter.

To know this, we muſt ever looke at the matter and manner of our actions, whereby wee worſhip God. For if either of theſe be wrong, then is it not that holineſſe which the Lord alloweth. Concerning the matter, we muſt looke that the things wherewith we ſerve God be commanded of God, and not invented and deviſed by our ſelves or any man elſe. For in vaine ſaith the Lord Jeſus, doe you ſeeke to worſhip me, teaching for doctrine mens precepts. Which one thing ſticketh to the very heart a thouſand wil-worſhips in Popery, never commanded of God, but brought in of ſinfull man for advantage ſake, as Maſſes, Pilgrimages, Holy-water, Holy-bread, cenſings, creepings, and ſuch like. Then though the matter be good, yet if the manner be evill, we faile to pleaſe God. And therefore even thoſe ſacrifices and ceremonies that the Lord himſelfe ordained, he often teacheth he doth abhorre, for want of a right manner of doing them. What have I to doe (ſaith he) with the multitude of your ſacrifices? Bring no more oblations to me in vain: Incenſe is an abomination to me, I cannot ſuffer your new Moones, nor your Sabbath dayes, it is iniquity, my ſoule hateth them, they are a burthen to me, &c. Again of Prayer; When you ſtretch out your hands I will hide mine eyes, and though you make many prayers, I will not heare. An example we ſee in the Scribes and Phariſies almes and long prayers rejected. Alas Lord, and why ſo, might the Jewes ſay? ſurely would he anſwer, becauſe though you doe theſe things rightly in reſpect of matter, becauſe I commanded them, yet doe you not rightly in reſpect of manner, and that alſo I ſeeke of all men.

Manner. Eſay 1. 11.

Mat. 6.

Mat. 15. 9.

I pray you then what is the right manner that God alloweth?

This muſt wee learne by diligent hearing and reading of the word. For therein hath the Lord laid downe both what we ſhall do, and how we ſhall do. Generally thus much now conſider and take with you, that without faith it is impoſſible to pleaſe God, and therefore concerning manner, no action can pleaſe God, though it were never ſo glorious, except it proceed from an heart purified by faith. Cain and Abel offered both ſacrifices, the one pleaſed, the other not. And why? But for this thing, becauſe Abel had true faith in his heart, from whence that action flowed: and Cain had none, but only did the outward worke for faſhion ſake and order. So thouſands moe then in thoſe dayes, and now in ours, that one day ſhall know with wo, what it is to have outward ſhew, without inward faith. Then it is required concerning maner, that all our works bee done in humility and lowlineſſe of minde, wee ever confeſſing truly, that we, notwithſtanding all our works, are unprofitable ſervants. The want of this made the Phariſies actions abhorred, which otherwiſe in reſpect of matter were well. For who doth not acknowledge that not to be an extortioner, unjuſt, an adulterer, to faſt, to give tithe truly of all wee have, are good things, but to doe theſe in pride and conceit, with boaſting and bragging, and without humility, alas the Lord abhorreth it, and ſendeth us away like proud praters, not like Chriſtian

Chriſtian prayers to his heavenly majeſty. Thirdly, it is required that we have hope. For although we ought to be humble, yet not ſo throwen downe muſt we be, but that ſtill we reſt aſſured of aceeptance with God for Chriſt, although not for the worthineſſe of our workes: and in that hope offer cheerfully our obedience to the Lord. Thus teacheth Peter when hee ſaith: 1 Pet.2.5.
Ye alſo as lively ſtones be made a ſpirituall houſe, an holy Prieſthood, to offer up ſpirituall ſacrifices acceptable to God by Ieſus Chriſt. Marke theſe words (acceptable to God by Jeſus Chriſt) upon words our hope is ever ſurely built, which now I ſpeake of. Fourthly, our actions muſt be done in love both to God and man. For if we could ſpeake with tongues of men and Angels, if wee have no love, we are but as ſounding braſſe, and tinckling Cymbals, Yea, though wee feed the poore with all our goods and give our bodies to be burned, having no love, it ſhall profit us nothing. Laſtly, all our workes, words and thoughts ſhould reſpect the Lords glory, and not our owne. For if we doe any thing to be ſeene of men, Verily, ſaith our Saviour, they have their reward. Mat.6.5. And thus doe you ſee now which is true ſanctification and holineſſe of life, ſuch as will truly prove to us our election and future glorification with Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt, in the Kingdome of heaven: Even words, deeds and ſecret thoughts thus warranted both for matter and manner as hath been ſhewed. Thinke of theſe rules, and examine your ſelves by them.

My heart conſenteth to all theſe properties of a true ſanctification, and right obedience, but yet give me leave to queſtion for my moſt comfort. What now if theſe things be in a man or woman, with great imperfection, ſhall therefore their worke be rejected, and yeeld no comfort concerning their election?

God forbid. And therfore thus much take with you further, that exerciſing your ſelf in things commanded, and doing them in this maner as hath been ſaid, ſo neere as the Lord inableth you, wreſtling according to the meaſure of your faith, every day to bee leſſe ſinfull and more righteous, though the perfect righteouſneſs which the law requireth be not found in you, by reaſon of your weakneſs, yet are you counted in the ſight of God ſanctified, holy and acceptable in Chriſt Jeſus, and ſo ſealed up to the day of redemption. And that I may not ſay it to you, but prove it, conſider I pray you the example of S. Paul himſelf, who though he were ſo ſanctified and borne anew, as that thereupon he might ſafely and ſurely conclude his election for ever, to inherit heaven by Chriſt, yet felt he and found he very many imperfections in himſelfe, and ſaith plainly; I allow not that which I do: For what I would, that doe I not, but what I hate that doe I. Againe, when Rom.7.15.
I would doe good, I am thus yoked, that evill is preſent with me. Again, in my minde I ſerve the Law of God, but in my fleſh the law of ſin. O wretched man that I am therefore who ſhall deliver me from the body of this death? with ſundry other ſpeeches to the ſame end in that place. Whereby I ſay we are plainly taught, that humane imperfection is far from proving any thing againſt our true ſanctification. Yea, this is the true perfection of them that are borne anew, to confeſſe with the Apoſtle, that they are imperfect. And to our great comfort let us note it, that this Apoſtle, ſanctified thus imperfectly, and groning under the grieſe of ſundry wants and weakneſſe, yet ſo aſſured himſelfe of his election, by ſo much as he had, that in the next Chapter hee is not afraid to breake out thus, I am perſwaded that neither death nor life, Angels, nor principalities, nor Rom.8.38.
powers, nor things preſent, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God which is in Chriſt Ieſus our Lord. See then and never forget it, that ſanctification though but in part and with much want, yet is accepted with God and man, and ought yeeld that man and woman that hath it, ſuch a comfortable perſwaſion as this, namely, that nothing ſhall be able to ſeparate them from their God. So that they be not negligent in hearty hungring ſtill after more. Which ever is to be ſearched for carefully in our ſelves. For even ſo did this Apoſtle if you mark it; I delight, ſaith he, in the Law of God concerning the inner Verſe 22.
man. And as long as he found ſome meaſure of grace, and an heart that ſtill wiſhed more, and ſighed for more, and delighted in good, ſo long was he cheerfull touching his eſtate with God, Verſe 23.
albeit till his dying day he ſaw another law in his members rebelling againſt the law of his minde, and leading him captive to the law of ſinne, which was in his members. This example then is notable to this end, and let us not forget it. Would God alſo the contrary were more earneſtly conſidered than it is, namely, that if ſome meaſure of holy converſation, together with a minde moſt fervently wiſhing more, and even grieved for want of more, yeeld mens ſoules comfort, that neither life nor death, nor any thing ſhall ſeparate them from the Lord: what wil, neither any meaſure at all, neither any deſire of any, nor any griefe for want of any, or for huge floods of ungodlineſſe that overflow us both body and ſoul, our words, our works, our thoughts or lookes, and all things we doe: I ſay what will this yeeld to the conſcience one day, but even a dreadfull blow, that as the other never, ſo we ever are appointed, and aſſured to bee ſeparated from Chriſt Jeſus. O then take heed betimes, and cutting off every day by the ſword of Gods given grace, iniquity, and ſin, let us hunger and thirſt to ſerve God in holineſs, and righteouſneſs before him all the dayes of our life, and by fruits of a true new birth, to make as S. Peter hath told us, our election ſure. Another proofe to your queſtion, that imperfections in our new birth and ſanctification may not diſcourage us, is the ſame Apoſtle againe, troubled in another 2 Cor.12.

place ſo grievouſly with his owne concupiſcence that pricked in the fleſh the meſſenger of Satan, that he beſought the Lord thrice that it might depart from him. The Lords anſwer as we know was this, that his grace was ſufficient for him. For through weakneſſe his power was made perfect. Plainly teaching us, and graciouſly cheering us, that for our imperfections hee will not reject us. It is one thing to have ſin raigning in us, and another thing to have it dwelling in us. The one we are forbidden, the other we ſhall be ſubject to whileſt we live. For, I know that in me, that is, in my fleſh dwelleth no good thing, confeſſing with griefe that ſin dwelleth in him, though to his comfort, through grace it raigned not in him. Full is the Scripture of ſtrength againſt this feare of Imperfections, but I truſt this ſufficeth.

O, but the children of God are ſubject many times to ſuch a dulneſſe and deadneſſe in compariſon of ſweet raviſhing motions that they have felt, that Satan catching and watching his opportunities is ready to perſwade that ſurely now they are fallen away, and God hath given them over.

Moſt true it is, and yet all for the beſt. For ſurely, if we had not ſuch alterations, and changes, we ſhould thinke that grace were nature in us, we ſhould not eſteeme of that ſweet power of the Spirit as we doe, when after a dulneſſe it returneth againe, neither any way be thankfull as now we are. But to be too much caſt downe with ſuch tumblings, and to enter into ſuch deſperate feares, truly the Lord would it not. For what change thinke you felt David when he cryed, O let me feele the comfort of the ſpirit againe, and when ſo often he cryeth, O quicken me as thou waſt wont, quicken me, quicken me. Yet was not David caſt away, though for his ſinne or tryall, or Gods glory, or others example, hee was thus many times troubled by a grievous dulneſſe & many tempting fears. Alas, it is the courſe we muſt ever account of, for our better wakening, and which Gods choſen have ever taſted yet without rejection. The mother after ſhe hath felt her childe move, hopeth the beſt, though ever it move not; and when weakly it ſtirreth, ſhe cheerfully hopeth of greater ſtrength in time, and ſo muſt we. This ſweet ſpirit is not alwayes alike; that difference may teach us, it is great mercy to have much, and make us thankfull. The Sun ſhining ſo faire is often covered with miſty clouds from us, yea, and every day ſetteth, and as it were taketh his leave. But we ſee thoſe clouds vaniſh away in time, and the cheerefull riſing followeth after his heavy ſetting. It is not ever winter, nor ever ſummer, but after a faire day commeth a foule, and back againe. The tree is not alwayes greene and flouriſhing with his cheerefull leaves, yet liveth it in the roote when outward ſhew is gone. And truly ſo doe we, (let us in comfort know it) in our Chriſt rooted, remaine alive ſafe and ſure, when bluſtering ſtormes of ſhrewd temptations have ſhaken off our leaves, that is, our cheerefull thoughts, words, and countenance, and for our better ſchooling, the Lord a little hath left us to our ſelves. The foundation of our hope ſtandeth faſt; whom he loveth, to the end he loveth them. And I am perſwaded that he that hath begun thie good worke in you, will performe it untill the day of Ieſus Chriſt. For the gifts and calling of God, are without repentance, with a number of ſuch. So that though the ſadneſſe of ſoule come upon us, and great diſquietneſſe be within our breaſt, yet muſt we like faithfull children as the Lord ſhall enable, ſay, Still truſt in God my ſoule, for I will yet give him thankes, &c. O tarry thou the Lords leiſure, be ſtrong, and hee ſhall comfort thy heart, and put thou thy truſt in the Lord. Many times reade that 77. Pſalme, and ſee the downefalls of Gods children, and how againe they catch hold and ſcramble up, confeſſing it to be their infirmity, as indeed it is. And the Lord of comfort worke our comfort.

Will God then accept ſome obedience?

Yet again doe you aske me that? Was it not proved even now that ſanctification with imperfection, is nevertheleſſe true ſanctification and accepted. But you ſhew a paſſion ſtill following the godly minde, that what it wiſheth to have, it feareth to want, and therefore never is weary of proofe to have what heart deſireth. Therefore even againe I anſwer you, that hee doth. And be judge your ſelfe. When the Father cryed with weeping eyes, Lord I beleeve, help my unbeleefe; did the Lord anſwer him roughly, ſirra, I accept no imperfect faith. No, no, he moſt graciouſly accepted his ſome faith, and helped his childe. Doe we not reade it to our great comfort what the Lord bade the Prophet anſwer to Ieroboams wife, that came diſguiſed to aske concerning her ſick ſon, namely, that he only of Ieroboam ſhould come to the grave, becauſe in him there was ſome goodneſſe towards the Lord God of Iſrael? Therefore even ſome goodneſſe, ſome grace, ſome faith ſome love, ſome obedience you ſee is not over looked of our moſt mercifull father, though it be but little. For it is not the quantity but the quality, that is, not how much, but how true, that the Lord regardeth. All thoſe eyes that looked upon the brazen Serpent were not alike great, and yet the leaſt eye received health by that looking. So are not all mens faith alike. For the Lord giveth at his owne good pleaſure in great diverſity, and yet the leaſt being true looketh upon the true ſalve of our ſtings reſembled by the braſen Serpent, Chriſt Jeſus, to eternall life as well as the greateſt. Though our Father chide them for their little faith, yet did he never reject them that had any. Every poore beggers hand is not a like, and yet the leaſt ſerveth him to take a peny as well as the greateſt. So ſhall our hand of faith doe I warrant you, and therefore reach it out with cheere, feare not.

Mar.9.24. 1 Kings 5.13.

Sweet.

Note.

And what if even in that little obedience there be alſo ſome imperfection mingled?

Be it never ſo little, if it come from us, be you ſure it will have his dregs and impuritie. For even all our righteouſneſſe is like a ſtained cloth. But what then? O ſweet God. What did he when the Midwives with a good action intermingled a lie? Did he refuſe their good for their evill? No, no, he received their obedience, though thus ſtained, and mercifully he turned away his face from the other: as a deare father, hath an Eagles eye to ſpie any thing well in his child, and even no eye to ſee what he would not ſee, being the frailties of his choſen children, whereof they ſigh to be disburthened. And it is a beaten truth and knowne to us, that if he looked not away from imperfections and wrath, yea, even winnowed as it were his childrens actions, keeping the graine, and blowing away the chaffe with a breath of mercy in Chriſt, he ſhould never accept any obedience in this world at any mans hand.

Alas then why ſhould we feare ſo often and much as we do, and faint, ſince all things are thus comfortable to the Lords children?

O ſir, theſe feares and wreſtlings, and ſpirituall ſtruglings that the godly are ever ſubject unto, are as the Lords Plow to breake up the fallow ground of our hearts, and to teare them that otherwiſe would be whole lumps, unfit to receive ſeed into fine ſmall earth, ſoft and mellow, and fruitfull, that no ſooner the ſeed may be throwne in, but it ſinketh, and is covered, and ſetteth it ſelfe to fructifie, when otherwiſe it would not, nor could not upon whole ground, but lying onely upon the outward face, and not ſinking, the fowles would devoure it, or at leaſt it take no rooting. And therefore thrice neceſſary and profitable are theſe ſpirituall buffets, now and then to worke in us that broken and contrite heart which the Lord ſhall never deſpiſe. To take from us our ſtony hearts, and to give us fleſhy in their places. Let them bee then as the Lord pleaſeth, eſpecially when he hath given us ſo ſweet a promiſe, that he will never lay more upon us, than he will make us able to beare. Let him plow us, and bruiſe us, and breake us at his pleaſure, it is the Lord, let him doe what ſeemeth him beſt, he knoweth our mould, and his mercy helpe us in all our feares. Amen.

Pſalm. 51. Ezek. 36. 26. 1 Cor. 10. 13.

And Amen ſay I againe to this Prayer, leaving you now to your liberty to go forwards with other temptations as you will.

It is a ſpirituall triall many times to Gods children, to crie and pray, and as they thinke, not to be heard, becauſe their petitions are not by and by granted. But they forget then other deare ones of the Lord, and the Lords often practice. For David in many Pſalmes ſaith, I crie, and thou heareſt not. Iob ſaith, When I crie unto thee, thou doeſt not heare me, neither regardeſt me when I ſtand up. The woman of Canaan cryed heartily, and received no comfort of long, yet did hee heare her well enough, but the end made amends, and ſo ſhall it to us all, as may bee our good, which he beſt knoweth and not we. It is a temptation to be heavy hearted, and wee thinke, O Lord, why ſhould we be thus? Surely ſorrow conſumeth the life, and a chearefull heart prolongeth our dayes. But yet we muſt know what befalleth the godly: My ſoule is powred out upon me, and the dayes of affliction have taken hold upon me, ſaith Iob in his heavineſſe. Davids ſoule was ſad, and it would not preſently be lighted: Yea, from the ends of the earth, ſaith he, will I call unto thee when my heart is in heavineſſe. My heart is ſmitten downe and withered like graſſe, ſo that I forget to eate my bread: with many ſuch places. Sometime for ſinne, ſometime for worldly accidents, ſorrow will aſſault the godly, and being men and women, wee muſt bee content to endure the ſmarts incident to our nature. Yet ever remembring to hold faith and a Chriſtian meaſure in all our ſadneſſe: and many times beating it into our minds, that a chearfull heart pleaſeth God and man: Rejoyce in hope (ſaith the Apoſtle) rejoyce in the Lord, rejoyce in the Lord alway, againe I ſay rejoyce, and evermore rejoyce. What iterations and doublings are theſe? And if the Lord muſt be heard when he ſpeaketh ſingle, how wil he take our deafeneſſe when he ſpeaketh double: The fruit of the Spirit is joy. It cauſeth good health, ſaith Salomon, and refuſe it not then. The greatneſſe of ſinne is another of the uncomfortable meditations now and then of Gods deare ones, they fearing and ſhaking to behold the ſame, leſt the Lords juſtice ſhould breake out againſt it, and conſume them. But, good beloved, let us be wiſe as the Lord would have us, and that is thus, not to meditate of ſinne, but ſtill have an eye to the ſalve of ſinne, Chriſt Jeſus, and then, though it be never ſo terrible by his foule ſhape, and ſeeme never ſo ſtrong to give us a fearfull fall, yet ſhall it be found too weake, and we receive after amazing feare, true comfort againſt it, and the deadly ſting thereof. If a man were upon the top of a high tower without battlements, it would ſeeme fearfull unto him to looke downe: but if he have high and ſtrong battlements that he may take hold on, not ſo. Even ſo it is with ſinne, looke upon it without our ſtrength againſt it, and it aſtoniſheth to death, but with him it vaniſheth as too weake to condemne Gods choſen. Davids adultery and murther were great ſinnes, yet repentance found mercy, and they were pardoned. Peters denyals were great ſinnes, yet in Chriſt raſed out, when he wept bitterly for them. Pauls perſecuting and making havocke of the congregation, was no ſmal offence, yet a wounded heart found a forgiving God, when open eyes ſaw what was done. Thoſe murmuring Jewes after ſo many ſtrange workes and wonders wrought of the Lord for their their deliverance, making a queſtion whether he were amongſt them or no, did they lightly offend? Or doth not the Scripture every where ſpeake of it, as a moſt horrible and dreadfull offence? Yet was there mercy with God, and pardon to repentance. But this courſe might bee long if I ſhould note all particulars.

Let us ſtay therefore with thoſe murdering Jewes, not of a malefactor, but of a juſt one; not of the ſonne of a man, but of the Sonne of God, Chriſt Jeſus; and conſider well whether the earth hath yeelded ſince her firſt creation a greater dignity, or whether the heavens have beheld a more ugly tranſgreſſion? Surely no: neither any whit comparable: yet in Chriſt was this pardonable, and even then when their hands were red with the innocent blood of Chriſt Jeſus, and the ſpeare ſcarce waſhed that pierced his holy heart, even then I ſay, preached Peter pardon to repentance, and as many as repented had mercy. To the greatneſſe of their ſinne adde the unfeelingneſſe of their heart, that had no remorſe for any thing they had done. And then conſider, will the Lord offer mercy before it be ſought, and ſhut up mercy when it is ſought? Will hee ſo graciouſly ſeeke to draw men to repentance, and ſhew no pitie when we repent? Will the Lord forgive the death of his deare Sonne to the bloody murtherers of him, and never bee entreated for ſinnes (though grievous) yet not comparable? God forbid, that after this example of mercy to theſe crucifiers of the Sonne of God, Satan ſhould ever ſhake our faith by feare of any ſinne to be unpardonable, which with wailing hearts wee lament that ever wee committed againſt our deare God. Therefore take faſt hold of it, and print it deeply in your memory. I omit Iacobs children, I omit Manaſſes, I omit many that might bee named, peruſe their ſinnes, and behold with joy in a gracious God their full remiſſion. When the Spirit of truth ſaith, were thy ſinnes as red as Scarlet; doth he meane to comfort againſt ſmall & few offences, or againſt great and many? Truly even againſt all, muſt you needs confeſſe. And if you will not, Saint Iohn will reprove you, who ſaith, that blood ſhall cleanſe us from all ſinne; making no diſtinction of few or many, great or little, ſome or all: And if the Lord diſtinguiſh not, that muſt ſhew me mercy, I defie a diſtinguiſhing devill, of whom I ſeeke no mercy. Conſider it often, that the ſame Apoſtle ſaith, If we acknowledge our ſinne, God is faithfull to forgive us: Making the aſſurance of pardon to a confeſſing ſinner, no leſſe ſure than it is that God is faithfull.

Comfortable.

O beloved, can God be unfaithfull? If he can, then feare: If not, be of good comfort, for ſo certaine is mercy to a bleeding heart, as he is faithfull that can be no other. O ſweet foundation of our wiſhed joy, the Eſſence of our God. Againe, is it not an Article of our faith, that our ſinnes ſhall be pardoned? Will you ſay little ſinnes? God forbid, reſtraine not Gods mercy, deny not your faith, and then muſt you bee comfortable. Remember againe what the Lord Jeſus ſaith: All that the Father giveth me ſhall come to mee, and him that commeth to mee, I caſt not away. VVhat a ſpeech is this, if wee marke it? And what a comfort and joy is there in it, if wee have but even a piece of an heart to receive it? For to let paſſe the former part, ſo plainly taking away diſtinction of Jew or Gentile, of bond or free, in affirming that all that the Father giveth him ſhall come to Chriſt, what Nation or language ſoever they bee of, how ſweet is the ſecond part to a ſinfull ſoule, groaning and ſighing under the burthen of iniquity, ſore laden, and even preſſed downe with thoughts, words and deeds, in the ſight of the Lord damnable? For what might be your caſe, looke at your ſelfe? Have you read in the Law, that if God enter into judgement with you, ſinne is ſo great, that you are but gone? Doe your tranſgreſſions pricke you, and looſe courſe of life begin to ſting you? VVhat then? Are you dead, and will you not live? Are you ill, and will you be no better? Smarteth your ſoule within through the deepe wound of ſinne, and will you have no eaſe? O yes full faine, ſay you, but my ſinnes, my ſinnes are ſo out of meaſure, great and horrible, that I feare the Lord hath caſt mee off, and hath no mercy for mee? Ah Devill avant. Doth my Saviour ſay here, hee that commeth to mee, and is not a very great ſinner, I caſt not away. No, no Satan, my God and Lord, my Chriſt and joy ſpeaketh, indefinitely of any man, of any woman, in any caſe, hee that commeth unto mee, bee hee Jew, bee hee Gentile, be he bond, be hee free, Greeke or Barbarian, and what ſinne or ſinnes ſoever hee bee troubled for, how weake and fraile ſo ever, how poore and vile ſo ever, yea, bee his ſinnes moe than the haires of his head, moe than the ſand of the Sea, ſo that his heart faile him with David for them, yet if hee come to him, hee is welcome, hee is accepted, and he will not caſt him away. O ſoule awake then, bee of good cheare within me, caſt away thy mourning weed, and hearken to thy moſt gracious God, may you ſay. Sorrowing and ſighing for that which is paſt, as my duty is to him will I go, knowing that he is the ſame yeſterday, and to day, and for ever. His pitty decreaſeth not, his mercy fadeth not, others have found it ſo, and why ſhould I doubt of it? Never came ſinner with ſorrow and faith, but hee was accepted, and his owne mouth in this place ſaith it, No man that commeth to mee will I caſt away. Nay, ſee further comfort here by theſe words: VVere it ſo that my heart were as it were cloſed up for a time (the Lords will being in this ſort to exerciſe me, humble me, and trie me) that I could not beleeve, nor pray, nor ſorrow, nor feele any comfort, yet if ever there was a time wherein I could doe theſe things, and did them in and with a feeling of ſweet aſſurance of Gods favour in Chriſt to my poore ſoule, that time doth tell me that the Father hath given me to Chriſt,and that I did come to him then, and now I heare that he that commeth to him,he caſteth not away, never,never. Therefore be of good comfort, his Spirit is not gone, it is but hidden, and with-held for a time,as fire covered with aſhes, it will come againe doubled and encreaſed. For he that is once given to Chriſt of his Father, is never caſt away finally, but reviveth againe, though many times humbled very greatly for a ſeaſon. You have had examples before. And thus in the Lords helpe and bleſſing may this aſſault of the greatneſſe of ſinne be ſalved. Much, and much againe is the ſtrength in Gods Word, that may be brought to lay in this breach, if I intended Volumes. But by this example goe further your ſelfe as you need. Theſe are large fields to walke in,bleſſed be God for his comforts.

Sometimes againe, I know the Lord humbleth his deare ones with this cogitation beating in their inwards, Surely I ſhall not continue, I ſhall have a fall,I doe but flatter my ſelfe with a perſwaſion of Gods favour: for albeit I now doe well, heare the Word, read it,pray,&c. yet indeed I am not ſetled and grounded in the feare of God,for theſe things will away. Many have had as much as I for a time,and yet have fallen away, and ſo I feare me ſhall I. Truely a dangerous temptation, I muſt needs confeſſe, yet no other than appertaineth to man, and bee of good comfort, the Word is ſtronger than this alſo.

Perſeverance.

And firſt againe, it ſerveth that ſhort prayer of the Apoſtles, Lord increaſe our faith: and that of David, Give me the comfort of thy helpe, and eſtabliſh me, eſtabliſh me with thy Spirit. Then thoſe places following,with ſuch like, which you may finde by your owne reading, and partly have beene quoted before,when this temptation almoſt was in ſpeech: I am perſwaded,ſaith the Apoſtle,of the ſame thing, that hee that hath begun this good worke in you,will performe it untill the day of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt. Conſider well of the place, and of the Spirit that directed Paul to ſay it,the Spirit of God,and ſee what a powerfull comfort this may bee, that that Spirit ſhould ſet it downe, that where the graces of God and fruits of righteouſneſſe once appeare in truth, that is, without faining in man or woman, there is an immoveable aſſurance of continuance in the ſame, the meanes being uſed. Why ſhould wee rather then beleeve the father of lies,ſaying we ſhall not continue? Or why ſhould we more be throwne downe with the one, than lifted up with the other? Yet ſee more comfort. For what new thing is ſpoken here, that is not often beat upon elſewhere alſo. When Saul told David he was but a boy, and therefore not able to meet or joyne with that great Goliah,ſo ſtrong a Giant,how did he overthrow this bone caſt againſt his faith, and eſtabliſh his heart againſt that temptation: was not his ſtrength this? I have, O King,found God heretofore my deliverer when I was in danger, and therefore I doubt him not,but he will even now alſo be to me as he hath beene. And what if Satan ſhould have whiſpered in his eare,David thou deceiveſt thy ſelf, by thinking that if God once doe for thee,he will ever do for thee,it is no good argumẽt;would David have beleeved him?No,out of doubt he would have bidden him, avaunt Satan, my argument is good. For a very chiefe end of Gods benefits to man is,to make him ſtill in aſſured truſt to hang upon his government and providence. And therefore as I have found him,ſo will I take him; my Deliverer hath he beene from the Beare & the Lion,and my Deliverer will he be,I feare not,from this uncircumciſed Philiſtine. Againe, when the Apoſtles began to thinke that Chriſt was angry, becauſe they had forgotten to bring bread with them: what ſaith Chriſt? O ye of little faith,doe ye not remember the five leaves,when there were five thouſand men,how many baskets full tooke ye up? Teaching them and all the world that the conſideration of Gods goodneſſe already ſhewed, ſhould mightily aſſure us for the time to come ever. For as he hath beene,ſo will he be,if we beleeve him. This was one cauſe alſo why he inſtituted the Sacrament of his Supper to keep his former goodneſſe in continuall remembrance with us,becauſe that ſuch remembrance is and ought to be moſt effectuall ever to eſtabliſh our faith,as touching the continuance of his favour towards us ſtill. Marke therefore and meditate of this drift of the Lord often, and thinke with your ſelfe, that if a mortall man looke for his benefits,that I ſhould account him not my fickle, but my firme friend, that as hee hath beene,ſo he will be. O how much more may the God of heaven looke for it at my hands, and if my doubting of an earthly friends conſtancy, who hath by many teſtimonies given mee notice of his love,be in truth a foule fault in me; how infecteth it heaven and earth with noyſome ſavour,to miſtruſt a moſt mighty God, nay,a mercifull God, a kinde God, and deare and loving Father,that with millions of mercies teſtified his love and favour without deſert in me, and to make him as a fickle and changing man: farre be it therefore from us ever, but let paſſed grace aſſure our ſoules of future goodneſſe,for ſo would hee have it, and ſo in truth ſhould it. I cannot omit it,and I pray you mark it with me: How when David ſheweth that the Iſraelites forſooke God and his wayes,he addeth for a reaſon as it were of ſuch a fall, They forgot his acts and his wonderfull workes that he had ſhewed them. As if he ſhould have ſaid, had they looked backe ſtill to receive mercy, and kept that diligently in minde, they would never have fallen. Now this could be no reaſon,if this were not a certaine courſe with our living God,that where he beginneth,there he continueth, if the fault bee not ours. Looke therefore at this thing, and bee be of good comfort, your God hath no joy in changing, hee hath ſworne he would not our fall; his word is paſt, that whom he loveth, to the end he loveth them, that his gifts and calling are without repentance, that is, without change. David thus reaſoned, Paul thus reaſoned, Chriſt thus reaſoned, that paſſed mercy ſhould aſſure us future mercy ever, and therefore you ſhall continue, if you continue to pray, to beleeve, to obey, and to ſerve him. Let all the fiends in hell goe ſhake their eares. Humblings are good for the Lords choſen, and hee knoweth what is beſt for every ſonne or daughter. Welcome his ſchoolings when he ſendeth them, endure them patiently, tarry the Lords Leiſure for your lightning. Yet ever know this word what it aſſureth: He that commeth unto me, I caſt not away: The Lord ſupport our weakneſſe. Thus might I in this Treatiſe of inward adverſities, touches and trials, runne a great courſe, for the field is wonderfull wide, but I muſt content my ſelfe. Theſe may ſerve to ſhew that the Word is a ſalve for our grievous ſoares, and to lead ſuch as ſhall bee deſirous of further Phyſicke, into the greene paſtures where is plenty of helpe. See and gather, apply and uſe, the Lord will bleſſe his holy ordinance ever as ſhall be beſt.

Iames 1.12.

Your order leadeth you next to particular adverſities outward.

And if I or any man ſhould ſpeake of them as we might, when or where ſhould wee finde an end? For how many are the troubles of the righteous? Yet the Lord delivereth them out of all. For mine owne part, I have found in two righteous men ſo much as juſtly maketh me to think, that the troubles of all Gods children be indeed very many: I meane Iob and David, whoſe troubles and tryals, if they be peruſed, carefully obſerved, and often thought upon, they may ſtrengthen and comfort moſt men even in their particulars. For what might it be that the Lord layeth upon us, which he layed not upon theſe his deare ones before, and may bee found in them, beſides numbers moe, both in Scripture and other hiſtories recorded to us. Many will ſay, O my life is uncomfortable and full of ſorrow and heavineſſe, griefe and vexation one after another. When as others have their pleaſures and hearts eaſe, and more joy in a day, than I have in a yeare. And what if it pleaſe God ſo, doth he deale any otherwiſe with you, than he doth with thoſe whom he loveth truly, and even to the end? Doth not Iob complaine that his ſoule was even powred out upon him, and the dayes of affliction had taken hold of him: That ſorrow pierced his very bones in the night, and his ſinewes tooke no reſt, that for the great vehemency his very garment was changed, and ſo forth. That his Harpe was turned to mourning, and his Organs into the voyce of them that wept. Yet I hope you know God hated not his ſervant Iob for all this. I pray you alſo remember David with heavy heart and mournfull voice, making his moane to his ſweeteſt God in theſe words: O Lord heare my prayer, and let my crie come unto thee. Hide not thy face from me in the time of my trouble, incline thine eares unto me: when I call, make haſte to heare me. Why David, what is the matter, or what doth urge this woefull crie? O Lord, my dayes are conſumed like ſmoake, and my bones are burnt like an hearth. Mine heart is ſmitten and withered like graſſe, becauſe I forget to eate my bread, for the voyce of my groaning, my bones doe cleave to my skinne. Surely, I have eaten aſhes as bread, and have mingled my drinke with weeping, &c. Reade more of the Pſalme your ſelfe, and remember ever David was a man according to Gods owne heart, for all this humiliation laid upon him at times. Forget it not alſo when you ſit, and ſay little, what was anſwered to that Pamperling of the world, when he was in it: Sonne remember in thy life time thou receiveds thy pleaſures, and likewiſe Lazarus paines, now therefore he is comforted, and thou art tormented. It is not the beſt meate ever that hath ſo ſowre a ſawce commonly. Neither that light affliction ſo greatly to bee abhorred, which being but for a moment in compariſon, cauſeth unto us farre more excellent and an eternall weight of glory. Woe be to you that now laugh, ſaith our Saviour Chriſt, for ye ſhall wayle and weepe: and bleſſed are ye that weep now, for ye ſhall laugh, What ſweeter ſpeech can my ſoule wiſh to be my comfort, if my life be not ſo comfortable? Had I rather now laugh, and hereafter weepe; than now weepe, and hereafter laugh, not for dayes or yeares, but for ever and ever? I will let the Phyſitian of my body, a ſinfull man, mingle my cup as beſt pleaſeth him, for my health, and drinke that ſowre ſup in hope of eaſe hereafter: but my God and Father, my Chriſt and Saviour, the life of my ſoule, ſhall not doe ſo for the good thereof, but full wantonly I will make my choice my ſelfe, and ſweet, ſweet all muſt be, or elſe I will weepe to drinke it. Alas, this is not well: Be it unto us as he will: And great is his favour ever, when wee drinke of no worſe Cup than his owne ſelfe hath begun of to us. If you reade the 21. of Iob, you ſhall ſee that this flouriſhing eſtate in this world, that ſo many wiſh, and ſome in weakneſſe and ignorance waile to want, is not ſo comfortable to the conſcience, deſiring hope of future good, as that we ſhould be ſo greedy of it. And therefore if the Lord deale otherwiſe with us, reſt upon his wiſedome, upon his love, teſtified by the greateſt gift that ever was given, the death of his onely and deare Sonne Chriſt Jeſus, upon his practice with his children ever, and be content. Chriſt dipped the ſop that he gave to Iudas, and did he love him therefore? God give us drie bread with his favour, rather than dipped and dainty ſops with his ire. As many as he loveth, hee rebuketh and chaſtiſeth; and loved Lazarus had never a ſop at all, but would have beene glad of the crummes that fell fell from the rich mans table. Some againe are disdained and contemned in their places where they live, dwell, or serve, and they cannot beare it. Contempt is bitter, and soaking themselves in this sowre meditation, they thinke, O Lord, why should I be thus used more than others? what doe I, or say I, that ought not, or might not receive as favourable face as other men finde? Surely the Lord loveth mee not, &c. But God forbid say I this conclusion. For it followeth not upon the premises, and therefore the argument a subtill devils, and not a true Gods. And I prove it to my comfort by these two servants of God againe, Iob and David. The first complaining, that they that were yonger than he, mocked him, yea, they whose fathers he refused to set with the dogs of his flocks, that is, to be his shepheards, or to keep dogges. They abhorred him, fled farre from him, and spared not to spit in his face. Yea, saith hee, I am their by-word, and as it were a Tabret before them. Surely a great contempt, and greater, I thinke, than you can shew me any, whosoever you are that complaine of contempt; and yet Iob was Iob still before his God for all these abuses in a wretched world, that is, beloved, accepted, regarded, and in the end, when the Lords good pleasure was finished, honored and exalted, that these mocking mates couched and hid their foule faces for shame. And shall I not intreat you to consider it? Againe, the other, what saith he? I am a worme and no man, O Lord, a shame of men, and the contempt of the people. All they that see me, have me in derision, they make a mow at me, and nod their heads. What vile contempt is this? Yet must not David give up the joy of his life for it. But passe on his course in this troublesome Sea, and saile chearfully towards the Haven where hee would be, breaking these waves and surges by a true faith and knowledge of the Lords dealings with his most deare chosen. Imagine you see Herod, and that rushing rout, hoysing their heads like fore-horses over our deare Saviour when Pilate sent him thither, and looking over him, and under him, and on each side him, but not upon him, for feare his baseneſſe should hurt their silver lights. O deare Saviour, shall he be contemned and disdained, excepted and rejected as a silly man, a simple man, one that hath no great stuffe in him to winne him grace with the painted Peacocks of this world, and shall any man or woman take it to heart to follow him with his crosse (if it be a crosse, and not rather a true and great blessing in some respects to us) upon his backe? Fie, fie, of this desire to please men overmuch in this world, it is not good. Thinke againe you see thorow the casement of her window the payre of eyes, that mocking Michol so scornfully cast upon her owne Lord and husband, King David, when shee saw him come dancing before the Arke of God. Remember her reproachfull speech to him; and what was David worse for all this? See and reade againe and againe, what courage he tooke to himselfe, for all this contempt of so neare a friend, and how he answered her, and let it be your example and comfort ever. Michol was the worse, that disdained; David not a whit the worse that was disdained: She plagued with barrennesse for ever; David blessed for his true heart and zeale to God. And it is enough.

Verse 21, 22.

Others observe themselves forsaken daily, of such as they tooke to bee their friends, and to have beene faster knit in affection to them, than as they would have so slunke away. They see a change in their faces that have fawned, in their words, and in their deeds, and in all circumstances. And this grieveth them, they wonder at it, and thinke what have they done to deserve this alteration? Forgetting quite that even this also is one of the Lords exercises, that he traineth up his children in, till they grow to a true knowledge, how fickle & tickle this world and all his shews be, and that it hath been laid upon his chosen in great measure. For what a pittifull complaint maketh Iob of this matter, if you marke it. The Lord hath removed (saith he) my brethren farre from me, and also, mine acquaintance were strangers unto me. My neighbours have forsaken me, and my familiars have forgotten me. They that dwell in my house, and my maids tooke me for a stranger in their sight: I called my servant, but he would not answer, though I prayed him with my mouth. Yea, my breath was strange to mine owne wife, though I prayed her for the childrens sake of mine owne bodie. All my secred friends abhorred me, and they whom I loved are turned against me. Hath any man tasted of a greater change than this man did, or may a man taste of a greater? Surely this was a great one, and it should be a sure prop to hold up our sliding feete for any alteration of men from us. David complained of the like, that the Lord had hid his acquaintance out of his sight, that they that did see him without in the streets, conveyed themselves from him. And what then? Such hath beene the world, such is it, and for such take it, if you bee wise. To day a friend, to morrow none; to day in my bosome with sugred words, to morrow in my face with sharpe arrowes. Iosephs owne brethren changed upon him with a great change, when he least thought it, and lesse marvell if his Master so changed for no just cause, Putiphar I meane, that made so much of him. Moses and Aaron found great alterations of mens mindes, if you marke the story, and O Lord, saith Moses, they are ready to stone me, that earst had bowed downe and worshipped at their first comming. To cut downe Palmes and strew them in the way, and to cry Hosanna, blessed is he that commeth in the name of the Lord, is another note than crucifie him, his blood be upon us and our children. Of these experiences the world is full, and the Word of God hath store: cast them together for your stay, when you reade them, and take the world, world, and all the faces and fawnes of the ſame as they are, and ever have been, that is for fickle and moſt ſlippery. Your Maſter Chriſt, and your fellow ſervants have found it ſo, and for Gods ſake ſeeke not to be ſingular your ſelfe, it is enough for the ſervant to be like his Maſter, ſeeke not to be above him. If Iob finde his owne wife changed, ſhall he wonder at others? No, no: Uſe them, and take them as ſubject to changes when God will. And his will be done. Many are bitten behinde their backes, and privily ſlandered, yea gnawed to the very bones with the teeth of the ungodly, and it grieveth them ſore. But forget not then that this alſo is the lot of the righteous, of Ioſeph, of Iob, of David, of thouſands. Forget they not Paul approving himſelfe by honor, and diſhonor, by evill report, and good report, as a deceiver, yet true. And in another place, We are evill ſpoken of, and yet we pray, we are made as the filth of the world, the off-skowring of all things unto this time. There was never man could eſcape this yet, neither ever any ſhall, if hee pleaſe God. For even of Chriſt himſelfe, ſome ſaid he was a Deceiver, and many prittle pratles had they of him in their meetings: Wo be to you, ſaith the Lord himſelfe, when all men ſpeake well of you, for ſo did their Fathers to the falſe Prophets. And it is a ſpeech of weight againſt this temptation, if it be often thought of: If I ſhould yet pleaſe men, ſaith the Apoſtle, I were not the ſervant of Chriſt. It is a daintineſſe unfit for a Chriſtian, to be able to beare no back-biters. Some will to the Devill for their privie pratling to the hurt of their neighbours, though wee ſweare the contrary, and heartily wiſh the contrary. There is no helpe for them; onely ſtand you out of their way, that the faſter they runne, the ſooner they may come thither, and the world be rid of them, for ſurely they are in haſte a number, and they ſeeme to feare nothing more, than that hell gates ſhould be ſhut, and the play begun before they come. The Lord will be glorified by their death, and the Lord make us glorifie him by our patience, and by our carefull ſhunning of all juſt cauſe of any evill report: That ſuffering this bitter poyſon of Aſpes that is under their tongues, and upon their tongues, and in their tongues, not for evill doing, but undeſervedly, our joy may be true, and our comfort breed a contented patience, ever. Amen.

Divers complaine they are rewarded with evill for good, and they fret at it ſore, to have true good will, and many honeſt teſtimonies of a friendly minde ſo badly, ſo unkindly, yea ſo vildely requited. And indeed it is true that ſuch undeſerved unkindneſſe pierceth deepe, and hath prevailed with ſome, even to the breaking of their hearts, and the ending of their dayes. But alas, it ſhould not be ſo hot in us, if God gave government over fraile fleſh, according to true reaſon: for if falſe man turne his backe upon God, that hath in ſuch wonderfull and unſearchable favour uſed him, and with ſuch an incomprehenſible and unmeaſurable heape of mercies, filled his cup from his cradle, and before; what marvell though he turne upon one of us (whoſe favours, though great, yet cannot be like theſe) both backe, and heart, and tongue and teeth, and all the powers he hath any way? Truely this onely ſhould content us, when we finde ſuch meaſure in the world. But wee have, beſide, the company in this croſſe of ſuch great and deare ones to the Lord, that we ſhould be even glad we may goe along with them and partake with them in no worſe thing, than the Lord thought good to lay upon them: David complaineth, they rewarded me evill for good, to the great diſcomfort of my ſoule; nevertheleſſe when they were ſick, I put on ſackcloth, & humbled my ſoul with faſting, I behaved my ſelf as though it had bin my friend or brother, I went heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother. But in mine adverſity (marke it) they rejoyced, and gathered themſelves together, yea the very abjects came together againſt me unawares, making mowes at me, and ceaſed not. Wee have Iacob a companion in this croſſe with us, who was ill rewarded both by affection and action of Laban and his children; wee have Ioſeph with us, Moſes and Aaron with us, all the Prophets and Apoſtles with us, and Chriſt our Maſter with us, whoſe love was loſt to thouſands, except a Crucifige be a kind requitall, and againſt whom he that ſate at his table lift up his heele and betrayed him. O weigh it not much, but be content, and poſſeſſe your ſoule in patience: For it is even one of the moſt common ſinnes of this world, in theſe latter dayes eſpecially. Unthankfull men without naturall affection, truthbreakers, falſe accuſers, no lovers at all of them that bee good, Traitors, &c. They are the flowers that flouriſh ſo faire in this end of the world, ſaith the Apoſtle. And what man or woman almoſt liveth, that hath not drunke of this cup, to be unkindly requited for their true good will, and to have the backs of them towards them, whoſe faces by good right they ſhould have, and their mouthes filled with many loving thankes? If then company bee comfortable, as the ſaying is, let us pluck up our hearts, and be content, eſpecially having ſuch company in this croſſe, as I have now named.

To be rewarded evill for good, tempteth many.

wrongfull and unjuſt: and ſo did he Ioſeph, Ieremy, Micheas, and many moe. Some with their mariage and match often bitter: ſo did he Iob, Tobiah, Abigail, and others. David had evill children, and Iacob before him many a heavy heart by their behaviours. The good Prophet had a bad ſervant, a vile Gehezi, that practiſed more than ever he learned of his maſter; and our Saviour Chriſt himſelfe had a theeviſh Iudas, a full bad bird to come out of ſuch a neſt, as he had his time in. Some bee rimed on by drunken toſſe pots, and ſo was David, though hee little deſerved it. And who can name the adverſities of the godly? Many, many ſaith the Prophet, are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of all. By this example, whoſoever readeth the Scriptures may find out moe, obſerve and mark them, and gather comfort by them, if the Lord ſhall pleaſe ſo to deale with them. And to that further travell I refer us all, not following this courſe now any further, only this I add, that if you can find no example of your caſe fully in the Scripture: and thereupon Satan would be buſie, and ſay, ſee, thou art an odde perſon from all others, I warrant thee God never dealt ſo with any of his, &c. then beleeve Peter rather than him, and tell him hee lieth like a falſe devill: For you are taught there, that the ſame afflictions are accompliſhed in your brethren which are in the world, although you know them not, 1 Pet. 5.9. And therefore you are no odde one, neither chaſtiſed any otherwiſe, than with the rod of the righteous, whoſe ſalvation is ſure, and they the Lords.

Pſal. 34.

O, but you muſt needs give mee leave to remember yet one thing ere you make an end, and that is this; Theſe examples are comfortable, I heartily confeſſe, and ſweet when wee finde them in our ſeverall trials, but yet Satan hath another tricke to trouble many mindes withall, and that is, with the meaſure of our trouble. He will, till we finde an example, ſay none are ſo dealt with all that God loveth, but when we have found one, then he ſhifteth his foot, and ſuggeſteth, not in that meaſure, and ſo grievouſly and greatly as we are. Now what ſhould we ſay to this?

The meaſure of adverſity, a ſubtill temptation.

Truely even ſtill ſearch the Scriptures: And as we have found their matter, ſo ſhall we finde meaſure, I warrant you, greater than wee beare any. And to this end, marke what Iob ſaith in his ſixteenth Chapter, His archers compaſs me round about, he cutteth my reines, and doth not ſpare, and powreth my gaule upon the ground. He hath broken me with one breaking upon another, and runneth upon me like a Giant. Here you ſee not onely adverſity and affliction, but even a marvellous meaſure, and yet the man deare to the Lords heart that endured it. Every word hath a power to expreſſe a great temptation, if you marke them. Compaſſed round about, his reines cut, not ſpared, his very gaule as it were powred out, one breaking upon another, and runne upon with the Lord, as with a Giant. Are you able to ſay you have ſuch meaſure of woe upon you? you cannot if you will ſpeake truth. And yet was Iob for all this meaſure, as I ſay, the Lords choſen. In the nineteenth Chapter, marke againe his phraſe: His armies, ſaith he, came together, and made their way upon me, and camped about my tabernacle. Before he ſaid, the Lords archers, now hee ſaith, the Lords armies, ſtill noting both great number, and great ſtrength. What can you or I ſay? happely wee may ſay, the Lord hath ſhot one headleſſe arrow at us, to awake us out of earthly and worldly ſecurity, happely an arrow with a head, that hath ſomewhat pierced, let it bee two or three, or twenty; alas, this is not the number of the Lords archers, this is not to feele the armies of the Lord, and his battels, even all his battels joyned together againſt us. I pray you therefore ſtill marke Iobs meaſure, and your meaſure, and yet Iob loved. In his thirtieth Chapter, Thou turneſt thy ſelfe cruelly againſt me, and art enemy unto mee with the ſtrength of thy hand. Thou takeſt mee up, and cauſeſt mee to ride upon the winde, and makeſt my ſtrength to faile. When hee ſaith cruelly, his meaning is not to accuſe God, but to declare the vehemency of his affliction, whereby hee was carried beſide himſelfe. And by the word, Winde, hee compareth his afflictions to a tempeſt or whirlwinde. Therefore ſtill note the meaſure. Wee may ſafely acknowledge the Lords rod upon us, but yet may wee not ſay, it is all his rod, when it is but a twigge. And I aſſure my ſelfe, if wee looke at Iobs meaſure, ours is ſcarſe a twigge. How then ſhould Satan whiſper any diſcomfort to us for our meaſure, whatſoever it is, when it is not comparable to his, whom we know notwithſtanding loved. Was David lightly humbled when he ſaid: There is no whole part in my body, by reaſon of my ſinnes: when hee cried, Why art thou ſo ſad my ſoule, and why art thou ſo diſquieted within me? ſtill truſt in God, &c. Was it a little meaſure that Abraham and Iſaac ſo wandered, toſſed from pillar to poſt (as we ſay) in perils and feares, and many afflictions, and yet obtained not the promiſe? Was it a little meaſure that Iacob ſuſtained, firſt, to have his owne and onely brother ſweare his death, as it were, then to leave father and mother, houſe and home, Countrey and friends, and to ſeeke for a world abroad, to ſerve painfully his owne Uncle, and in the end to be unkindly requited with another than he wiſhed: to begin other ſeven yeeres againe, or elſe loſe his deſire: to bee pinched in his wages, envied and maliced by his owne fleſh, driven to depart without any farewell, purſued after, vexed with wrongfull accuſations and charges: to have the wife whom hee loved, not altogether upright in judgement of Religion, his bed defiled by his eldeſt ſonne, his daughter raviſhed and taken away, a horrible murther committed by Simeon and Levi, upon that quarrell: Ioſeph ſold, but as he thought, murthered by a wilde beaſt, with many moe very bitter and ſmarting temptations, if you marke the story? Thus may you then goe over the Scriptures, and see the measure of others many: compare it with yours, and be truely comforted if God so will: For certainly wee are not tried and humbled like these men, your owne conscience must acknowledge it, and reason will evict it, whether you will or no. For if God lay no more upon any, then according to his ability to beare: and our faith, when the greatest, yet is inferiour to those, then assuredly our trials are inferiour also: And so their examples, our true comfort against this assault drawne from the measure that we endure. Follow then this course, and as you reade, marke not onely matter of afflictions, but measure, and I warrant you this lying devill will hide his head, convinced with a truth.

1 Cor. 10.

Your order now leadeth you to review how man tempteth or trieth man. But that having in my opinion sufficiently been touched before, it will not bee amisse if you goe to the last point, namely, how Satan tempteth us.

The same temptation may come from God and Satan in diverse respects.

And I altogether put my selfe upon your direction, yet with this note by the way, that the selfe same temptations may be said to proceed from Satan, that otherwise have been said to come from God. From Satan in malice, from God in mercy. From Satan, as they urge and perswade us to any evill contrary to the Word: from the Lord, as they open to us our weaknesse in faith, and sundry corruptions, driving us to himselfe, as to our true strength and support in all our weaknesse. Which being remembred, then say we concerning this division, that the temptations of Satan are infinite, and cannot be named of any man, albeit felt of all men, as the Lord will give him leave to shew his malice, of some more, of some lesse, and of every one somewhat. Hee tempteth in judgement to error and heresie, hee tempteth in life to sinne and impiety: and what infinite branches have these two heads? The errors and heresies that have beene of old, what an heape are they, if I should take this course, or who can tell what even yet daily hee worketh in this behalfe throughout the world, stuffing mens heads, and filling their hearts with great untruths.

Temptations in { Iudgement. Life.

The first temptation concerning the Church.

Some hee hath perswaded heretofore, and still, no doubt, will perswade, if God permit him, that an estate of the true Church here on earth, is to bee expected more perfect and holy, than indeed is true. And hee telleth them, that if any Church bee so separated from the world, that therein indeed and truth all mens lives bee framed according to the word of God, that is a true Church: and if any Church bee not so separated from the world, but that in it are found some without repentance, which live not according to the word of God, but have their blots and spots, both in faith to God, and love to man, that is a false Church, from which the children of God must separate themselves, lest they should be partakers of other mens sinnes. So that the imperfections of a Church, and the faults of some in the Church, not removed by and by from the same, shall utterly take away both name and nature of a Church from that place. A great and grievous untruth surely, and such as wee may say of with S. Hilary, Archangeli nescivunt, Angeli non audiverunt, Propheta non sensit, Filius ipse non edidit: The Archangels know it not, the Angels have not heard it, the Prophet hath not felt it, the Sonne of God himselfe hath revealed no such thing to us. For was not Iudas a wicked theefe in the company of the Apostles, and yet they, for all that, the flock of Christ? Hath not the Lord described the estate of this true Church militant here on earth, by the similitudes of a draw-net cast into the sea, that incloseth and compasseth fish of all sorts, yea, stickes and stones, slime and mudde, without any separation, till it come to the shore? Of a field, wherein with the good Wheat sowen by the Husbandman, come up tares, sowen by the envious man, and so intermingled, that no cleare separation can be made, but with danger of plucking up the Wheat also, till the harvest come? Of a floore, whereon lieth much good wheat, but covered almost and hid in an heape of chaffe intermingled with it, till the Fanner come with his fanne in his hand to purge the same, and make cleane his floore? Of a great Wedding, whereunto as good and bad are bidden; so come there some and take their places, that yet have no wedding garments, sitting with the best, till the King come in to see the guests, and displace them?

Matt. 13. 47.

Matt. 22. 1.

And are not these plaine proofes, what manner of Church we must content our selves withall here on earth, till the day of perfection come, namely, even with such a one, as though considered in Christ, it be cleane, and without spot and wrinkle: yet considered in it selfe it is not so, before it come to the marke it shooteth at, but in this life runneth in a race, and after two sorts is stained and impure.

First, with the manifold imperfections, frailties and wants, which her best children are burdened withall ever, feeling with the Apostle, that in their flesh dwelleth no good thing, that they are yoaked as hee was, and farre worse, that when they would doe good, evill is present with them: and secondly, with a grievous mixture of many false hypocrites and counterfeit pratlers amongst her true children, whom though she sigh to be delivered of, and doe by her authority, as she may, disburthen her selfe of them, yet can she never doe it so cleane, but that many vile weeds will remaine till the Harvest, to bee then plucked up, and till then in patience to bee endured.

Rom. 7. 18, 21.

Let

Let us conſider the Church from her very cradle, and wee finde the ſtate of it after this ſort. Adam in his family had Cain, with his wicked behaviour, and yet a Church. Noah had Cham, and yet a Church. Abraham had Iſmael, a mocker and derider of Gods promiſes: A man borne after the fleſh, that is, after the common courſe of Nature, and perſecuting him that was borne after the Spirit, that is, by the vertue of Gods promiſe, and after a ſpirituall manner, and yet a Church. Iſaac had Eſau, and yet a Church. Iacob had great miſdemeanours committed ſtill in his family, by all his ſonnes, envying and malicing, and moſt unbrotherly uſing Ioſeph. By Ruben defiling his bed, by Simeon and Levi, brethren in evill, inſtruments of cruelty, and in their wrath ſlaying ſo many: by Dinah his daughter, by Rachel his wife, ſtealing her fathers Idols, and but over-much deceived with them, and by many other meanes, if wee fully peruſe the ſtory, and yet a Church. Neither did ever Adam or Noah, or Abraham, or the reſt, forſake theſe Churches in their ſeverall Families, or refuſe to pray, and to doe all other duties enjoyned them of the Lord, for any unworthy ones among them. Then when it came into Ægypt, was it without wrinckles? When it was delivered there hence, remember wee not, what falls and faults, what blots and blemiſhes ſtill, ſtill, and ever appeared in that choſen company out of all the Nations of the world? Need I to repeat their murmurings, their revilings, their faintings, their many and great impieties, mentioned in the ſtory, under Moſes, under Ioſhua, and under the Iudges? Step to the Kings, and to the Prophets, what a ſtate is mentioned of this Church militant under them alſo ever?

Calvin upon the place.

Were all things holy and perfect then? Let Eſay, Ieremy, Ioel, Abakkuk, and the reſt ſpeak. In the Prieſts, in the Magiſtrates, in the people, all things were then ſo corrupt, that the Prophet Eſay is not afraid to compare Hieruſalem to Sodom and Gomorrah. Religion was then partly contemned, partly defiled, and many grievous enormities in manners abounded: ſo that from the ſole of the foot, to the top of the head there was nothing whole, but wounds, and ſwellings, and ſores, full of corruptions, ſaith the Prophet.

Eſay 1. 2. reade the Chapter.

Yet for all this, never did the Prophets, all, or any of them, erect new Churches for themſelves, wherein they might have their ſeparated Sacrifices from the reſt, offered upon any new Altars, builded to that end as more holy. But what manner of men ſoever they were, becauſe the word was there, and a courſe of Service warranted in the thicke of the wicked, and in the middeſt of miſdoers, they lifted up pure hands to the Lord, and came together even with the wicked to pray, to ſacrifice, to heare the Word, and to doe their duties in the places appointed.

In medio impiorum cœtu puras manus extendebant, & cum populo iniquo & perverſo conveniebant, Calv.

Truely we muſt thinke this of thoſe holy Prophets, that if they had judged other mens ſinnes, could have defiled their holy duties, or that any infection or contagion might have come to them, by meeting in thoſe places of Gods Service with the wicked, they would have died an hundred times, rather than have ſuffered themſelves to be drawne thither. But they knew it could not, and having a ſingular care of peace and unity in the Church, they therefore abhorred to make any ſchiſme in the ſame, by ſeparating themſelves from the Church.

Now, if thoſe worthies of the Lord, for ſo many and great evils, not of one or two men, but even almoſt of the whole people, made a conſcience, yet not to eſtrange themſelves from the Church, ſhall not you and I arrogate too much to our ſelves, if wee preſume to doe it in theſe dayes? Will not that ſaying of S. Auguſtine bee laid upon us, ſpoken to the Donatiſts upon like occaſion? Finxerunt ſe nimis juſtos, cùm totum vellent perturbare: They made themſelves too holy, when they would thus trouble all? Therefore a ſweet moderation of all good deſires, according to theſe true preſidents and holy examples, aſſuredly would bee moſt acceptable to the Lord himſelfe, as it was in theſe.

Come wee from the Prophets to our Saviour Chriſt himſelfe, that if any man make leſſe account of the former than hee ſhould, this latter may move him, and ſatisfie him further. What manner of Church was then, the Goſpel teacheth at large, and wee are not ignorant, when Chriſt lived and preached amongſt the Jewes. A moſt corrupt eſtate it was, and full of ſores, that Chriſt ſharply reproved in his times. Yet neither that deſperate impiety of the Phariſees, nor that looſe liberty that overflowed as it were the Church then, could hinder Chriſt, either from uſing the ſame forme of ſerving God with the people, or from comming into the ſame Temple, with the multitude, to the publike exerciſes of Religion there appointed. But he would bee circumciſed with the reſt, and preſented in the Temple as others were, when the time came, and doe all things with them, appointed by the Law for him to doe.

Luke 1. 21, 22.

If any man doubt of it, let him conſider the Scripture well, that ſaith, When the fulneſſe of time was come, God ſent forth his Sonne, made of a Woman, and made under the Law, that hee might redeeme them which were under the Law, that we might receive the adoption of ſonnes. He ſpeaketh of the Ceremoniall Law by name, and therefore no queſtion but he performed whatſoever therein was commanded, and of Man, whom he was to redeeme, ought to be performed. Let him conſider alſo Chriſts own words, when he ſaid, We worſhip what we know, joyning himſelfe not with a few picked and choice Chriſtians, but with the whole multitude of the people of the Jewes, and adding a reaſon that proveth ſo much. For ſalvation commeth from the Iewes : Which is as much as if he ſhould have ſaid, for the Religion (not of ſome certaine, but) of the whole, or body of the Jewes, is a ſervice that pleaſeth God, ſfor his owne appointment of it, and therefore I communicate with them therein my ſelfe,and we worſhip what we know together.

Gal. 4 4.

Muſculus in Ioh. pag.102.

Muſculus conſidering as much, therefore noteth by our Saviours examples, what care and conſcience ought to be in every Chriſtian, to obſerve the forme of his owne Nation in ſerving God, if it may be warranted. And it is not unnoted of many others, that our Saviour notwithſtanding the great corruptions of that Church, communicated with it in all holy exerciſes, and made not another Church by himſelfe of ſome certaine better people,and yet there wanted not ſuch even in thoſe evill daies divers ; as Zachary, Elizabeth, Mary, Simeon, and others, beſides his Diſciples. So that our Saviours example is plaine againſt this deceiving error that we ſpeake of: namely, that any man communicating in the publike exerciſes of Religion, according to the word of God appointed, with the wicked, ſhould by their company bee polluted, hee himſelfe having a good conſcience,and doing his duty as he ought.

He entred ſtill into their Synagogues and preached,and prayed, &c. on the ſabbath day.

From our Saviour Chriſt, let us next come to his Diſciples times; and ſee if they followed not the very ſame courſe, and trode not in the very ſame ſteps of their Maſters practiſe.

1 Cor.1.2. Chap 3.3.

Let us remember the Church of Corinth, which the Apoſtle in the Spirit of truth, called the Church of God : Sanctified, Beloved, and abounding with the gifts of God. And yet in it were many imperfections, and ſundry great and foule enormities. There was envying, and ſtrife, and diviſions ; one holding of Paul, another of Apollos, another of Cephas : in ſo much that the Apoſtle telleth them they are carnall, and hee could not ſpeake unto them,as unto ſpirituall men, but as unto carnall.

1 Cor.4.18.& Chap.5.2,21. 1 Cor.5.1.

There was puffing, and ſwelling, and pride in ſuch order, that the Apoſtle asketh,Shall I come unto you with a rod, or in love ? There was fornication, and even ſuch as is not named among the Gentiles : one had his fathers wife, and they that ſaw it, and knew it,were puffed up, and ſorrowed not ; neither puniſhed as they ought ſo foule a wickedneſſe. There was quarrelling and brabling, and buſie going to law one with another, and that under Infidels. Men and women that were maried together, made ſeparation and divorces of themſelves one from another, of their owne authorities, and when themſelves liſted, without word and warrant, without right and conſcience,which the Apoſtle rebuketh,and telleth them it might not be ſo.

Chap.6. 7.5.13.

There was going to the prophane bankets of the Gentiles, and eating of things ſacrificed to Idols, with great offence to the weake. The very Sacrament of the Lords Supper was greatly prophaned, thoſe ſpirituall gifts which the Lord gave them, they abuſed, bragging ambitiouſly of them, and ſo robbing God of his praiſe for them, having no conſideration of their brethren, to edifie them by an humble minde, ſubmitting it ſelfe to the capacity of the weakeſt.

On the other ſide,they that were inferiour in gifts, envied the ſuperiours, and went about to make a departure,ſo that all that body was as it were ſcattered and rent in pieces. That notable gift of Tongues and Languages they greatly abuſed,neglecting Propheſie. And what ſhould I ſay, the very Reſurrection,that great article of Chriſtian faith,was called in queſtion in that Church : and for all that, and all theſe that I have thus named, it ceaſed not to bee a Church, and the Church of God, and ſanctified, and bleſſed, and made rich with many graces : neither for theſe blots might any man have been juſtified then, to have given it the black-ſtone of condemnation, and to have ſeparated himſelfe from it, as from no Church.

Chap.14. 1 Cor.15.

Let us remember the Galathians,of whom the Apoſtle complaineth,that they were ſo ſoone remooved away unto another Goſpel,from him that had called them in the grace of Chriſt, that they were bewitched not to obey the truth, but to turne againe unto impotent and beggerly rudiments, ſeeking to bee in bondage to them againe, as at the beginning. That they obſerved daies,moneths,times and yeeres,&c. Every of which was a great blot and ſpot,and all together, a very great declining from a right courſe; yet nevertheleſſe doth the Apoſtle in the Spirit of truth ſalute them, as the Church of God, and ſo nameth them, and ſo taketh them.

Gal.1.6. 2.1. 4.9.

Chap.1.2. To the plaine proving of this Truth, that imperfections in a Church, where the Word is preached truely, and the Sacraments adminiſtred according to the inſtitution of Chriſt, taketh not away the name of a Church.

And marke it in Paul, becauſe we ſeek not now other examples,how notwithſtanding theſe great blemiſhes in Corinth, Galathia,and other places that he came to, yet hee ever without any ſcruple entred into their Churches, into the Jewes Synagogues, and into all places, to pray,and to interpret the Scriptures. Yeā, hee made no doubt to exhibit himſelfe in the Temple, to call upon God,and to uſe other lawfull ceremonies, together with others that uſed them : although the wickedneſs and impiety of the Scribes and Phariſees which were there then,was exceeding foule and great. Neither doth he perſwade any of the better ſort,when he ſpeaketh of the faults either in Corinth or Galathia, or other Churches, to forbeare all Communion with thoſe Churches, till things were better reformed, but onely exhorteth them to beware the vices and evills hee ſpeaketh of, and never mentioneth any ſeparation. Which aſſuredly hee would have have done, if it had beene as Satan by this temptation that now we handle, ſeekes to perſwade.

Therefore (I pray you) let us all note it, and thinke of it. And as hee did not forbid others ſuch Communion, ſo himſelfe did not break that Fellowſhip, as already hath appeared, and more may if we marke his practiſe. For he ſaith to the Philippians, that hee had no body like Timotheus, but all did ſeeke their owne, and not that which is Jeſus Chriſts. Yet never doe we finde that hee ſeparated himſelfe from their company for feare of partaking with their ſinnes. And divers ſuch other places there are. Phil. 2 21.

What might be added of thoſe famous Churches in the Revelation, Epheſus, Pergamus, Thyatira, and others? Doth not the Spirit of God lay downe their blemiſhes, and ſheweth what he had againſt them and thoſe no little things ſome of them, and yet yeeldeth them the names and titles of Churches, and calleth their Miniſters Angels? What then if a man in thoſe daies ſhould have taken offence at theſe wants of theſe Churches, and weakneſſe of men, and have ſaid they have preaching, but they are not reformed as they ſhould be, and therefore I will cut my ſelfe from them, and communicate no longer with them: would it have beene allowed? Conſider the Lord Ieſus his preaching, with more holineſſe and power than ever any elſe could or ſhall. Were all reformed that heard him? Nay were his own Diſciples reformed wholly? How then were they ſo often rebuked of the Lord, and that juſtly? Conſider the Prophets that were bidden propheſy, and did it carefully, and yet were told that the people would not obey them. Conſider the Apoſtle that ſaith, we are a ſweet ſavour to God in ſome that periſh. Conſider that he which willeth Paul to plant, and Apollo to water, reſerveth the gift of encreaſe to himſelfe, and giveth it where, when, and ſo farre as hee pleaſeth. So that if the Lords Miniſters in very great heavineſſe, and continuall ſorrow of heart would wiſh themſelves even ſeparated from Chriſt for their brethrens winning, yet ſhall no moe come to the Father than Chriſt will draw, and this happy change muſt bee at his good pleaſure, not at their deſire. How then may wee ſafely fall out with the preaching and Preacher, and with the Church and her Children for want of that which onely God muſt give, and the beſt Preachers have failed to obtaine, though faithfully doing their duties, namely, a full reformation as wee would? Shall that holy Word not reforme me, becauſe it reformeth not others? ſhall it not be a ſavour to me of life to life, becauſe to others it is a ſavour of death to death? If he offer me a penny ſhall I bid him keepe it, except he will give others as much at my direction? May not the Lord doe with his owne as it pleaſeth him for me? or ſhall I grudge to the Spirit his blowing where he liſteth? O fearefull falling out with the Lord and his offered goodneſſe, if it be conſidered earneſtly. Preaching without reformation. Mar. 9. Eſay 6. 9. Ezek. 3. 7. Note.

Wee ſhould remember againe when wee looke ſo farre after the fruits of amendment in a Church, and ſtumble ſo grievouſly for want of what we wiſh, that Phariſees make greater ſhewes to ſome mens eyes than poore Publicanes doe, and yet the one juſtified more than the other with a righteous God. Wee ſhould remember that Elias was deceived when he thought that there were no moe that were reformed but himſelfe. Our eyes cannot ſee all men, neither can wee know the worke of the word preached. Inward graces are often where we thought not, and outward carry more than we know. Some judged lead proves fined gold, and gliſtring gold that ſeemed to bee, proves droſſie lead. A tender conſcience, ſweet feeling, an hope in Chriſt and his promiſes, inward cryings by faithfull prayer, holy thoughts and meditations, ſweet pricks, and melting motions, remorſe for ſinne, and ſpirituall ſighes, humility of heart, and peace of mind, patience, joy, and a number ſuch, they be ſecret graces, not alwaies knowne and diſcerned of every man where in truth they are, at leaſt not in ſuch meaſure as indeed they are. And therefore ſince wee cannot know all, either people, or graces, wrought by the word preached, and there may be a want aſwell in our not ſeeing all with Elias, as in mens miſdoings: greatly ſhould we feare to condemne and judge the Churches of God, for not anſwering their teaching with any reformation, It is an earneſt charge, and of a mighty God, See that ye deſpiſe not one of theſe little ones: For I ſay unto you, that in heaven their Angels alwayes behold the face of my Father which is in heaven. What greater contempt, than to thinke that the Publican is not like me: I am reformed, I am ſanctified, I have received the holy Ghoſt, others have not, and theſe by name have not ſo. O take heed. Judge not thus raſhly another mans ſervant. All is not gold that gliſtreth, neither all bowers of their knees to Baal, that are yet ſo thought to be, even of a Prophet. Matt. 18 10.

Laſtly, wee ſhould lift up our heads, and open our eyes in a loving heart, a little the wider, that we may ſee the Prophets of the Word, and the gracious mercies of the Lord to any Church ever, and with as hungry a heart, delight to diſcerne the graces of men, as the faults of men. Yea much more. And if wee ſee many ſuperſtitions baniſhed, many abuſes mended, many ſeared conſciences, and fettered ſoules enlarged, true love of divers good things, and true hatred of divers evill things wrought: Ugly, and often oathes in many decayed, knowledge both in youth and age increaſed, the hearing of the Word, with Prayers and Sacraments diligently frequented, private regard of families, in the governours of them greatly amended, diet and apparell tempered, the poore relieved, Princes obeyed, peace maintained, &c. To confeſſe then, The reformation of many Churches, yet iudged not reformed at all.

to the due glory of a gracious God, that this is ſomething, and this meaſure ſome, although not all. Love ſpieth any good, where it loveth, and love covereth many things that are not well. Surely, it doth not for wants deny the good, neither for ſome, condemne all.

And thus, if we ſhould looke at Churches, and children of the Churches, no doubt, no doubt, Satans combe would be cut, touching this temptation.

If any man will ſay, ſhew me theſe reformed and good ones in Churches: What anſwereth a learned Father? Quid hàc re opus eſt? Annon ſatis eſt eos in Eccleſia eſſe? Quamobrem cùm ipſa communionem habetote, manete in Eccleſia, & ad ſacros cœtus & ſacramenta, quemadmodum oportet, accedite. Etiamſi enim multi impuri, & publici peccatores non mundati in ea ſint, tamen vos ab illis non polluemini non magis quàm Apoſtolos Iudæi polluerunt. Quin potius videte ne a vobis ipſis polluamini, propterea quòd multum vobis tribuitis, judicatis omnes, & plurimum vobis placetis. Itaq; ſpiritualis ſuperbia & contemptus nimium veſtris animis incidet. That is: What needeth this? Sufficeth it not that they are in the Church? Wherefore with the Church do you communicate, abide ye in her, and come ye as ye ought unto the aſſemblies and Sacraments. For although there be many impure ones, and publike offenders, not reformed in the ſame, yet ſhall not you be defiled by them, no more than the Apoſtles were defiled of the Jewes. Rather take you heed that yee be not defiled of your ſelves, becauſe ye attribute ſo much to your ſelves, yee judge all men, and very much pleaſe your ſelves. Therefore ſpirituall pride and contempt overmuch reſteth in your mindes.

Thus doe wee ſee the word of God againſt this temptation, teaching ſtrength. If I ſhould adjoine the witneſſes of this truth from time to time, I might be long. A little let mee doe it, though not much, becauſe I have been ſo long already.

Lib. 2. Epiſt. 5. Cyprian ſpake thus in his time full earneſtly; Etſi videntur in Eccleſia zizania, &c. Although there be tares ſeene in the Church, and impure veſſels of diſhonor, yet is there no cauſe why we ſhould depart from the Church: onely let us endeavour that we may bee wheat our ſelves, and veſſels of gold or ſilver unto honour. And as for the earthen veſſels, it is the Lords proper office and prerogative to breake them, that hath onely the non-barre; Neither may any man challenge to himſelfe that which is peculiar to the Sonne onely, namely, to bee able to make cleane the floore, and to purge away the chaffe, and all tares by mans judgement. For proud is this obſtinacy, and ſacrilegious is this preſumption, which wicked madneſſe taketh to it ſelfe.

Parmen. Auſten in his time thus: There were many good men in the old Church before Chriſt; Die mihi quis tunc juſtorum ſeparavit ſibi Altare?

Tell me, what one of all theſe juſt men in thoſe daies made a ſeparated Altar for himſelfe from the reſt? Yet, Multa ſcelera admittebat iniquus populus ille; Many wicked things committed then that wicked people. They ſacrificed to idols, they killed the Prophets, & nemo tamen juſtorum receſſit ab unitate, and yet none of the godly departed from the unity. Vno Templo miſcebantur, ſed mixti non erant corde; They were mingled together in one Temple, but they were not of one minde: meaning, they approved not any evill that was done. Si hoc eſt conſentire male facientibus, eſſe cùm eis in Eccleſia, conſentiebat etiam ipſe, &c. If this be to conſent to evill, to be with evill men in the Church, then conſented he to falſe brethren, that ſaith hee was with them in perill of them, and that ſuffered thoſe impure preachers among the Philippians.

1 Cor. 11. 26. Phil. 1. 19.

Epiſt. 48. Zizania ergò vel paleam Catholicæ ſegetis nobiſcum copioſiſſime accuſent, ſed nobiſcum ferre patientiſſimè non recuſent. Wherefore let them with us finde fault with the tares and chaffe, as they pleaſe freely, but then let us with them endure them patiently. Et propter malos filios non ſeparemur à Matre; And for other evill ſonnes, let us not ſhake off and ſay fare well to our Mother. For wee doe not for the chaffe forſake the Lords floore; wee doe not breake out of the Lords nette for any bad fiſh incloſed therein with us: wee doe not runne away from the Lords flocke, for the goats that are there to be ſeparated in the end. Finally, we doe not goe out of the houſe of God, for the veſſels therein made unto diſhonour. And a number ſuch like ſayings hath Auguſtine in theſe bookes, and divers other places of his workes, if this were my purpoſed courſe: but they need not.

Conſider what Maſter Calvin ſaith, and let both you and mee marke his judgement. Let us learne (ſaith he) to give this honour to the Word of God, and his holy Sacraments, that whereſoever we ſee them, there we acknowledge a Church. And let both theſe points remaine eſtabliſhed as moſt certaine truths: firſt, that he is without all juſt excuſe, that willingly forſaketh the outward communion of that Church where the Word of God is preached, and the Sacraments adminiſtred.

Calvin adverſ. Anabap. Secondly, that the faults neither of few, nor many, can any whit hinder us from teſtifying our faith rightly, by uſe of ſuch ceremonies as God hath ordained. Becauſe that by no other mans unworthineſs, whether he be Paſtor or private man, a godly conſcience can be hurt, neither can the holy Myſteries bee leſſe pure or profitable to a godly man, becauſe together with him, the wicked alſo handle them.

Inſtitut. 4 1. 19.

Finally, if all things in the Church bee not ſo well as they ſhould be, concerning correction of faults faults, yet let neither private man therefore depart by and by from the Church, nor the Paſtors themſelves, if they cannot according to their hearts deſire, purge all things that need amendment, therefore throw away their Miniſtry, or with unwonted rigorouſneſſe trouble the whole Church. Many other places hath this man to this end, very worthy reading, if I might both note all, and be briefe too: but it cannot be, and therefore I follow him no further. Onely I requeſt, that we may diligently obſerve it, how Satan hath ever tempted the children of God to receive this error, and how faithfull teachers withſtood it ſtill. And if ever he deceive any, what holdeth them in, and hindreth their reformation? Surely, Quia vanam gloriam hominum attendunt, & incenſatorum non contemnunt opprobrium, qui dicturi ſunt, quare nunc? Becauſe they regard the vaine praiſe of men, and do not contemne the ſpeech of the fooliſh, which will ſay: Why now? or is he now come home? &c. And with that heavenly counſell of the Spirit of God, I conclude this matter: let us not forſake that fellowſhip that we have one with another, as the manner of ſome is. The Lord make it ſinke in every mans heart to his good.

Heb. 10. 22. and reade all.

The ſecond temptation concerning the Miniſters.

OThers he perſwadeth that the whole matter of the word and Sacraments dependeth upon the holineſſe and goodneſſe of the Miniſter, ſo that if he have any ſpot or crime, then may there bee no receiving of theſe things at his hands. A moſt poyſoned dart alſo of a deſtroying divell, whereſoever he throweth it, and worthy to be carefully knowne of us all, how hurtfull and prejudiciall to the glory of God it is. Not that Miniſters ſhould not be good (for the word is plaine, and there is no heart ſeaſoned with one corne of the Spirit of God, but it wiſheth that all offences were drowned in the depth of the Sea that come this way, and that Miniſters, as they are called in the word Angels, ſo even with Angels purity, if it were poſſible, they might walke in this world before all men) but that Gods Myſteries may not fall by mans miſeries, and his holy ordinances ceaſe to be holy, for unholy diſpoſers. Know we therefore, touching this temptation, that whoſoever heareth the Word preached, and receiveth the Sacraments in their times adminiſtred, hee muſt ever regard and carry his mind to the Lord himſelfe and his inſtitution, and not to the Miniſter. Which the Lord ſecretly worketh in the hearts of his choſen, what manner of men ſoever the Miniſters be: For who is Paul, ſaith the Apoſtle, or who is Apollos, but the Miniſters by whom yee beleeved, and as the Lord gave to every man? I have planted, Apollos watred, but God gave the increaſe. So then neither is he that planteth any thing, neither he that watreth, but God that giveth the increaſe. If the Miniſter be good, it is beſt for himſelfe, and it is thus farre good to the people, that they have a good Example, who for their weakeneſſe are very hardly drawne without it, as Auguſtine ſaith, but the Lords ordinance receiveth no increaſe of goodneſſe from him, if he be good, neither yet decreaſed of holineſs, if he be bad? For it is true even in this caſe alſo, that the Apoſtle ſaid, What though ſome did not beleeve? ſhall their unbeliefe make the faith of God of no effect? God forbid, Yea, Let God be true, and every man a lyar, as it is written, that thou mighteſt be juſtified in thy ſayings, and cleare when thou art judged. The Miniſters badneſſe may not make the Lord untrue in his promiſes, neither mans corruption, moſt holy things of none effect. The Lords is all, honour, vertue, power, grace, and ſalvation: the Miniſters is onely the outward action and miniſtery. In which reſpect they are called the diſpoſers of Gods Myſteries. If the diſpoſers be evill, God is good that ſo vouchſafeth, man is not worſe that ſo receiveth. They are the Lords meſſengers, and the truth of the meſſage never hangeth upon the bearers quality. Mens perſonages differ that carry meſſages, and yet the meſſage for all that is the ſame.

1 Cor. 3. 4.

The Miniſter is not any thing, marke it.

Rom. 3. 3.

Our Fathers before us in this caſe conſidered the ſimilitudes of waxe and water; Of waxe that taketh his print as well of a leaden Seale as a golden, of water that is the ſame whether the conduit pipe be wood or copper. And thereby they conſidered that Gods holy Myſteries, much more are the ſame to the faithfull, by whomſoever delivered. For it is poſſible that liquor may be changed by a veſſel, but never theſe things by a Miniſter.

The Scribes and Phariſies that ſit in Moſes ſeat, ſaith our Saviour, whatſoever they bid you, doe. But after their works do not. For they ſay and do not. Which words our Saviour would never have ſpoken, if either the Miniſter might have defiled the Word, ot any man be allowed for the faults of the Miniſter, to haue rejected and refuſed the Lords Myſteries. There raigned at this preſent amongſt this order many grievous iniquities, as inſatiable avarice, turning all religion into lucre and gaine, intolerable ambition and pride, ſhameleſſe hypocriſie, groſſe interpretations of the word of God, and what not? They ſaid and did not: a moſt grievous thing in a Miniſter, further than humane frailty forceth, whereof all are full, and the very greateſt have complained: yet would not the Lord have the offence of all theſe to make vile his holy Word, that is ever precious, or to hinder the hearing of it even at their mouths.

Mat. 23. 1.

Rom. 7. 18. Iam. 3. 2. 1 Iohn. 1. 8. Mat. 6. 12. Pſal. 143. 2.

Let us take heed then, how wee ſtubbornly croſſe the Lord Jeſus. Hee ſaith, receive their words, refraine their deedes: let us not ſay, wee will none of their words, for their deeds. Hee ſaith you may receive their words, and bee cleere of their deedes: let us not ſay, wee cannot cannot receive their words, except we approve their evill, and be partaker of their ſinnes. This is not reverence to God, not obedience to his truth.

Note. Were it not groſſe madneſſe, if travelling on the way, and ſhewed by ſome, that we went the very right way to our journies end, yet we would go out of the ſame, becauſe hee that ſhewed us, goeth not with us, but goeth another way? No earthly journey may bee matched with our ſpirituall journey to heaven. For the places wee goe to, the good we get, if wee keepe the way, the dangers if wee doe not, doe all greatly differ. And therefore if his example that hath truly told us a way to an earthly good, ſhould not carry us out of the ſame, much leſſe ſhould his that hath told us the way to heaven, and everlaſting good, doe the ſame. Let him goe his owne courſe at his owne perill; if hee have truly told us our right way, wee ſhould take it conſtantly, not onely without company, but even againſt all example whatſoever to the contrary, being private men. The Magiſtrate hath a further authority in his hand, even ſharply to puniſh ſuch offence given by them that ſay and doe not. Againe, were it not as groſſe to reject the food of our bodies, and to die for hunger, becauſe he that ſetteth good meat before us, will eate none with us himſelfe? To refuſe good gold, becauſe the ground is bad from whence it was digged? Judge then what madneſſe, for the wants of man, to refuſe farre greater matters than all theſe? Remember further more what our Saviour ſaith in the 6. of Iohn, Have I not choſen you twelve, and one of you is a devill? And there are ſome among you that beleeve not.

Iohn 6. 64, 70.

And yet even then, when Chriſt called him a devill, was Iudas an Apoſtle, and preached, and baptized as the reſt did: and neither word nor Sacrament loſt their dignity to the true receivers, for his great indignity that delivered them. Malus ſervus prædicabat, ſed Chriſtus erat in fide: An evill ſervant preached, ſaith Auguſtine, but Chriſt was in the faith. The Apoſtle to the Philippians, wee know alſo hath this teſtimony: Some preach Chriſt (ſaith he) even through envy and ſtrife, and ſome alſo of good will. The one part preacheth Chriſt of contention, and not purely, (that is,) not with a pure mind, (for otherwiſe their doctrin was pure.) ſuppoſing to adde more affliction to my bands. But the other of love, knowing that I am ſet for the defence of the Goſpell. What then? Yet Chriſt is preached all manner of waies, whether it be under a pretence, or ſincerely, and I therein joy, and I will joy.

Philip. 1, 15. &c.

What plainer proofe could we have, if we would wiſh one, that for the faults of the Miniſter, the word and Miniſtery may not be rejected. It was Auguſtines true judgement many a yeere agoe; Omnia Sacramenta cùm obſint indignè tractantibus, proſunt tamen per eos dignè recipientibus, ſicut verbum teſtatur. Quæ dicunt facite, quæ autem faciunt, facere nolite; All Sacraments though they hurt them that handle them unworthily, profit them that by ſuch receive them worthily, even as the word proveth that ſaith; All things they bid you doe, doe; but doe not as themſelves doe. And a little after that againe: Although the Spirit of God be wanting to the ſalvation of the Miniſter, Miniſterium tamen ejus non deſerit quò per eum ſalutem operetur aliorum: Yet is hee not wanting to his Miniſtery, thereby to worke the ſalvation of others. And the Apoſtle himſelfe confirming as much, when he ſaith: If I preach the Goſpell willingly, I have a reward: but if I doe it againſt my will, notwithſtanding the diſpenſation is committed unto me, that is, my Office and Calling urgeth me to do it, it ſhall profit others that I doe it ſo willingly, but not my ſelfe.

Mat. 23.

1 Cor. 9. 7.

Aliis prodeſt quibus hoc diſpenſo, non mihi, qui fictus ſum. Aug. contra Parmen.

Againe the ſame Father ſpeaking of Chriſts being baptized by Iohn, ſaith thus; Voluit Dominus à ſervo, & ille per quem facta ſunt omnia, ab illo qui factus eſt inter omnia, baptizari, ut doceret humilitatem, & oſtenderet, non intereſſe, quis à quo baptizetur, dum eo baptiſmo, quo baptizandus eſt, baptizetur: The Maſter would be baptized of his ſervant: and he that made all, of him that was made amongſt all: to teach humility; and to ſhew that it prejudiceth not what manner of Miniſter baptizeth, ſo that the baptiſme be as it ought to be that he baptizeth with.

Neither would Chriſt (ſaith he) have refuſed to be baptized of the Phariſies, if they had uſed to baptize, Iohn was not ſought for, neither refuſed he that Temple that was a denne of Theeves. Quapropter ſive à Fideli, ſive à perfido diſpenſatore ſacramentum baptiſmi quiſq; percipiat, ſpes ei omnis in Chriſto ſit, ne ſit maledictus qui ſpem ponit in homine: Wherefore, whether of a faithfull, or unfaithfull Steward, a man receive the Sacrament of baptiſme, let his hope be ſtedfaſtly fixed upon Chriſt, leſt it be ſaid, Curſed be he that truſteth in man. If hee depend upon the goodneſſe of the Miniſter, againſt Creſconius thus, Baptizant, quantum attinet ad viſibile Miniſterium boni & mali. Inviſibiliter autem per eos baptizat cujus eſt viſibile baptiſma, & inviſibilis gratia: Here baptize in reſpect of the viſible Miniſtery both good and bad. But inviſibly by them baptizeth he, whoſe is both the viſible baptiſme, and the inviſible grace.

Afterward againe, in the third booke; but thou wilt aske me (ſaith he) Whether is better a good Miniſter or a bad? And I muſt needs anſwer thée, that in reſpect of example to the people, that depend ſo much thereon, that without it they thinke every thing painfull, and hard that God commandeth, a good Miniſter is beſt. But in reſpect of the Baptiſme and Sacrament it ſelfe, Si tantò eſt melius quod accipitur, quantò eſt melior per quẽ traditur: tanta eſt in accipientibus baptiſmorũ varietas, quãta in Miniſtris diverſitas meritorũ: If that ſhould be ſo much better by how how much he was better that miniſtred it, then muſt there be as great difference betwixt mens baptiſmes as betwixt gifts, graces, and qualities that did baptize, which were horrible to affirme.

Paul was better than Apollo, in reſpect of grace given. Was therefore his baptiſme better? God forbid. Per Miniſtros enim diſpares, Dei munus æquale eſt, quia non illorum, ſed Dei eſt. For by his Miniſters farre unlike, the given gift of God is like, becauſe it is his, not theirs, concludeth Auguſtine truly. Elſe woe to them that Iudas baptized. And they had need to lament ſuch baptiſme.

Remember maſter Calvins judgement in ſimilitude. As it is (ſaith he) amongſt men, If a Letter be ſent, ſo the hand and ſeale be knowne, it skilleth not what qualities he was of that brought it: ſo muſt it ſuffice us in the Sacraments, to acknowledge the hand and ſeale of our GOD, what manner of man ſoever the bearer be that delivereth them. For it hurt the Jewes nothing, that they were circumciſed of thoſe impure Prieſts and Apoſtataes, that then were, neither needed they to be circumciſed againe. For indeed (ſaith another) the Sacraments take not the excellency and worthineſſe of him that miniſtreth them, though he bee never ſo holy, neither bee they diſgraced or weakned, though the miniſter bee wicked and evill. The hand of the receiver being without faith, maketh the Sacraments, that of themſelves be good, to be unto him of no force, becauſe of his unbeleefe: but a wicked Miniſter cannot in any wiſe make fruſtrate or deceive the faith of the godly receiver.

Our Saviour Chriſt baptized none whileſt he was upon earth, but onely preached, and his Diſciples baptized, ſaith the Goſpel, &c. Iohn 4.2.

And S. Paul continuing in Corinth, a yeere and ſix months, where God ſaid unto him in the night, by a viſion, He had much people: taught the word among them, and preached, but baptized none, ſaving Criſpus and Gaius, and the houſhold of Stephanus: and thanketh God that he had not, when hee ſaw what diviſion fell out, one ſaying, I am Pauls, another, I am Apolloes, &c. Acts 18.11. 1 Cor. 1.14.

And Muſculus with others, agree with Ambroſe, that Peter baptized not Cornelius and his company, but commanded them to be baptized. Now none of all theſe would have thus done, we muſt needs thinke, if better Miniſters had made better Sacraments to the receivers. But even the contrary, with all endeavour and paine, in a zeale to the Lords people, that they might have that holy ordinance, with greateſt good. How ſhould Paul have thanked God with a good conſcience, that he had baptized no moe, ſetled us fully and firmely touching this point. Yet indeed it is a great deale more that our Saviour baptiſed never an one, who was of all Miniſters the beſt without compariſon, and moſt kindly and carefully addicted to mans good every way. For why was it, may we with moſt great probability thinke, but that leſt his moſt excellent dignity above all men ſhould worke in the receivers of that baptiſme, ſome conceit of their Baptiſme above others, baptized by farre inferiour Miniſters, and ſo cauſe diſſention in the Church amongſt them. Petrus Cornelii domum, non ipſe baptizavit, cum coram eſſet, ſed juſſit baptizari. Muſcul. in Iohn 4 2.

Wherefore we ſee even in this omiſſion of our Saviour Chriſt, his divine wiſedome foreſeeing the venome of this error, to meaſure the Word and Sacraments by the worthineſſe of the Miniſter: and carefully cutting the throat of it in his time.

It was truly ever a wrong to the Lod and his holy myſteries ever condemned of the Church of God, and we muſt abhorre it, Si malus Sacerdos, deponendus erat, ſi non poſſit deponi, tolerandus intra rete. If the Miniſter be naught, ſaith Saint Auguſtine, hee ſhould be diſplaced; if hee canno be diſplaced, he muſt be endured within the net. For upon our diſlikings of men, to refuſe the Lord and the meanes of our ſalvation, is a more feareſull impiety, than that it needeth amplification. The very thought of it ſtriketh a terror into my ſoule: (that I, duſt and wormes) ſhould except againſt the grace of my Creator, unleſſe the officer of them, to me from him, bee qualified to my liking. For as we live, the Lord will be a moſt ſwift Judge, and even a very conſuming fire one day againſt this hainous contempt of himſelfe and his mercies, and the having of them in reſpect of perſons.

O beloved, our time is now to be wiſe and learned, and to kiſſe the Sonne in his graces, leſt he be angry, and we periſh off from the earth. If we doe not, mercy paſſeth, judgement commeth, and warned people muſt both die in their ſinne, and carrie their blood themſelves for ever.

The third temptation, concerning Communicants.

SOme againe are tempted and troubled with ſcruples and doubts, concerning ſuch as are admitted to the Lords Table, and whom Satan cannot otherwiſe winne to deſpiſe that holy Sacrament, by this meanes he moſt mightily undermineth, and cauſeth them to forbeare, both their great comfort and bounden duty. For whereſoever, ſaith he to them, the uncleane are not apart, and the evill ſeparated from the good, by Eccleſiaſticall cenſure, there if a Chriſtian communicate, he is defiled with other mens ſinnes. And therefore to the end yee may not bee polluted polluted by the company of such, you must forbeare, nay, refuse and utterly abhorre all receiving of the Supper of the Lord, but with a choyce company of select and holy ones. But is this true now, that other mens sins never consented to by me, doe defile me, if I receive with them? God forbid.

The flat contrary is a ruled case in Divinity, and was ere we were borne amongst the learned and godly of all times. And as it were with one voyce they have affirmed it in this and such like sort: That a Christian man should be sorry and grieved if hee see that most holy Sacrament abused of any wicked and bad ones which are admitted unto it, and endeavour as much as in him lyeth, that it may not bee so, but yet may hee not himselfe deprive himselfe of the Sacraments, nor withdraw himselfe from the Church, but both take it for a true Church notwithstanding this blemish, and continue in her society and fellowship so long as the Word is preached, and the Sacraments administred therein, without any separation from it for this cause. And the proofes hereof have partly beene alledged before in the examples of the godly Patriarches, Prophets, Apostles, and Christ himselfe.

In those Churches of Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, and others, wherein although there were great blemishes, as hath beene shewed, yet were they never commanded to avoid anothers company at those exercises that the Lord in common enjoyned all, and left it not to their libertie to use or not use: They separated themselves carefully from those crimes and faults, that they rebuked and disliked in others, but from their Churches and holy exercises, they separated not themselves, but entred into their Synagogues at all times, whereseever they came, and when they were at prayers, prayed with them, preached to them, and partaked with them in commanded duties, neither were they once hurt by their so doing.

1 Cor. 11. Then further may wee adde in this matter of Communicants that which truly wee should not lightly weigh or consider, but very earnestly thinke of: Namely that wee are bidden to examine our selves when we come to that Table. If the Lord had pleased, he could as easily have bidden us examine one another, or every man the whole Church. And certainly hee would have done it, if other mens sinnes might have defiled us, and the company of the unworthy ones have polluted them that come with the very best preparation of themselves unto it. Yea, and with what diligence indeed ought wee all to doe it, if this Doctrine were true. Surely my conscience could never receive that Sacrament in peace, except I knew all men as well as my selfe, since their evill may as well hurt me as mine owne. But now that hee requireth onely of every man the proofe of themselves, he teacheth thereby plainly, that it nothing hurteth us, if any unworthy doe thrust themselves amongst us, so that wee bee prepared; The same doe these other words also; Sibi judicium manducat. He eateth and drinketh his owne damnation. Sibi, non Tibi, His owne damnation, not Thine, saith Augustine, Ergo tolera malos, bonus, ut venias ad præmia bonorum, ne mittaris in pœnam malorum. Therefore thou being good, endure the evill, that thou mayest come to the rewards of the good, and not bee sent unto the punishment of the evill; Calvin thought this a strong place against this temptation, therefore hee urgeth both these members against it fully. In these words of Saint Paul, saith he, two things are to be noted, Calvin. institut. 4. booke 1. 15. read it all. Aug tract. in Ioan. 50.

The first is this, that to eate the Bread of the Lord unworthily, is not to communicate in that company that are unworthy, but not rightly to prepare our selves, and to weigh our owne faith and repentance.

Adversus Anabapt. artic. 2. pag. 579. Secondly, that when we will receive this Sacrament, wee begin not with others, and fall in examining them, but that we try our selves, and set our eyes that way. For truely if all things be considered well, they that have so much leisure to examine others, in themselves they are most negligent and forgetfull. For upon mine owne experience saith he, I know one yet alive, that carried headlong with this niceneſse that hee would not receive with us for some mens faults that pleased him not, hee separated himselfe from our company: and yet in the meane time, had them in his owne house of most lewd behaviour. When I knew it, I got one to admonish him (for of my selfe saith M. Calvin hee would take nothing) and to aske what hee meant to bee so strict in the Church, a house not in his government, and so faulty in his owne house where he had government.

Must hee needs bee defiled in the Church by unworthy Communicants, and cleere at home from so neere evill? And it pleased God to worke with him, saith hee, that hee saw his folly, and reconciled himselfe both to the Church and mee, confessing at last, that our chiefe and first care must bee of our selves and our family, next and secondly of others. And how? Not for dislike of them, or hatred, because they doe not so well as they ought, to separate our selves from the Church, but to correct them, and amend them, to bring them into the way, or according to our places, to procure their removing if they will not. Or if wee cannot effect that, then to leave all to the Lord to performe and make better. Thus farre M. Calvin, not unworthy our earnest noting, though it bee vere long. And truely marke it againe, that in saying his owne damnation, hee tieth the harme that commeth by his unworthy receiving to himselfe, and ſtretcheth it not to others, which yet needs hee muſt have done if the company of any at that Table did defile the godly. He muſt have ſaid he eateth and drinketh to his owne damnation and all others that receive with him and know him. But God forbid. Then, was ever the Sacrament more holy and purely adminiſtred, than Chriſt Jeſus himſelfe did with his Diſciples? Yet even there and then, ſaith Ambroſe, Chryſoſtome, Auguſtine and others, was wicked Iudas. For the Evangeliſts ſay, hee ſate downe with his twelve, and Luke maketh mention that Chriſt admoniſhed him partly before, and partly after ſupper, which the Lord Jeſus would never have ſuffered, if his company might have defiled the other worthy receivers there preſent. And concerning Iudas, I pray you conſider what the Scripture ſaith. Firſt, it was ſaid of him before the Supper, that hee was a theefe and carried the bagge, and for that cauſe grudged the expence of the oyntment, and ſaid, it might have beene ſold and given to the poore, not in deed and truth caring for the poore. In regard whereof Auguſtine ſaith, Iudas was not then firſt evill when he made his match to betray him for ſo much money, but before even from the firſt beginning, never following Chriſt, corde, ſed corpore, with heart, but with body.

Bullingers reaſons of his preſence. Contra Anabapt. pag. 230.

Iohn 12. Aug. in Ioan. tract. 50.

Secondly, it is teſtified in Luke, that before the Supper, the Devill was entred into him, and that he had beene with the high Prieſts and Captaines, and made his match with them, communing with them how he might betray Chriſt unto them.

Luke 22.3.

Thirdly, even to the Diſciples themſelves openly at table was manifeſted by giving of a ſop that he was a traytor, and ſhould ſhew it upon his owne Maſter. Therefore it was not altogether hid what manner of man Iudas was. Yet, (ſaith Saint Auguſtin) Talis Iudas cum ſanctis Diſcipulis undecim intrabat, & exibat: ad ipſam Dominicā cœnam pariter acceſſit: de uno pane & Petrus & Iudas accepit. Such a Iudas went in and came out with the eleven, came to the ſame ſupper of the Lord with them, and of the one bread received both Peter and Iudas. Quid ergo voluit Dominus noſter Ieſus Chriſtus (fratres mei) admonere Eccleſiam ſuam, quando unum perditum intra duodecim habere voluit, niſi ut malos toleremus, ne corpus Chriſti dividamus? What therfore would the Lord Jeſus Chriſt (my brethren) admoniſh and teach his Church, when amongſt his twelve he would have one loſt and bad one, but that in the Church here militant wee muſt endure ſome evill ones, leſt in not doing it, wee ſhould rend aſunder and divide the body of Chriſt. Converſari enim cum eis potuit Iudas, eos inquinare non potuit: For, be in their company Iudas might, but defile them he could not.

Mat. 26.25. &c.

Wee ſee therefore this Fathers judgement touching this matter plainly, and to it may bee added this queſtion, how the faithfull wife may abide with an unfaithfull husband all the daies of her life, and not be the worſe; and we may not come to Gods Table, or to prayers for an houre, in the company of unreformed ones, but their ſinne ſhall cleave to us. The companyings together differeth moſt greatly, if we marke the ſeverall circumſtances, of a wife with her husband, and of two men in the Church together.

1 Cor. 7.3.

1 Cor. 7.13.

How then may wee be warranted to refraine that moſt holy and comfortable Sacrament for their ſakes, who though they be treſpaſſers, yet aske mercy at Gods hands? Et hoc teſtantur eo ipſo quòd accedunt ad Cœnam; And teſtifie as much, even by their very comming and offering themſelves to the Lords Table. To judge rightly of our brethren, our corruption aſſuredly is great, and we ſhould often thinke of it, and feare it greatly.

By nature we are full of ſuſpition, and as well where no cauſe is, as where cauſe is. Wee beleeve evill too faſt, and good too ſlowly. We amplifie things, and make ſmall matters great matters, judging men many times worſe through our corruption, than indeed they are before God by their tranſgreſſions: And how dangerous a rule then is this to meaſure them by, that muſt be allowed to the Lords Table, if we receive with them?

When this temptation was ſtrong in the minde of the Anabaptiſts, remember how crookedly this evill guided them in the choice of worthy receivers? If any man (ſaith Bullinger) hang downe his head, and counterfeit humility, although in minde hee bee moſt polluted, filthy, and foule, and deſpiſe the word, yet ſhall he be accounted a moſt holy and good one, and worthy to receive the Sacrament. But if he be more open and merry, and ſubject to the common faults of humane frailty, yet farre from any diſſimulation, truſting in his heart and ſoule firmely the Lords mercy, ſingle and ſincere towards God that that he is, confeſſing his ſinnes: ſuch an one, foraſmuch as he hath not yet ſatisfied the Anabaptiſts for his faults, neither is allowed of them, and though as yet worthy enough, ſhall be ſeparated from the Lords Table. And yet the ſinfull Publican ſmiting his breſt, was better allowed of the Lord Ieſus, then the juſt Phariſie with all his righteouſneſſe.

Lib. 6. cap. 9. Anabapt.

Luke 18.

When many uncleane did eate of the Paſſeover which Ezekias the King cauſed to bee kept, did their brethren refuſe to eate, becauſe they did eate alſo? Or did their company pollute them that were cleane any thing? Conſider it well, and ſee if you can finde either: yet the parties themſelves that were not ſanctified and clenſed, faulted, and were prayed for.

2 Chron. 30.

Wherefore we may ſay with Saint Auguſtin, Non propter malos bonos deſeramus, ſed propter bonos malos ſufferamus: let us not forſake the good for the evill, but let us endure the evill for the good. Yet must wee thinke Saint Augustine and all good men, wisheth their separation as far as may be without plucking up the wheate also, and rending asunder the body of Christ. And so plainly shew those words; Si non possint excludi, excludantur vel de corde. If they cannot bee excluded, exclude them at least in thy heart, that is, approve not in heart and judgement their fault. Cyprianus & alii frumenta Dominica cum avaris & rapacibus, cum his qui regnum Dei non possidebunt, non Laicis, vel quibuscunq; Clericis, sed ipsis Episcopis, panem Domini manducabant. Cyprian and others of the Lords wheate, did eate the bread of the Lord, and drinke his cup, with the covetous, and the raveners, with them that shall not possesse Gods Kingdome, not Laymen, or common Clergie men, but even with the Bishops themselves.

the

And it sufficeth them, to be separated from such in heart, in life, and manners, in a great regard to keepe peace and unity for the good of the weake, lest they should teare the members of the body of Christ, by sacrilegious schismes.

Calvin writeth to Farellus in an Epistle, that being asked this question, whether it was lawfull to receive the Communion at a bad Ministers hands, and with bad company admitted thereunto, he answered to both in effect, as followeth; Tantum debere inter Christianos esse odium schismatis, ut semper, quoad licet, refugiant. Tantum ministerii ac sacramentorum reverentiam esse oportere, ut ubicunq; extare hæc cernant, Ecclesiam esse censeant, &c. That there ought to bee in Christians such a detestation of schisme, that as neere as they may, they ever flye it. Againe, that there ought to be such a reverence of the Ministery, and of the Sacraments, that whersoever they see these extant, there they acknowledge the Church to be.

Forasmuch therefore as by Gods permission the Church is governed by these men, what manner of persons soever they bee, if they see the notes of the Church there, it shall be better not to separate themselves from the Communion; neither hurteth it, that some untrue Doctrine is there delivered. For there is hardly any Church that hath not in it some reliques of ignorance.

It sufficeth us if the Doctrine whereon the Church is founded have his place, and bee kept. Neither stoppe we at this, that he cannot bee accounted a lawfull Pastor, which hath not onely crept, but most wickedly broken into the place of a true Minister.

For it is not fit that every private man should trouble himselfe with these scruples. Sacramenta cum Ecclesia communicant. The Sacraments they receive with the Church. Per eorum manus sibi dispensari sustinent. Onely by their hands they endure them to bee delivered. For, whom they see to have the places, whether lawfully or unlawfully they have them (although the matter somewhat appertaine to them) yet may they suspend their judgement thereof, till a full knowledge be had.

Therefore if they use their Ministery, yet is there no danger lest they should seeme either to acknowledge, or allow, or confirme the same for good. But by this meanes they give a testimonie of their patience, whilest they are content to endure those, whom they judge worthy of condemnation, even by a solemne judgement.

Thus farre Master Calvin: somewhat long, but truly very materiall to the point wee now speake of, if humility worke a reverence of other mens judgements, especially that have abounded with the great graces of God, to the profiting of the Church, and puffing pride doth not dangerously perswade us that no man seeth the truth of God but our selves, which God forbid.

Bullinger againe delivered it boldly to the people of God in his time, and after that, qui sæpe admonitus dolo utitur, non Ecclesiam, Dominum aut ministrum decipit, sed seipsum, & ipsi judicium manducat. Whosoever admonished often, yet dissembleth and useth guile, hee deceiveth not the Church, hee deceiveth not the Lord, nor the Minister, but he deceiveth himselfe, and to his owne damnation he eateth. Meaning that none could be hurt by the company of any that communicate with them, themselves being right. And therefore meaning to prosecute this question no further, in a comfortable hope I need not, I conclude both with the judgement and very words of Master Calvin, in his institutions remembred before; Fixum igitur utrumq; istorum maneat: Therefore let both these things remaine firmely fixed: First, that he hath no excuse, that of his owne will forsaketh the outward Communion of the Church, where the word of God is preached, and the Sacraments administred: then, that the faults of a few or many, are no hinderance, but that wee may therein rightly professe our faith, by the ceremonies instituted by God. Because a godly conscience is not hurt by the unworthinesse of any other, either Pastor or private man, and the ministeries are to a holy and upright man, nevertheless pure and wholsome, though they be together handled of uncleane men.

Calvin. Institut. lib. 4 sect. 19.

The fourth Temptation, concerning compulsion to God.

LAstly, there have beene, and to this day are, that thinke men should not be compelled to faith and religion. The Donatists, Pelagians, and Anabaptists, in their severall times: the

Papists

Papiſts ſtill daily in their printed pamphlets. But as the reſt, ſo is this alſo, a ſubtill ſleight of a tempting Devill, to animate men unto evill boldly. An untruth, in the word plainly refelled, and of the Church and Children of God truly inſtructed, ever abhorred. The noble Kings Aſa and Ioſia, did conſtraine and compell the people by ſeverity of their Laws and puniſhments to ſerve the Lord. For whoſoever will not ſeeke the God of Iſrael ſhall be ſlaine, whether he be ſmall or great, man or woman, ſaith the Text. Nebuchadnezzar made a decree that every people, nation, and language, which ſpake any blaſphemie againſt the God of Sydrach, Miſach, and Abednego, ſhould be drawne in pieces, and their houſes put to the moſt baſe uſe that might be. A very ſharp law, I trow we will confeſſe, to compell men to a duty juſt and godly. And if this Heathen King, moved by Gods Spirit did this, and might doe it, may not they that profeſſe Religion do it? Nay, ſhall they not, as their knowledge and charge is greater, ſo ſuffer double puniſhment if they do not? Surely the truth is plaine, they ſhal. King Darius did the like in the ſame Prophet. And I make a decree (ſaith he) that in all the dominion of my Kingdome, men tremble and feare before the God of Daniel, for he is the living God, and remaineth for ever, and his Kingdome ſhall not periſh, &c.

The King of Ninveh againe forced by his authority all men in the City to humble themſelves before God; yea, (ſaith he) Let man and beaſt put on ſack-cloth and crie mightily unto God. Which example Auguſtine urged in his time againſt the Donatiſts, and ſaith, the King of Niniveh did God good ſervice, by compelling the whole City to ſerve God. In the Goſpell the Maſter ſaid to the ſervant, Goe out into the high-waies and hedges, and compell them to come in, that my Houſe may be filled.

Neq; abſq; cauſa ſic loquitur Dominus, quia enim diverſi hominũ mores, ingenia item diverſa ſunt, non eadem docendi aut prædicandi ratio omnibus convenit Sunt enim quibus ſimplicem inſtitutionẽ & doctrinã adhibuiſſe ſufficit, aliis admonitione ſeveriore, multis adhortatione, imò correptione & objurgatione acriore opus eſt. Et ideo ſuprà, verbi Miniſtros exactorũ ſimiles dixit. Neither did the Lord without good cauſe (ſaith a learned interpreter) ſpeake after this ſort. For divers men being of divers manners and diſpoſitions, one and the ſame manner of preaching agreeth not to them all. Some it ſufficeth to have doctrine plainly delivered to them; Others muſt have earneſt admonition alſo, and many muſt have exhortation, yea, ſharpe rebukes and chidings, or elſe they profit not. And therefore the Miniſters of God were compared to Stewards or Bayliffes, that ſharply and roughly require their Maſters rent for his Vineyard, if it be wanting. Fit etiam ſæpenumero ut magiſtratus ſuam authoritatẽ interponere oporteat, quando multorum pervicacia tanta eſt, ut aliter vinci non poſſit. And many times it commeth to paſſe, that the Magiſtrate muſt put in his authority, many mens ſtubbornneſſe being ſuch and ſo great, that it cannot otherwiſe bee overcome.

Maſter Gualter in Mat. 22.

See then how even this place affordeth the doctrine which we ſpeake of moſt truly, namely, that the Magiſtrate may compell, whom the Preacher cannot perſwade to ſerve God. What thought S. Auguſtine of this place? Heare and you ſhall ſee. Putas neminem debere cogi ad juſtitiam, cum legas patrẽ familias dixiſſe ſervis, Quoſcunq; inveneritis, cogito intrare? Doeſt thou think ſaith he, (Vincentius) that no man may be compelled to goodneſſe, when as thou heareſt the maſter ſaying to his ſervant, goe forth, and compell them to come in, whoſoever yee find? Againe, in his 50. Epiſtle, 204. Epiſtle, and in divers other places, he gathereth out of this Text this doctrine. All other interpreters do the like, old and new as occaſion ſerveth them. But ſaith, you will ſay, cannot be forced, for it is the gift of God, and no man commeth to Chriſt except the Father draw him. And what then? Therefore no man may be compelled to come to the preaching of the Word, and to frequent commanded exerciſes? Let Schollers make their argument to their maſter, and ſay, learning is the gift of God, and cannot be had, except he give it, therfore they may not be beaten, if they learne not. Let ſervants alledge, that ability to doe their duties commeth from God, and therefore they may not be looked to. Let the theefe ſay, that to be a true man is a gift that God giveth, therefore he may not be hanged if he ſteale. Shall they eſcape by theſe reaſons? I trow not. Therefore we anſwer, it followeth not. For although faith be the gift of God, yet doth the Lord uſe meanes. And although the will cannot be forced, yet may it bee contained within duty, that it do not any thing with offence contrary to religion. And as we ſee in other things, that they that are given to theft, drunkenneſſe, and other filthy pollutions of the body or ſoule, cannot bee compelled by mans power to change their inward minds, and to eſteeme of thoſe things according to their nature, and yet many by lawes be reſtrained from outward facts: So though by mans might, no mind can be indued with faith, yet may open behaviour be reſtrained, amended, and reformed: and wicked contemners be compelled to heare Sermons, to come to prayers, and to frequent the publik aſſemblies, at times appointed. Which outward forced obedience, may (if God pleaſe) work inward willing obedience in time. For it hath done it often, as thouſands of experiences prove. But if it do not, through the incurable obſtinacie of ſome, which ſay, as Auguſtine noteth: Sic volo errare, ſic volo perire: yet may not ſo ſoveraigne a ſalve be omitted, by them that ought to apply it, as the ſame Father alſo noteth.

Epiſt. 204.

It was said to Peter, Whither I go thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me afterward. And so may it be with others, by the Lords blessing of meanes, that what could not bee in one time, may be in another, to the good and comfort of many. For as the light of Doctrine availeth to rid away error from judgement, so doth feare of punishment, in many, helpe to reforme the practise of life against good order. Mea primitus sententia erat, &c. My selfe was once of that mind, (saith S. Augustine) that I thought no man ought to be forced to Christian unitie, but that we should deale by perswasion, strive by disputing, conquer by reasoning, lest they proved dissembling Catholikes, whom wee knew professed heretikes. But this opinion of mine was overthrowne, not with words of gain-saying, but with examples of evident proofe.

Epist. 48. Ioh. 13. 36.

Epist. 49. p. 174.

And first, mine owne City was objected against me, which being wholly overrunne with the heresie of Donatisme, was reclaimed and brought againe to the truth, with the feare of good Imperiall Lawes, in that case provided, &c.

Many others also were laid before me, in like sort reformed by good lawes. So that I saw it true, that by feare of that which he would be loth to suffer, a man may be brought to relinquish that former stifnesse that hindred him, or to acknowledge an unknowne truth before, &c.

Terror enim temporalium potestatũ quando veritatẽ oppugnat, justis fortibus gloriosa probatio est, infirmis periculosa tentatio: quando autem veritatem prædicat errantibus & discordantibus, cordatis utilis admonitio est, & insensatis inutilis afflictio. The feare of temporall power when it oppugneth truth, is to the just that are strong a glorious triall, and to the weake a dangerous temptation; but when it preacheth truth to them that are in error and do disagree, to the wise it is a profitable admonition, and to the foolish an unprofitable affliction. Yet is there no power but of God, and he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God.

Whilest men be mad in the strength of their ungodly humour, they raile of all compulsion to the contrary, but having got understanding, and seeing from what evils they are delivered by them that first forced them, they rejoyce that ever so well to their great good they were chastised, and that wholsome voyce that before with bitter words they inveighed against, they then commend and praise unfainedly. Foris igitur inveniatur necessitas, nascitur intus voluntas. Without therefore let there be compulsion, willingnesse groweth within: that is, spare not hardly sometimes to compell men to do unwillingly, what by such force they shall happily better looke into, and then performe with all willingnesse. If no man may be compelled to goodnesse, why doth the wise-man so often speake of correction, saying: he that spareth the rodde, hateth his child, and he that beateth him, saveth his soule.

The second Objection.

Yea, but whom compelled Christ ever, say they? He preached and taught, and went no further. Did he so, saith Augustine? Have they not Paul an example to the contrary? Agnoscant in eò prius cogentem Christum, & postea docentem, prius ferientem, & postea consolantem. Let them there see Christ first compelling, and afterwards teaching, first striking, and then comforting. And he that entred into the Gospell constrained with bodily punishment, labored more than all those that were called onely by mouth.

The third Objection.

But men may not be compelled against their conscience. A pretty ground of all Libertinisme, and an high way to overthrow all estates under heaven. For what good can be commanded, or what evill forbidden, that this excuse may not be laid against? The Apostle saith, the Magistrate beareth not the sword for nought: but sure if an erronious and deceived conscience, liking or disliking, may be a just warrant to do or not do, the Magistrate may put up his sword, and let it there continue, for any use hee shall have of it, every thing being avoided with this, my conscience is so, and, I may not be forced against my conscience.

Luke 12.

But let us not be deceived. The Lord will surely smite every servant that doth not his will, whether he know or know not, because his ignorance is not of creation, but from Adam by fall, neither shall any good meaning erroniously had, excuse any man more than it did the Jewes, which ignorantly crucifying Christ, and persecuting the Apostles, were perswaded they did God great service. And as God doth thus, so doth he require of the Magistrates hand, to whom indeed he hath committed the sword not in vaine, that (after the procuring of such meanes for their instruction by publike preaching and private perswasions, as our Saviour hath appointed for the calling of men from their errors, to the knowledge of his truth) they forbeare not, either to require godly duty, or to punish the want, as the offence shall deserve, not fearing the speeches of men, for the glory of God, neither displeasing him to please them.

If they crie, as they doe, it is cruelty, cruelty, and enough to drive men to despaire. Wee can but wish them the best, still holding a truth our selves, and doing in moderation and mercy what shall make us despaire if we do not: God requiring it of us at our perill.

And at their owne perill must it be, if they take darkenesse for light, and light for darknesse, surely their blood is upon themselves, because they have beene warned and had the meanes. S. Augustine will tell them, the Donatists slew themselves, rather than they would change their heresie: yet did not such their fearefull madnesse terrifie godly Princes from condigne chastisements of so great impiety. And thus much may suffice of this Temptation.

If

If any liſt to be further ſatisfied by Engliſh treatiſes hereof, let him peruſe the godly anſwers of divers to the Papiſts, M. Doctor Bilſon, M. Travers, and others.

But this lawfull, moderate and profitable correction will be called cruell and mercileſſe perſecution.

No newes if it bee. For ſo did theſe ſeduced creatures in their times, and the Papiſts even ſtill exclaime, when their hereſie and obſtinacy is puniſhed. Whereupon Auguſtine in his time, and others in theſe daies, are driven to follow their cries, and to purge away this unjuſt ſlander, which indeed would never be ſo untruely made, if men would not fooliſhly thinke, pro Eccleſia Dei facere quicquid inquieta temeritate faciunt, that every thing is done in the cauſe of the Church, that is done in their owne unquiet raſhneſſe and headineſſe.

For the matter it ſelfe, it hath been anſwered, and it truely may be anſwered, that every man that ſpareth, is not a friend, neither every one that beateth, a foe. But better are the wounds of a friend, then the voluntary kiſſes of an enemy. Melius eſt cum ſecuritate diligere, quàm cum lenitate decipere. Better it is with ſecurity to love, then with lenity to deceive.

Can man love man, more than God loveth him? Yet in the love of God there is often correction, and often chaſtiſement, and the ſame, though never joyous for the preſent, but grievous, yet after bringeth the quiet fruit of righteouſneſſe, unto them which are thereby exerciſed, and they ſay with the Prophet: It is good for them that they have been chaſtiſed. Why then, muſt mans compulſion ever be perſecution? Cum boni & mali eadem faciunt, eademque patiuntur, non factis & pœnis, ſed cauſis utique diſcernendi ſunt. When the good and evill, either doe, or ſuffer the ſame things, they muſt be diſcerned and diſtinguiſhed, not by puniſhments, but by cauſes. Heb. 12. 11.

Pharaoh was ſharpe in ſundry actions to the Iſraelites: and what was Moſes when he made them drinke up the aſhes of their golden Calfe, and three thouſand of them to bee ſlaine with the ſword ſpeedily? When his anger ſeemed fierce againſt Aaron himſelfe, and the people quaked as it were under him? Similia fecerunt, ſed non ſimiliter prodeſſe voluerunt. The things they did, after a ſort were alike, for they were both ſharpe, but their mindes were not alike to profit. And therefore what Pharaoh did, was a tyrannicall perſecution; what Moſes did, lawfull, and liked puniſhment of a grievous fault. Iezabel ſlew ſome Prophets, and Eliah ſlew ſome Prophets, Sed diverſa merita facientium, diverſa paſſorum: But divers was the merit both of the doers and ſufferers. Iezabel ſlew true Prophets, and it was a bloody perſecution. Eliah ſlew falſe Prophets, and it was no perſecution, as we ſpeake of that word in evill part. Exod. 32.

In the death of Chriſt, God had his worke, and man had his worke. Yet was God pure, and man guilty. How, Niſi quia in re una quam fecerunt, cauſa non erat una ob quam fecerunt; but becauſe in one thing which they did, there was not one cauſe for which they did. There were three croſſes at our Saviours death: upon one, the theefe to be ſaved; upon another, the theefe to be damned; in the middle, Chriſt. Quid ſimilius iſtis crucibus? Quid diſſimilius iſtis pendentibus? Quos paſſio jungebat, cauſa ſeparavit. What more like then theſe croſſes? What more unlike then thoſe that hanged upon them? Whom a like puniſhment conjoyned, a far unlike cauſe diſioyned. Paul was delivered to the Jaylor, to be impriſoned: Paul himſelf would the inceſtuous to be delivered to Satan to be reformed. The one is a greater matter then the other, and yet the leſſer a wicked perſecution, the greater none. Diſcamus igitur frater. Let us therefore learne brother, ſaith S. Auguſtine, in like doings to diſcerne unlike mindes of the doers, neither let us with cloſed eyes ſlander, and accuſe well willers, as evill hurters of us. If it were ever ſo glorious as ſome would make it, to be puniſhed, and to ſuſtaine correction, the Lord might have ſaid, bleſſed are they that are ſo uſed, and never have added propter juſtitiam, for righteouſneſſe ſake. Wherefore an evident truth it is, that they are not Martyrs that ſuffer puniſhment for evill doing, & propter Chriſtianæ unitatis impiam diviſionem, and for a wicked diviſion of Chriſtian unity: but they that ſuffer for well-doing, and for righteouſneſſe ſake. Agar was puniſhed of Sara, yet ſhe that puniſhed was blameleſſe, and ſhee that was puniſhed blame worthy. Therefore doth the Prophet ſay, Indica me Deus, & diſcerne cauſam: non dixit pœnam, ſed cauſam: Judge me O Lord, and diſcerne my cauſe; He doth not ſay, my puniſhment, but my cauſe. Acts 16. 1 Cor. 5.

Againe, They perſecuted me without a cauſe, but the Lord was my helper. His comfort and glory is not that he was perſecuted, but that indeed and truth it was without a cauſe. Pſal. 44.

David himſelfe purſued his enemies, tooke them, and conſumed them; And ſaid, he would cut off all the workers of iniquity from the Citie of the Lord. Yet no perſecutor more than all other Kings and Princes both in the word, and out, renowned for due and zealous puniſhing of offences. In his enim omnibus quid attenditur, niſi quis eorum pro veritate, quis pro iniquitate, quis nocendi cauſa, quis emendandi. For in all men that puniſh and execute lawes upon any, what is to bee conſidered, but which of them doth it for the maintenance of truth, which of them for the maintenance of evill: which of them with a minde to hurt, which of them with a minde to reforme. Vides itaque non eſſe conſiderandum quòd quiſque cogitur, ſed quale ſit illud quo cogitur, utrum bonum, an malum. You ſee therefore, that this muſt not onely be marked, that a man is compelled, but the thing alſo muſt be looked, whereunto he is compelled, whether it Pſal. 18. 37. Pſal. 101.

bee good or bad. And if it bee good, it will ever juſtifie the action, howſoever the ſufferer bee offended. The Phyſitian offends many times his Patient, the Schoole-maſter his Scholler, and the Father his wild and wanton child. But this offence ſhall have a juſt warrant if it bee complained of, the carefull heart of each one to doe good in their places. If horſes and mules muſt be ruled with bits and bridles, to take a liked courſe, we ſhould make leſſe account of our ſelves than of theſe beaſts, if we ſhould ſeeke both immunity and impunity whatſoever we doe. And let this ſuffice for ſome ſatisfaction to a cauſeleſſe cry, and moſt unworthy complaint, whenſoever it is made.

I very well ſee, theſe temptations in judgement are many, and therefore your ſpeech might be long if you would follow them, but theſe may ſuffice for a taſte of Satans malice in reſpect, and you may now, if your ſelfe will, proceed to his temptations in life and behaviour.

They alſo as hath beene ſaid, are in number moe, and in nature more unknowne, than that of any one man, they may bee either named or underſtood. For there is no Commandement, the breaches whereof in every branch hee tempteth not ſome unto: And what a field were this to runne a very long courſe in?

Hee tempteth to adultery, fornication, uncleanneſſe, wantonneſſe, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, debate, emulations, wrath, contentions, ſeditions, envy, murthers, drunkenneſſe, gluttony, and ten thouſand ſuch like. So that to follow the temptations in life and behaviour, and to lay downe what might be ſaid, either in deſcription of their manner, or as helpe againſt their ſtrength and venome, were to take in hand to write many volumes.

1 Pet. 5. Verſe 9. This is certaine, he is our enemy, and ſo firme a friend as he is a foe, were worth much gold, even of the gold of Ophyr. In which enmity and malice of his, hee goeth about like a roaring Lion, ſeeking whom hee may devoure. But if wee reſiſt him ſtedfaſt in faith, hee flieth from us.

Epheſ. 6. With which ſhield of faith, together with the ſword of the ſpirit, the word of God, we ſhall quench all his fiery darts, and become conquerors. And the beſt meanes to helpe us in theſe many thouſand ſpirituall onſets, and to ſtrengthen body and ſoule againſt the killing poyſon of them, after avoiding of all occaſions, ſo much as ever wee may, ſtill truely diſcharging our ſeverall places, both towards God and man, is to print in our hearts, and ſinke into our ſoules, a true and often, and earneſt meditation of the end of the thing or things whatſoever, that we ſhall in this reſpect be tempted and ſolicited unto.

Epheſ. 7, 1, 6. For the wiſe Syrach upon deep experience hath ſaid it, Whatſoever thou takeſt in hand, remember the end, and thou ſhalt never do amiſſe. The end of ſinne is death, the reward of ſinne is death, death of body many time by a ſhamefull end in this world, and death of both body and ſoule in a bottomleſſe pit for ever, where is weeping, and wayling, and gnaſhing of teeth.

Sweet meat will have a ſowre ſawce, ſaid the Proverbe then, and ſweet ſinne bringeth ſmarting paine, ſaith the truth now. What woe to themſelves, and to their ſeed for ever, brought that faire fruit with pleaſure eaten, when time was, of our firſt Parents? Would God no poſterity might rue the falls of them whom they loved. Surely, if the end prevailed in the thought, before ſinne prevailed in act, they ſhould rue them leſſe. O deed done, how bitterly biteth it when it is done, that was thought full ſweet before it was done, and now ſore lamented that ever done, or that againe it cannot bee undone. But had I knowne commeth ever behinde, too late to comfort, too ſoone to wring, and ever ſinne rubbeth upon the raw. Before theſe our Parents ſhould ſinne, honor, preferment, glory and joy were brought by a helliſh ſerpent to muſter themſelves before their eyes: and gods ſhall you bee, if you will doe this. But O wofull gods, when the deed was done. Then muſtred as faſt before their minde, death, hell, damnation, the wrath of God, and all terror and torture. And ſo is it ever: that Devill that pleadeth all mercy and goodneſſe, patience, and long-ſuffering in the Lord towards ſinners before they offend, upon boldneſſe thereof, to make them offend, that Devill as faſt thundreth damnation and death, juſtice and wrath, in the ſame Lord, when once wee have offended. Eſpecially if wee beginne to ſlack our diligent ſerving of his filthy humour.

2 Sam. 24. 2. O David ſpeake and inſtruct a little. What thoughteſt thou when Ioab muſt goe number all Iſrael and Iudah? Of wiſedome and policy to know my power. What felteſt thou when the deed was done? Security for a time, and all was well. But when God awaked, what? O aske me not that: For the remembrance of it as yet is grievous unto me. But if you will needs know, Verſe 10. I was ſmitten, I was bitten, I was wounded and wrung with the very furies of hell. My fleſh quaked, my heart aked, and my ſoule admitted feares upon feares. My conſcience cried, my ſpirit groned, & the world knew not what I felt within. Were mine eyes open, or were they ſhut, Verſe 10. the eyes of my mind ſtill ſaw my ſinne, and the face of juſtice in a mighty God againſt it. The reſt I found was to accuſe my ſelfe, and with ſobbing ſighs, and briniſh teares to utter my fall as I could for woe in words, of griefe to a gracious God, I have ſinned, I have ſinned, O my God and deare, in that I have done, exceedingly, now Lord I beſeech thee take away the treſpaſſe of thy ſervant, for I have done very fooliſhly. And what ſhould I ſay? the end was mercy, yet mingled with juſtice, I was brought into a wonderfull ſtrait, by an offer that was made. And whoſoever ſinneth, ſtrait in the end, either leſſe or more, as God appointeth, is the flower that bloweth upon ſuch a ſtalke, and ſo I leave you. Well then we heare, what wee were better to heare, than ever to feele as he felt it. For his heart ſmote him, ſmote him ſaith the Text, and the word importeth a twitching ſmart. Verſe 10.

David felt the fruits of other falls alſo, if wee remember them, and preacheth unto us to take heed of the pleaſures of ſinne for a ſeaſon. But I ſpeake not of all. And what leaſt is ſpoken, yet let it not leaſt be thought of. For who is wiſe will conſider theſe things, it is a ſaying often repeated in Scripture. Doe we thinke Manaſſes felt when he was firſt moved to ſinne, what hee felt in a ſtrength when God reclaimed? Peruſe his repentance and prayer, and judge your ſelfe, if he had found ſinne firſt, as he found it laſt, whether ever hee would ſo greatly have followed the cauſe of his woe. Did that thriftleſſe youth finde all as faire when his bagge was ſpent, and a lewd courſe runne, as when hee firſt received it, and began to ſinne? No, no, his pleaſure had paine, both without, and within, and a ſhort vagare, beyond the liſts of the Lords good liking, laid a grinding griefe upon his conſcience during life. Peter felt not when he denied, what hee felt when hee wept for woe, and that moſt bitterly, that ever he had denied. The Jewes felt not when they crucified Chriſt, what they felt full ſharpe when they were pricked in their hearts. Acts 3.7.

Never, never, ſhall wee bee without ſmart in the end, bee the beginning or proceſſe never ſo ſweet. And the Lord knoweth the meaſure. For circumſtances of action may pull greater meaſure of plagues from a juſt God, that hateth impurity. Happy is the ſoule that ſinneth leaſt, next, that returneth ſooneſt, and moſt dreadfull is the eſtate of them, that both for quality and time are left to the Devils malice and their owne corruption. One drop of water to coole my tongue, was a wofull cry, and beware the like. All temptations of this kind, bring us moſt readily to this perplexity. Thinke not you ſhall when you will, if you will not when you may. Herod and Pilate had their warnings, with many moe. Herod and Pilate would not be warned, with many moe. Therefore Herod and Pilate were truely plagued, with many moe. The longer you let your ſhip leake, when once ſhe leaketh, the greater danger and hardlier emptied. The ruinous doth ſhew the like.

The further the naile of ſinne, and ſome vile delight is driven in with the devills hammer, the hardlier got out with the Lords advice, which yet not profiting, killeth, becauſe it was not ſuffered to plucke it out. The Poet alſo ſaid it well. If thou beeſt ſicke, prevent the worſt, and ſeeke for remedy at the firſt, for when a ſickneſſe hath taken root, if thou take phyſick, it will not boot, thus think you then of all temptations in life together, and their end conſidered they ſhall be weake, through God that helpeth.

Now I pray you what meane theſe words, But deliver us from evill?

It is an explication, as hath beene ſaid of the former, and the firſt word (Deliver) teacheth us plainly that we are the ſervants of ſinne, and even ſold under ſinne, as the Apoſtle ſaith. The fall of Parents hath ſo made us, and humility of heart ever ſo confeſſeth it. Secondly, that our deliverance therehence commeth not from our ſelfe, or the power of any will or might in us, but onely and ever from this God, that wee pray to, from his power, from his goodneſſe and mercy, that hath no meaſure. Wee are dead in treſpaſſes and ſinnes of our ſelves, and wee can no more helpe our ſelves from ſinne, than from death. If the Sonne ſhall make you free (ſaith the Goſpel) then you be free indeed. By the ſecond word (Evill) ſome underſtand Satan, ſome ſinne, ſome death, but the beſt is to comprehend in it all evills, both of crime and paine, whether they be preſent or to come. Cyprian ſo expoundeth it in theſe words: In the laſt place wee put, But deliver us from evill, comprehending all kinds of adverſities, which the enemy worketh againſt us in this world. Auguſtine ſo expoundeth it, ſaying, When wee ſay, Deliver us from evill, wee admoniſh to conſider, that we are not as yet in that good caſe where we ſhall ſuffer no evill, and this which is laſt placed in the Lords Prayer, is extended ſo farre, and ſo plainly, that a Chriſtian man moved with any kind of tribulation, may in this Petition ſigh, in this ſhed his teares, begin herein, continue herein, and end his prayer herein. Bucher, Muſculus, Vrſinus, and many moe thus expound it. If any man will underſtand in it, chiefly, or by a principality, as it were, the Devill, let him ſo doe: for indeed he is the greateſt evill, and moſt peſtilent evill that wee need to pray to bee delivered from. Therefore ſay ſome, when we deſire that God will deliuer us from evill, wee deſire that hee will not ſend evill on us, but deliver us from all evils, preſent and to come, both of crime and paine. Rom. 7. 14. Epheſ. 2. Iohn 8. 36. Aug. ad Probam viduam. With any kind of tribulation marke it.

Secondly, that if hee ſend on us any evils, yet that hee would mitigate them in this life, and turne them unto our ſalvation, that they may be good and profitable unto us.

Thirdly, that hee will at length in the life to come fully and perfectly deliver us, and wipe away every teare from our eyes. Others ſay, wee begge of the Lord, that hee would in mercy renew us dayly, that is, powre into our hearts more and more, a moſt true liking and longing after all righteouſneſſe, and a moſt unfained hatred of all evill, by what name ſoever it may bee termed.

termed. And in the ſame uphold us ſtill, that wee may encreaſe, and never goe backward.

Sweet therefore every way is this, as all elſe that hath beene ſaid before, and beſeeming well the mouth, heart, and ſoule of every man and woman deſirous to pleaſe God. Deliver us, O bleſſed God from all evill. For if thou turne thy face away, wee ſhall bee troubled, yea, ſore troubled, diſmaied, and feared, though but even now wee ſaid; Tuſh, this wealth ſhall never decay. Pſal.30.

The Lord ſtand with us, and give us faith in our ſeverall dangers to cleave unto him. For what he biddeth aske, we may well aſſure our ſelves we ſhall receive if we aske, and that is a great comfort.

Thus much contenteth me now of this Prayer. The concluſion onely remaineth, which if you will a little open, your labour is ended to my good, and the Lord repay it.

The concluſion is this, For thine is the Kingdome, the Power, and Glory, for ever and ever. Which being expreſſed of Matthew, though of others it be omitted, yet muſt it carry his place with us, as many moe things doe, which one Evangeliſt noteth, and not another. The thing it ſelfe yeeldeth very great ſtrength to our faith, as touching the receiving of that we aske, containing in it three notable reaſons to that effect.

The firſt is drawne from the duty of a King, which is to heare his ſubjects, to defend and preſerve them. And therefore, Thine is the Kingdome, is as much as if we ſhould ſay: O Lord, grant our petitions, ſince thou art King, and haſt all things under thy rule, even all evill, to ſuppreſſe it, and all good, to give it, ſo farre as with thy good liking it may bee for our good: and ſince wee are thy ſubjects, whom it hath pleaſed thee to take care of, ever ſince we hanged upon our mothers breſts.

The ſecond reaſon is drawne from the power; which as it is infinite, ſo is it able to give us whatſoever wee want. There is nothing too hard, nothing too great, which hee cannot give. Thine is the power, even all power, might, and ſtrength, joyned with goodneſſe, and therefore I faint not.

The third reaſon is taken from the end or finall cauſe: For thine is the glory; that is, we deſire theſe things for thy glory. Of thee alone, the true God and ſoveraigne King, we deſire and expect all good things, and ſo wee yeeld unto thee this thy glory, and this thine honour, and profeſſe thee to be the Authour and fountaine of all good things. And verily, becauſe this glory is due unto thee, therefore doe we deſire them of thee. Heare us therefore for thy glory, and eſpecially becauſe thou wilt alſo for thy glory ſake, give thoſe things which wee deſire. For what things ſerve for thy glory, the ſame wilt thou performe and doe: but thoſe things which wee deſire, ſerve for thy glory, therefore thou wilt give them us. Give us therefore theſe things that we deſire, and the glory ſhall returne and redound unto thee, if thou deliver us. For ſo ſhall thy Kingdome, and power, and glory be manifeſted. Vrſinus.

See then beloved a ſweet comfort. If your requeſt that you make to your God may be good for you to receive, as well may the Lord loſe his Kingdome, loſe his power, and loſe his glory, as you faile of your fruit and hearts deſire. For ſo teacheth this concluſion as you ſee. And if it b ee not good for you to have, in the wiſedome of a mighty God ſo knowne, who can better tell than you your ſelfe what is fit for you, would you have it? God forbid. Strengthen your hearts then in your prayers alwayes with this. There is no King can be like minded to his ſubject as the Lord is to you: there is no power like the Lords, and his glory ever was and ever ſhall be deare unto him. Note it.

And therefore what may be his glory to give, and your good to receive, his power can reach it, his love ſhall grant it, and you ſhall never want it. For no good thing ſhall he withhold from his children, ſaith the Prophet David. Stocks and ſtones cannot doe this: Idols and Images cannot doe this: No the Angels of heaven cannot doe this: much leſſe inferiour creatures; and therefore know what it is to leave the right and take the wrong, to diſhonour your God, and to hurt your ſelves by praying to theſe things. Pſal.84.

The word Amen is added, not as a part of the Prayer, but as a particle noting our wiſh of heart, to be heard and to obtaine. As if wee ſhould ſay, O Lord, thus bee it unto mee, what my tongue or ſoule hath begged: ſo bee it, Amen, Amen, ſo Lord, ſo Lord, and then even in a ſweet reſt of heart and content of mind, that I have uttered my ſelfe to my God, I riſe up and goe my way, leaving all to him. And thus much of this heavenly Prayer, the patterne of all Prayers, according as the Lord hath inabled me. Bleſſed be the name of the Lord, from this time forth for evermore. Amen, Amen.

The

The Prayer.

O Moſt tender God, and deare Father, looke upon us, and hearken to us, in that mercy of thine that hath no meaſure, and when ever it ſhall pleaſe thine owne ſelfe to trie us by any temptation, doe it in mercy according to our ſtrength, and for our good. And ſuffer us never to bee tempted above our power, but give the iſſue with the temptation, that we may be able to beare it. Let it open unto us our want and weakeneſſe, to reforme us, but never cauſe feare above faith to overcome us. Come well, come woe, either outward or inward, make us contented, and ſtrengthen our ſteps in both eſtates to thy bleſſed liking, that proſperity puffe not up, nor adverſity plucke us downe above that is fit for thy true children. If men aſſault us and tempt us unto evill, O Lord give wiſdome to diſcerne them, feare to follow them, and zeale to defie them. And let not the pleaſures of ſinne for a ſeaſon prevaile above thy favour, and our eternall good. That helliſh Fiend ſo raging and roaring, and ever ſo greedy to devoure us, deare Father, let him want his will, and all his temptations come to nought. Encreaſe our knowledge to bewray his ſleights, and ſupport our faith to quench his darts. Let ſinne appeare ſinne, and ever damnable: let it never ſeeme good and very tolerable. But plucke off thoſe maskes, O heavenly God, that it often cometh diſguiſed withall, and let our eyes, through thy mercy, bewray both the nature & end of ſuch delicates, as thy ſervant DAVID prayed he might never taſte of. O bleſſed Father, help us againſt our owne corruption, our owne concupiſcence and ſinne. Our fleſh, our fleſh, O Lord, let it not prevaile to the working of our woe, and everlaſting fall. The ſpirit is willing, but the fleſh is fraile, full of gain-ſayings, ſtrivings and ſtruglings againſt thy will. And wee know with thine Apoſtle, that in us, that is, in our fleſh dwelleth no good thing, So that unleſſe thou helpe, moſt deare Father, it will rebell, and we ſhall die. Deliver us from evill, even from all evill, eternall God, as if we ſhould name them one by one, ſo farre as may ſtand with thy bleſſed pleaſure, and our obedience to thee. And finally, deare God, though we be unworthy to goe upon this ground, becauſe it is thy obedient creature more than wee, much leſſe to lift up our eyes to heaven, where thou dwelleſt, and to receive any comfort that we aske: yet for that red blood, and heart blood of Jeſus Chriſt, that never ſinned againſt thee, but obeyed thee fully for us, and in whom thou art perfectly pleaſed, have mercy upon us, have mercy upon us, pardon and deliver us from all our ſinnes, and ſo guide the courſe of this earthly pilgrimage here amongſt men, that we may ſpend it, and end it in thy feare, and in thy favour: afflicted howſoever according to thy will, yet not in diſtreſſe: in doubt (if ſo thou wilt have it) yet not deſpairing: perſecuted, but not forſaken: caſt downe at thy pleaſure, but not periſhing: through good report and ill report with thy holy Apoſtle, paſſing our dayes, and doing our duties with ſingleneſſe and ſimplicity of heart. Thoſe infinit temptations that abound in this life (there being no calling ſo holy, nor place ſo ſolitary, but that men ſhall find both troubles to trie them, and adverſity to diſquiet them) ſo rule and governe, ſo moderate and temper with thy hand of mercy, that wee may ever conquer, and never be conquered to our finall hurt. But as birds limed, and yet not over-limed, eſcape thoſe twigs that would have caught us, and ſerve thee here whileſt life endureth, faſt cleave unto thee when life departeth, and ever live with thee when once it is ended: for that ſweet and deare Chriſt Jeſus ſake, and with thee, O Father, and the holy Ghoſt, we bleſſe and praiſe, honor and magnifie, for ever and ever, one God and Lord, world without end. Amen, Amen.

A CONFERENCE BETWIXT MANS FRAILTIE AND FAITH.

FRAILTIE.

Wicked world, and wretched ſtate I ſtand in, O heavy heart and ſorowing ſoul, how ſhould I comfort you? I have it not, I ſee it not, I feele it not, what any way might joy me, and how then can I give it you? The contrary I ſee in fulleſt weight and meaſure, and wo is me ten thouſand times that ever I ſaw this light: yea, let the day even periſh wherein I was born, and the night when it was ſaid, there is a man child conceived. Let that day be darkneſs, let not God regard it from above, neither let the light ſhine upon it. But let darkneſſe and the ſhadow of death ſtain it, let the cloud remain upon it, and let them make it feareſull as a bitter day: let darkneſſe poſſeſſe that night, let it not be joyned unto the dayes of the yeare, nor let it come into the accounts of the moneths. Yea, deſolate be that night, and let no joy be in it. Let the Stars of that twilight be dimme through darkneſſe of it: let it look for light, but have none: neither let it ſee the dawning of the day, becauſe it ſhut not up the doores of my mothers womb, nor hid ſorow from my eyes. Why dyed I not in the birth, or why dyed I not, when I came out of the womb? Why did the knees prevent me, and why did I ſuck the breaſts? For ſo ſhould I now have lyen and been quiet, I ſhould have ſlept then, and been at reſt. Or why again was I not hid, as an untimely birth, either as infants, which have not ſeen the light? Woe is me I live, woe is me I doe not die, and woe I feare much more, when ended is my courſe. Iob. 3.

FAITH.

Why Frailty, what in the name of God meaneth this feareſull impatience, or what caſe can there be in the life of man and woman ſo uncomfortable, as that in regard thereof, they ſhould thus cry out? Open your ſelfe, and conceale not your griefe, for the very ſpeaking of it ſhall give ſome meaſure of eaſe.

FRAILTIE.

Alas, I know not almoſt how to do it: For my conceits do ſo oppreſſe me, and ever as I thinke of one miſery, ſtill the remembrance of another thruſteth it ſelf ſo into my minde, and at laſt the heap appears ſo huge, as all amazed I faint under the beholding of them, and my cogitations are ſo diſtracted, as it is not poſſible for me to make an orderly rehearſall of my woe. Yet ſince I have met with you, I will performit as I can, committing my ſelfe to that mercy, that hath no meaſure, and to your ſelf, as an inſtrument to apply his comforts to me, begging it even with teares ten thouſand times at your hands. I conſider then, that I am created here in this world a reaſonable creature, conſiſting of body and ſoule, both ſubject to dreadfull and endleſſe woe if I finde not mercy with the Lord, which I confeſſe unto you I comfortably cannot aſſure my ſelf of as yet, becauſe the hand of God, me thinke, more heavily preſſeth me divers wayes, than I imagine it would doe if he loved me.

FAITH.

And wherein I pray you, doe you thinke you are preſſed over-heavily?

Poverty the first Temptation.

FRAILTIE.

ALAS in many things (and yet God lay not my pleading with him to my charge.) To begin with ſomething, I muſt needs confeſſe unto you, that my low eſtate in the world is a marvellous temptation to me many a time. For God knows I am poore, & even very poore, notwithſtanding all my pains, cark and care, which is not a little. My charge alſo is great for ſuch an one as I am, and their want, as good reaſon bindeth, is my continuall woe. Yet if this were all, me think I could wraſtle with it, and by Gods help get the victory, but theſe companions of poverty are they that ſting me ſo ſore, to wit, diſdain and contempt both of me and mine, of my doings, ſayings, or any thing that proceedeth from me, and that rejection which is made of me out of all meetings and companies, thoſe whiſperings that I beare, reproaches that I cary, even at their hands that I little thought would have done it, and that ſcornfull pitying of me, which often appeareth, with ſuch like. For indeed, if ever any found it, I finde it true, that by wiſe Syrach was ſaid ſo long ago: There is even as much peace betwixt the rich and the poore, as betwixt Hyena and the dog. But looke how the wilde Aſſe is the Lions prey, ſo are the poore meate for the rich. And looke how the proud hate humility, ſo doe the rich abhorre the poore. If a rich man fall, his friends ſet him up againe: but when the poore falleth, his friends drive him away. If a rich man offend, he hath many helpers, he ſpeaketh proud words, and yet men juſtifie him: but if a poore man faile, they rebuke him, and though he ſpeake wiſely, yet can he have no place. When the rich man ſpeaketh, every man holdeth his tongue, and looke what he ſaith, they praiſe it to the cloudes: but if the poore man ſpeake, they ſay, what fellow is this? And if he doe amiſſe, they will deſtroy him. Theſe, theſe companions of my poverty, are the things that even cut mine heart aſunder, and will I, nill I, it breaketh even upon me by force as it were, to thinke that if the Lord love a man, he ſhould never ſuffer him for want of worldly traſh, ſo deſpiteſully to be intreated in this world, and ſo generally. This is but one thing that troubleth me, beſides which I have many moe, but help me if you can ere I goe any further.

Syrach 13.19.

FAITH.

Nay goe on, utter your griefe fully, and then your minde will bee the fitter to heare a great deale. For otherwiſe you will be muſing of the reſt, when I ſhall bee ſpeaking to you for your eaſe in this.

FRAILTY.

Another very dangerous torment then, I muſt needs confeſſe, is that continuall uncomfortableneſs, which is ſtill in me by reaſon of divers things, as by a weighty and ſtinging ſenſe of mine owne ſins; by ſight of other mens looſe courſe, and grievous diſhonoring of God in every place, giving themſelves to flattery, diſſembling, and all maner of hollow dealing with God and man; by meditation of the fierce wrath of God, and moſt dreadfull judgements, which aſſuredly hang over us for theſe things, &c.

Againe, both publikely abroad, in ſuch as I deale withall, and privately at home in ſuch as I truſt, I finde ſuch naughty unfaithfulneſſe, and ſuch unfaithfull naughtineſſe, as that I am driven into greater choller and heat, than can any way ſtand with my profeſſion of the Goſpell, and with the liking of my heavenly Father, whom I have ever found good unto me: and therefore juſtly I ſtand in feare that he will puniſh me for ſuch intemperancy, and yet I cannot amend it.

Now I pray you let me goe no further without ſome comfort, if you know any for ſo wretched and wofull a caſe.

FAITH.

Indeed Frailty, your termes are too ſharpe and ſowre: For, me thinke, for any thing you have yet uttered, your eſtate is neither wretched nor wofull in truth, but Chriſtian-like, if you will lay awhile away your earthly eyes, and be judged by the word of God.

FRAILTIE.

Ah ſie, ſie, is your feeling of my caſe no more? Then have I uttered enough, and too much: But ſee my heavy plight, I am every way wrapped in woe, and yet I am not pitied.

FAITH.

FAITH.

Nay but ſtay your ſelfe for ſhame Frailty, and be not ſo raſh. And if I cannot prove what I ſay, then be offended, but if I can, then as you feare God be reformed, for this impatience in you is dangerous. I ſay therefore againe, mee thinke your temptations bee not ſtrange, but ſuch as uſually happen to Gods deare ones, and ſuch, as (for any thing I ſee) Jeſus Chriſt the Saviour of man did foretell, and deliver ſure and ſoveraigne comforts for, while he was here on earth, in divers places, and by name in that notable Chapter of Matthew the fifth. But before I can apply the ſame unto you, I muſt know of you one thing, concerning your firſt griefe, namely, how you feele your heart within humbled by theſe things. For indeed if you be poore and bare, and ſo forced to ſtoop in outward matters to the richer, and yet your heart remain proud within you, arrogant, haughty, and conceited, your tongue bragging the beſt, and your vanity ever as it can breaking out, and giving teſtimony what you would doe, if your hands were not tyed, and your hornes made ſhort of purpoſe by the Lord, then indeed I muſt plainly tell you, that your poverty is a whip of an angry God as yet with you, and it will not certainly bee removed from you in any favour: but even ſtill God ſhall check you, and every neighbour either openly, or ſecretly miſlike you. For a beggars hand, and a proud heart hath ever offended the eye both of God and man. But if God hath given you this bleſſed grace, that by this croſſe of want, diſdaine, contempt, ſcorne, and ſuch like in your calling, your ſoule is ſchooled, your heart is humbled, your ſpirit broken, and all your unruly and heady affections tamed within you very greatly in compariſon of former times, ſo that even your conſcience doth witneſſe to you, it is not with you, as it hath been in many reſpects, and if now you finde, that often you are driven to God and his providence by this meanes, caſting up your eyes to Heaven for helpe, ſtay, and ſuccour, becauſe you finde but frozen hearts in men, and falſhood in the beſt fellowſhip leſſe or more; truly then muſt I as plainly tell you againe, and with as bold a ſpirit, as ſuch a truth requires, your poverty is wealth, your contempt may be your comfort, and if ever man or woman had God their friend, you may aſſure your ſoule in truth, he is no foe unto you.

FRAILTY.

O Faith, ſay not this, but prove it.

Comfort againſt Poverty.

FAITH.

With a very good will. I pray you therefore marke me. When Chriſt, as I ſaid before, was here upon earth to gather unto himſelfe the ſoules of men by life and death, knowing in his infinite wiſdome the raine that would fall, the floods that would come, and the winds that would blow and beate upon the houſes of men, that is, their faith and religion, on a time his Diſciples being come together, and much people beſide out of many places, hee ſate him downe, and tooke as it ſeemeth to me this matter in hand, of very purpoſe, delivering out ſuch comforts and helps, ſuch defences and ſtayes, as being of men and women rightly applyed and uſed, ſhall ever hold up their courſe, and keep their paths ſtraight in the feare of the Lord and true religion. And ſee, amongſt the manifold temptations, that he ſaw in wiſdome would ariſe and be urged by Satan to ſhake men from the truth, this of yours which now wee ſpeake of is the firſt, namely, poverty: againſt which his heavenly voice delivereth out this comfort: Bleſſed are the poore, for theirs is the kingdome of God. Which golden ſentence laid out in fuller tearmes, caryeth and implyeth to us this ſenſe and meaning. Although earthly mindes can frame out no felicity, unleſſe with worldly wealth their cup may overflow, yet I avouch unto you, contrary to the wit and wiſdome of them all, that in my Fathers kingdome, bleſſed are the poore, the poore I ſay againe, and ſuch as want what others wallow in, not halfe ſo loved of the Lord as they. Luke 6.20.

Now leſt his meaning ſhould be miſtaken, he ſaying no more but ſo, and every ſpoiling unthrift, whoſe unreformed heart doth make an unrepaired purſe, or idle drones that ſhunne the courſe of men, and ſhut themſelves up in Cloiſters as poore, that with more eaſe they may live of other mens labours, or any proud heart yet wanting wealth might think it ſpoken unto him, he more plainly hath interpreted his meaning, and ſhewed what poore he thinketh of, namely, the poore in ſpirit: that is, ſuch as uſing godly meanes, yet are of purpoſe by their God kept under, and being under, do not ſwell with pride, arrogancy, and conceit, but even as the begger knowing his want, and no way having of his owne to truſt to, confeſſeth other mens helpe need- Non magnum eſt ſua, ſed ſe relinquere.

needfull for him, humbleth himſelfe before them, beggeth their aide, and giveth them (as inſtruments) the praiſe of his living: ſo they humbled, tamed, ſchooled and reformed by their want, towards all men carry a lowly heart, and only at the Lords hands looke for both comfort in this world, and ſalvation in the world to come. Theſe poore men and women, that is, theſe that are thus affected under the croſſe, ſaith Chriſt, were their want more than ever any abode, and the companions of their wants, ſnubs, checks, and taunts, and ſuch like, more and more bitter than ever any mans were, yet even in the moſt of them all, I pronounce them bleſſed, and I aſſure them happy that ever they lived, for theirs is the kingdome of God. For this cauſe therefore I asked you how you were affected under your poverty.

And now Frailty, conſider and weigh this ſentence of the Lord. For enough it is of it ſelfe, if our incredulity be not monſtrous, to comfort the heart of any man or woman in the world, even in the midſt of all their worldly wants be they never ſo great. Yet hath it annexed for our further joy the conſent of other places many, and experiences of the ſame in knowne examples not a few. As, If thou lend to my people, that is, to the poore, I will bleſſe thee ſaith the Lord. The Lord delivereth the poore in all his afflictions. The Lord will be a defence unto the poore, even a refuge in due time of trouble. He remembreth & forgetteth not the complaint of the poore when he maketh inquiſition for blood. The poore ſhall not alwayes be forgotten, neither the hope of the afflicted periſh for ever. Lord thou haſt heard the deſire of the poore, thou prepareſt their heart, and thine eare hearkeneth therennto. He hath not deſpiſed the low eſtate of the poore, but they ſhall eat & be ſatisfied. I am poore and in miſery, but the Lord careth for me. Better is the poore that walketh in his uprightneſſe, than he that perverteth his wayes though he be rich. That which is to be deſired in a man, is his goodneſſe, and better is ſuch a poore man than a lyar. God regardeth the poore and is their ſtrength. And unto whom againe, ſaith the Lord, ſhall I look and have regard, but unto him that is poore and of a contrite ſpirit, and trembleth at my words. The ſpirit of the Lord is upon me, and hath annointed me to preach the Goſpell to the poore. And, the poore doe receive the glad tydings of the Goſpell. Call the halt, and lame, and poore to the Supper. And hath not God choſen the poore of this world ſaith Iames, &c. with a number ſuch like teſtimonies. The comfort whereof if they be rightly conſidered, and the bleſſing of them unto our heart by humble prayer begged at the Lords hands, no tongue of man is able to expreſſe. For the Lord our God is no man that hee ſhould repent, nor as the ſonne of man that hee ſhould change: but if he loved the poore when theſe things were ſpoken, he loveth them ſtill, and to the end hee will love them: and if he regard them, he forgetteth not us, and even amongſt our ſelves, if he ſee you, he beholdeth alſo me, and if hee comfort mee, hee will doe no leſſe for you, for there is no reſpect of perſons in his eyes. Yet adde unto theſe the experience of examples, and they will be more ſweet. Naomi and her daughter Ruth, how did the Lord regard, bleſſe, comfort, and provide for? The poore widow of Sarepta whoſe meale and oyle were at an end, and yet the dearth foretold much to come, how regarded he and fed during all the time? The other poore widow alſo helped by Eliſha to pay her debts, and to live afterward with comfort of the reſt, how ſheweth it the care of the Lord over the poore that are godly, and how mightily ſhould it increaſe our faith? What an example is old Tobiah and his family, and what a ſpeech of faith was that to his ſon? Feare not my ſon becauſe we are made poore: for thou haſt many things, if thou feare God and fly from ſin, and do that thing which is acceptable unto him. How loved the Lord the offering of the poore widow that caſt in but two mites? How choſe he diſciples and followers of his truth ever of the poorer ſort? How choſe he his parents, of the very meaneſt certainly of a multitude, and how himſelfe hath he honored the ſtate of godly poverty, for our eternall comfort, having not ſo much in this world as the Foxes and Birds: borne in a ſtable, wrapped in ragges, laid in the manger, and yet the God and Lord of heaven and earth, and the diſpoſer of all the glory in them both. O my heart and hand, how is the one too narrow to conceive this heavenly ſweet, and the other unable to lay down but even that little that I doe feele? Shall any worldly want make us thinke God loveth us leſſe, when we ſee the moſt loved that ever was in the greateſt want? Shall any diſcountenance, diſfavour diſcredit cauſeleſſe, ſhall any ſnubs, checks, taunts, ſcornes, contempt, rumors, or the very power of the ſpite of hell drive us out of hope in our gracious Father, when wee ſee examples in his deareſt of them all? O Frailty, Frailty, open thine eyes, looke upon thy God, weigh his nature, marke his dealings with his deareſt, heare his promiſes, make him no lyer, but gather ſtrength, increaſe hope, and the Lord in mercy grant it to us for ever. Let the changes and chances of this world bee what they will, or rather what it pleaſeth God, let our orderly walking in our places with true paines, heart, and meaning, with due carefulneſſe, with no unthriftineſſe, up early, downe late, and whatſoever meanes that good are to live and lay up by, for our ſelves, and ours, yet want their end of ſuch reaſonable ſtore as we deſire, let us nevertheleſſe truſt in our God, and hang upon his hand, and never meaſure his favours towards us by theſe things, for they are no judges of it, being as we ſee oft granted to the wicked, and reſtrained greatly from the moſt beloved. Onely let our poverty make poore our ſpirits, and breake the ſecret pride of our hearts, and then feare not, we have a warrant rant of truth; Bleſſed are the poore in ſpirit, for theirs is the kingdome of heaven; and a broken and contrite heart, O God thou ſhalt never deſpiſe. The contrary might now as greatly be amplified to our comfort, if I thought it needfull. For as his mercifull promiſes are many & ſweet (as we have heard) to the poore, ſo are his fearfull threatnings to the rich not a few: and as great is the good that is wrought in the childe of God by this croſſe of want, ſo fearfull are the faults that are given unto the ſoules of many by their ſtore of wealth. Let it ſuffice to marke what this ſame our Saviour ſaith by the mouth of Luke, and oppoſeth over againſt the promiſe ſpoken of now already: Woe be to you that are rich, for you have received you conſolation, ſaith he, and after him his Apoſtle Iames againe; Goe to now ye rich men, weepe and howle for your miſeries which ſhall come upon you: your riches are corrupt, and your garments moath-eaten: your gold and ſilver is cankred, and the ruſt of them ſhall be a witneſſe againſt you, and ſhall eat your fleſh as if it were fire, &c. And Paul again, Gaine is not godlineſſe, but godlineſſe is great gaine, if a man be content with that he hath, 1 Tim. 4. 6. for we brought nothing into the world, and it is certaine that we can carry nothing out. Therefore when we have food and raiment, let us therewith be content: for they that will be rich, fall into temptation and ſnares, and into many fooliſh & noyſome luſts which drowne men in perdition and deſtruction. For the deſire of mony is the root of all evill, which while ſome luſted after, they pierced thẽſelves through with many ſorrowes. But thou ô man of God, flie theſe things, and follow after righteouſneſs, godlines, faith, love, patience and meekneſſe, fight the good fight of faith, lay hold of eternall life, &c. By all which we do as evidently ſee again, that honor, fame, port, pompe, wealth and abundance in this world, are no ſure witneſſes of Gods favour, and therefore the want of them no ſure argument to the contrary, but the end and very truth is this, if wee feare God and bee poore, poverty is great gaine. And if further the Lord goe with us, and make riches alſo increaſe, yet may wee never ſet our hearts upon them, for there is no ſure comfort in them. And thus me thinke Frailty for this firſt griefe there ſhould grow comfort, and you ſhould now bee contented. For certainly, certainly, as God is God, or truth truth, poverty is no token of Gods diſpleaſure to all, but a ſingular meanes of much goodneſſe unto many, and thus much onely of it at this time. The Lord give us profit by his promiſes.

Comfort againſt unchearfulneſſe and ſorrow, the ſecond temptation.

YOur ſecond temptation you ſay is this, the heavy weight you feele of your ſinnes, and the continuall ſorrow and griefe that is annexed and joyned thereunto. For comfort and ſtay whereof I ſeeke no further than to the place of Matthew named before.

For even there alſo in the very next verſe is this aſſault beate backe, and breach made up, being in wiſedome foreſeene of Chriſt, as a thing that greatly ſhould goe about to ſhake his childrens faith. What therefore you thinke your miſery, hee maketh your happineſſe: and what you thinke your woe, hee maketh your comfort ſure and certaine. Bleſſed (ſaith hee) are they that mourne, for they ſhall be comforted. Which mourning can no wayes be meant but of ſuch as now yours is, if it ariſe (as you affirme) by ſight of ſinne committed againſt your God, whom yet you love and hope in, though it be with much weakneſſe. For worldly ſorrow (ſaith the Apoſtle) cauſeth death, but godly ſorrow cauſeth repentance unto ſalvation, not to be repented of. Worldly ſorrow ariſeth upon outward griefes, or ſight of outward puniſhment commonly: and godly ſorrow upon ſight of ſinne committed againſt a mercifull God, and a good God, ten thouſand times deſerving better ſervice of us, and who yet will be mercifull, if we repent and amend. Therefore the end of the one is nothing but deſperation and woe, if the Lord doe not ſpeedily helpe; and the end of the other as you heare even Chriſt himſelfe ſay, is happineſſe and comfort: which that you may yet more firmly feele, and to greater joy with both hands apprehend, let it not be tedious in a few examples to behold the truth of both.

Upon the Lords Prayer in the ſixt Petition, read more, as well for diſcomfort by ſinne, as other worldly heavineſſe that will ſometimes take one, and as it were overwhelme us.

Did not Cain ſorrow, and ſadly caſt downe his countenance when he perceived a regard given to his brother, and not to himſelfe? pinched it not his heart within, when God gave ſentence of him? Wee ſee it evidently, and yet nevertheleſſe wee know withall that the Lord abhorred him.

Did not Eſau mourne, when he wept for woe, and doubling over his ſpeech to his Father, ſo expreſſed the paſſion of a pained heart within him? yet found hee no place to repentance ſaith the Apoſtle, though hee ſought it with teares, but was rejected as a prophane perſon notwithſtanding all his ſorrow. Gen. 4, 5, 11, 12.

What griefe griped the heart of Saul thinke you, when he ſaw his Army ſpoyled, his three ſonnes ſlaine, himſelfe ſore gauled and wounded with the Archers ſhot, when hee deſired his Armour bearer to thruſt him through with his ſword, and for want of his aſſent, was glad to do it himſelfe, and ſo become his owne deſtroyer? Was this no ſorrow and griefe? Yet not bleſſed, but curſed ſuch mourning and ſuch mourner. 1 Sam. laſt.

What horrible hell of deſpairfull griefe battered the heart of Achitophel that famous Counſellor, when he ſaw the diſtreſſe hee ſtood in, and for eaſe and end of that heavy hap, was glad to 2 Sam. 13 23.

to conclude his owne ſhamefull confuſion, to put his owne head himſelfe in the halter, and to hang himſelf? Fell ever this out think we, before even ſeas of ſorowes had wrecked and worne within himſelfe all kinde of comfort away? No certainly, but ſuch rufull ends have ever heaps of rufull conflicts and conceits before them, and therefore we ſee ſome ſorow far ſeparate from this promiſe of Chriſt in this place.

Acts 1. To conclude, what wo or worm think we, did gnaw the heart of Iudas, when the guilt of his cruell deed did preſſe his ſoule ſo ſad, that neither reward received, nor any kinde of conceit either of God or man, could ſtay his hands from finiſhing his owne life? Yet a curſed woe, we know, and ſo far from the gaine of this promiſe here, as ſin is ſevered from a vertue.

Now of the other part, weigh the ſorow that you are in if you tell me true, and marke the iſſue of it: Bleſſed ſaith the Lord Jeſus is it, and bleſſed are they that conceive and feel it, for they ſhall be comforted. And then in his word he affordeth examples to ſhew the truth by triall of this promiſe. David mourned for the multitude of his iniquities, and remained mourning, as he ſaith, all the day long. Every night he waſhed his bed with weeping, and watred his couch with teares. The ſinnes of his youth ſtinged him, and the ſinnes of his age grieved him: his knowne offences made him full woe, and yet his ſecret ſinnes remained terrible. Now the end of all was comfort, according to this promiſe, and bleſſed David that ever he felt with griefe ſo much his grievous tranſgreſſions. The like did Manaſſes and was comforted: The like did the Publican and was comforted: the like did the Prodigall Son, Mary, Rahab, Lot, Noah, and all the reſt of ſaved ſinners ſince the world ſtood, and were comforted. Now the promiſe is made and offered as heartily and freely to you, to me, and to all that ever will take hold of it, as ever it was to them.

Pſal. 6. 6.

Rom. 15. 4. For, Whatſoever things are written afore time, are written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. And therefore Frailty awake, and wipe thy dazled eyes, behold the end of ſenſe of ſinne and ſorow joyned thereunto: it is happineſſe, it is bleſſedneſſe, and it is certaine, ſure, and laſting comfort, if God be true. The like may bee ſaid of that ſorrow alſo that ariſeth not upon our owne, but other mens miſeries, as for the want of the word, for want of fruit when it is had, for hereſies, diviſions, and ſchiſmes in the Church, and ſuch like, for this is a godly ſorow, and ſhall be comforted. A doctrine ſo ſweet as no pen can lay downe. Sweet I ſay to all, and yet even moſt ſweet to the Miniſters, to whom it was chiefly ſpoken: for hee lift up his eyes upon his diſciples ſaith the text, when hee ſpake theſe things, as knowing what ſtore of ſtormes ſhould ariſe unto them by reaſon of their calling. And therefore let them take it in the name of God, as it is offered to them, and clapſe it in their arms ſo hard to their heart as all the woes in the world may not looſe their hold frō it. For the truth hath ſaid it, and experience tryeth it, they ſhall love and not be loved, they ſhall labour and not be liked, they ſhall ſerve at the Altar and but poorely live of the Altar. Their piety ſhall be hypocriſie, their zeale, choler: their heate, youth: their prayers ſhall not profit, their watchings ſhall waſte, and their faſtings doe no good, but ſin ſhall ſtill raigne, iniquity abound, the greater part remaine unreformed, and they for all their love, labour and true faithfulneſſe, be rejected, and contemned in the end. Whereupon what woe doth grow to the ſoule that ſavoured any truth of meaning, love to God, or good will to men, let them judge that have felt, or whoſe wiſdomes can weigh what the Lord hath not given them tryall of in themſelves. Surely ſuch it is, as is able to make the meekeſt Moſes plead with the Lord, and aske why he ſo vexeth his ſervant with an unthankfull charge, and commandeth to cary in his boſome as a nurſe the ſucklling childe, ſo perverſe a people as though he had conceived them or begotten them all himſelfe. Such as is able to make Ieremy cry in the twitching torment of his minde; Woe is me my mother that ever thou bare me, a contentious man, and a man that ſtriveth with the whole earth. I have neither lent upon uſury, nor men have lent me upon uſury, and yet every one doth curſe me. O Lord thou haſt deceived me, and I am deceived, thou art ſtronger than I, and haſt prevailed, I am in deriſion daily, every one mocketh me. For ſince I ſpake and cryed out of wrong, the word of the Lord was made a reproach unto me: and therefore I will make mention no more of thee, nor ſpeak no more of thee, nor ſpeake any more in thy name. But here is a comfort to ſtay all impatiency, and to continue their courſe in ſerving of the Lord in their callings ſtill. Bleſſed are they that mourne for the want of the feare of God in men, for their ſorow ſhall have joy, and they ſhall be comforted at the laſt. And in the meane time, Elie his ſpeech is meet for every one: It is the Lord, let him doe what ſeemeth good unto him. And Behold here am I, be it unto me as my God will. Thus may the Miniſters apply this promiſe. And for you Frailty, or any one in your caſe, I pray you alſo conſider how it fitteth you. For what can you ſay now, groning under this griefe of yours, travelling and heavy loaden with your ſinnes, what can you ſay, I ſay, if you ſay your worſt, but even cry out upon the fulneſſe and fowleneſſe of your iniquity, upon the ripeneſſe and rottenneſſe of your ſinne, ſaying your life is loſſe unto you, and there is no joy under the Sunne, that you can conceive of any thing by reaſon of your ſinne? For you have beene an Idolater, a blaſphemous ſwearer, a Sabbath breaker, a diſobedient childe to parents, not ſubject to Prince, a murtherer, malicious and ſpitefull; an adulterer, wanton and light; a theefe, deceitfull and unjuſt; a falſe witneſſe, an evill thinker, and what not? And therefore though for many ſinnes you could hope of mercy, yet for ſo many you cannot, but a heape together beateth you downe, when many ſingle ones could not doe it. This is the worſt you can ſay, and this is ill enough if God give not faith: yet ſee how all this is nothing, where this promiſe is marked. For even this ſorrow, this mourning, this diſcomfort and griefe that you have conceived by ruing of your life, is a ſure token that you are the Lords, and that he hath mercy for you, if you will not ſtand in defiance of him, but be of good hope he ſeeth you.

And my proofe is no worſe than the Lords owne words, Bleſſed are they that mourne, (for their ſinnes and tranſgreſſion, for their wants and weakneſſe, and for their looſe courſe in the wayes of ſo good a God) for they ſhall be comforted. Shall hee ſay bleſſed, and you ſay curſed? ſhall hee promiſe comfort, and you ſay you are caſt away? God forbid. Remember what the Spirit ſaith in the firſt of Iohn 5.10. Hee that beleeveth not God, hath made him lyer. And therefore conclude with your ſelfe and be cheared with it, were there no more promiſes, (which yet are many beſides) of mercy unto ſinners, yet were this ſufficient to ſtay the weakneſſe of any if the Lord be in them, to give them faith in it, that the God of truth hath pronounced happineſſe to this wo, and entailed ſurely a certaine comfort in time to deſcend unto this ſorrow. Many mo I ſay are the promiſes of God, and many more are the places of comfort in this your caſe, but my leiſure ſerveth not now to make a Treatiſe of a Conference: And when enough is ſaid, why ſhould you not be ſatisfied? God hath ſpoken it, the power of hell cannot diſprove it, and you ſhould beleeve it, and I doe end with it; happy are you, or any man or woman in the world if you feele your ſinne, and ſorrow for it, ſo that you will beleeve. For you are not a caſt away, but you ſhall be comforted: you weepe now, but you ſhall laugh, and you ſhall feele the performance of the words of David, Pſalme 126.5. They that ſow in teares ſhall reape in joy; and they that goe weeping and carry precious ſeed, ſhall returne with joy, and bring their ſheaves with thē. Whereas the ſame God ſaith with a thundering ſound, Woe bee to them that laugh now, for they ſhall weepe. Woe be to them that in this life ſtretch themſelves upon their beds of Ivory, ſing to the ſound of the Violl, and drinke their wine in bowles of Gold, without ſenſe or ſorrow for their ſinnes: for the day will come when this ſweet ſhall want, and what hath not erſt beene felt, ſhall ſmart and ſting, and burne no leſſe than the fire of hell, and ſtrongeſt venome of deſtruction that ever was or may be. God therefore give us faith, and what feeling of ſinne it pleaſeth him. For this fleſhly peace, and ſecurity within us, is no token of love, and the contrary weakning, griefe and woe, is nothing ever to diſmay us. Amen.

Strength againſt the heat of affections, the third temptation.

YOur third aſſault ariſeth of the divers injuries and ſundry wrongs that you ſuſtaine abroad, without redreſſe or revenge, together with the undutifulneſſe either knowne, or imagined in your owne houſhold and family, whereby you are driven to greater impatiency often than may ſtand with the liking of your God whom you ſerve, and whereby indeed, as you ſay, if you leave it not, you know you doe draw upon you the heavy and angry hand of him. For helpe whereof goe no further, but even to the very next verſe following in the ſame Chapter of Matthew, and marke it well. For well knew the Lord, that as they that feared God, and have not a gaping conſcience to ſwallow for gaine horrible things, are both more ſubject to poverty with the companions thereof, and alſo more occaſioned to mourne in reſpect of their owne caſes and other mens, as alſo in reſpect of many checks, taunts, and unkindneſſe, which they ſhall endure more than others, upon whom this flattering world fleereth and laugheth, and in whom a lulled conſcience offereth ſight of little evill in them, and therefore needed to bee armed againſt them, as I ſay, this hee knew, ſo likewiſe as well did hee foreſee, that theſe cauſes publike and private, of impatiency and diſtemperature in affections, ſhould ariſe unto his children, and therefore provided for it alſo.

For caſt your eyes about the world a little, and view the courſe of things, and are not the godly, harmeleſſe, and quiet men often in this world rejected, and wrung and pinched at for this thing and that, when more contentious natures are let alone, as ſhrews to deale withall? Hath not the true meaner often a ſhrewd turne done, before others that are worſe diſpoſed? Hath not the voyce of truth pronounced it of thoſe that bee his, that in the world they ſhall bee wronged, and hated, and perſecuted, and ſo forth? Therefore if for this alſo hee had not left us counſell, our hap had beene harder, and our fall ſhould have beene greater, by theſe occaſions. But like a wiſe teacher, and a good God, he hath done it in the next verſe there, and commendeth unto us the rule of our nature, and the victory over our affections, bee the provocations never ſo many to the contrary, ſetting a crowne of happineſſe upon the head of that glorious vertue, in theſe words; Bleſſed are the meeke, for they they ſhall inherit the earth. Now the meeke, ſaith a learned man, are they which are not eaſily provoked with injuries, which are not ſhort and teaſty upon every offence, but are ready rather to ſuffer any thing than to doe the things that the wicked doe, men and women (to conclude) that reſiſt not evill, but overcome evill with good. Or yet more fully, ſuch (as another ſaith) as are not of nature fierce, and deſirous ever of revenge, but milde, tractable, courteous, ſoft and gentle, eaſily forgiving a wrong, if it bee done unto them, hating chidings, contentions and ſtrife, ready to give place to every body, and choofing rather with a quiet minde to commit all to God, than with intemperate heate to purſue his owne right. Bleſſed are theſe men and women, ſaith the Lord, and happy ſhall they bee, the earth is theirs, and the commodities in it, and they ſhall inherit them. And why ſo may you either ſay or thinke? Surely, becauſe this is not fleſh and blood in them, but an heavenly alteration of crooked nature by Gods renewing Spirit. For fleſh and blood cannot brook wrongs, but a man and woman wrought in another mould by the working grace of God, can and daily doe. Now the Lord worketh this in none but in ſuch as ſhall never die (for this ſanctifying ſpirit is the pledge of election) and therefore bleſſed are the meeke.

O Frailty then, what a place is this then to helpe your infirmitie withall, if you will indeed conſider of it earneſtly? You cannot forgive, you cannot forget, you cannot bee ſtricken, but you muſt ſtrike againe, you cannot bee wronged by word or deed either abroad of others, or privately of your owne, but by and by you forget your ſelfe, your place, your calling, your God you ſerve, and a number other needfull things to bee regarded, and you are as hot as fire for a time. But indeed you muſt doe otherwiſe if you will live for ever, as you ſee in this little ſentence. For the Lord hath given it out, and charged his Miniſters to the end of the world with a bold ſpirit to proclaime it to his people, that bleſſed are the meek. Now they that doe as you do, are not meeke, and therefore you ſee the concluſion how ſharpe it is, they ſhall never bee bleſſed, and if not bleſſed, then neceſſarily wretched, woefull, and curſed. Therefore I ſay againe, I pray you let it be regarded, and thought upon very earneſtly. For truely me thinke it moveth my ſelfe very much. And though I ſee in the Scripture many other notable places ſounding forth the ſame, and in many reaſons convincing by forcible concluſion the neceſſity of it, and many examples of the tryed good that hath growne therby, yet as to others God giveth a greater conceit of one thing than another, ſo this to me I finde more piercing than the other, I muſt needs confeſſe. And yet becauſe every man is not my ſelfe, and you eſpecially Frailty are not Faith, though my daily companion in the world, leſt I ſhould miſſe of helping you, by miniſtring nothing but mine owne medicine to you, I pray you conſider alſo of the courſe of other Scripture touching this matter. And firſt you ſhall ſee no calling amongſt men whereunto the Lord by name hath not enjoyned this temperance of affections and ſweetneſſe of nature, which now I ſpeake of. If they bee Miniſters, then inſtruct, ſaith he, them that bee contrary minded with meekneſſe. If they be Magiſtrates, it is likewiſe enjoyned them. And meekneſſe eſpecially beautifieth them that are in authority, ſaith Chryſoſtome; If they be neither, whatſoever they be,

2 Tim. 2. 25. walke worthy of the vocation whereunto God hath called you, ſaith the Apoſtle, with all humbleneſſe of minde, and meekneſſe, and long-ſuffering, ſupporting one another through love. And David giveth a reaſon of it; For them that are meek ſhall he guide in judgment, and teach the humble his way.

Pſa. 25. 9. And is this a forceleſſe reaſon? That which beautifieth every calling, and every perſon, ſhall it not beautifie you, thinke you? And that which is forbidden to every one in ſo expreſſe plainneſſe, can you thinke the Lord will allow in your ſelfe? Surely he will not, and therefore know it and thinke of it, if you pleaſe the Lord you muſt be meeke.

Gal. 5. The reaſons I ſpeake of be theſe and ſuch others. Firſt, the Apoſtle in his Epiſtle to the Galathians, reckoning up the fruits of the Spirit, which never appeare in any truely, but in ſuch as ſhall be ſaved, reckoneth this as one amongſt them, to be meeke, and amongſt the fruits of the fleſh, that ſhall leade us unto death, he reckoneth the contrary, choler and heate, whereupon we our ſelves (as cleare as the Sunne) may ſee, that if the Lord vouchſafe us this change of nature from ſowre to ſweet, and from anger to meekneſſe, there is no more comfortable crie and happen in this earth upon our ſoules, that they are the Lords. And if he doe not, then as mightily miniſtreth it an argument againe of woe, alas, and endleſſe woe unto us.

Mat. 11. 29. Secondly, to be meeke is a true imitation of Chriſt, for, Learne of mee, ſaith hee, I am meeke and lowly in heart. But hee that treadeth the ſteps of this Lord and God, ſhall never die: and therefore bleſſed are the meeke. Contrariwiſe, to be haſtie, furious and intemperate, is to follow Cain, Eſau, and all reprobates, which who ſo followeth, ſhall never live, and therefore curſed is the contrary.

Thirdly, the Lord careth for us if we be meeke, and watcheth over our wrongs, ſeeing all the words and deeds, and very thoughts conceived againſt us, and the Lord will pay our debts if we leave it to him, and juſtle him not out of his Throne, ſitting downe our ſelves therein, as judges and revengers of our owne cauſes. Hee knoweth our up-riſing and down-lying, hee is about our bed and about our paths, and ſpyeth out all our goings, and ſeeth hee not when wee are wronged? He hath taken a reckoning of the very haires of our heads, he putteth our teares into his bottle, and are not our wrongs thinke we noted in his booke? O therfore how ſhould we our ſelves learne to be meeke, to forgive, and to referre our ſelves over to him, ſith we have ſuch a Judge? The wife, whileſt her husband liveth, quieteth her ſelfe from forraine toyles, and leaveth all incumbrances to him, for he careth for them: but if hee by death depart from her, then ſhe her ſelfe, becauſe ſhe hath loſt her ayd.

Now we, if we be indeed, as we thinke we are, the children of the Lord, we are the Spouſe of an Husband that never dyeth, but in his life is permanent, in power ſufficient, in care ſtill vigilant, and therefore how ſhould this conſideration kill our affections, mortifie our haſty hearts and hands, and alter us daily to an heavenly temperance, patience, and meekneſſe? The Lord is our Advocate to put up our ſute, the Lord is alſo Judge to give ſentence of our wrong, and Frailty, then how can any eſcape that hurteth us, if we would be meeke and leave it unto him? Me thinke, me thinke I could even dwell continually in this conſideration, it is ſo comfortable. What madneſſe ſhould move us to harbour our hurt, to hatch up our harme, and to keepe matters boyling and feſtring within us, forgiven, and forgotten, when we have ſuch a Judge? God ſtrengthen us, and give us victory of our ſelves. But why Frailty, ſtandeſt thou yet ſo mute? Beleeveſt thou not all this? If thou doſt yet hang in the bryars of thy unreformed paſſions, adde hereunto ſome further proofe of paſſed practice and experience, and let that, as mighty to perſwade, confirme and conforme thee to this vertue, if it be the Lords will.

The Iſraelites in Ægypt oppreſſed and harmed, could not with right countervaile might, but as patiently and meekly as God made them able, abid it, and cryed unto the Lord, and what followed? The Lord heard them, Moſes was ſent, they were delivered, and Pharaoh with all his Hoaſt drowned in the Sea. See with your owne eyes the reward of meekneſſe.

David oppreſſed by Saul his father in law, whom, at home and abroad hee truely ſerved and honoured, ſought no revenge, but even refuſed it when it lay before him, and with all meekeneſſe, mildneſſe and patience committed it to the Lord; and Saul had his puniſhment, David the Kingdome.

Iacob being threatned deſtruction by his brother, conceived not by and by the like towards him againe, but leaveth his Countrey and fathers houſe, putteth up the wrong, poſſeſſeth his ſpirit in patience and meekneſſe: and what enſued? The Lord was with him both day and night, the Angels of heaven are his ſervants, the Lord giveth him wives and wealth, comfort and ſtrength every where, and Eſau liveth to die for ever, as the fatted Oxe is prepared for the ſlaughter.

Ioſeph horribly ſlandered for his faithfull ſervice, bare his grievous croſſe meekly, and honour is his end, even great and rare honour. O hearts of ours then, where are they? What a God ſerve we, whoſe mercy upon meekneſſe hath thus ſhewed it ſelfe, beſide in numbers mo? Shall it not move us? Shall it not pierce us? Nay ſhall it not change us? God forbid we ſhould be ſenſleſſe, and therfore you ſee Frailty what muſt be done, and what ſoveraigne help the Lord layeth downe for your infirmity, be your occaſions publike or private, at home or abroad, with many or few, affections certainly muſt bee bridled, and even fought withall till they yeeld and become more quiet: otherwiſe wee runne upon our ruine both in heaven and earth. For the one thus as you ſee is proved, and truly the other is as true. For what government are they worthy of, that will not govern, as they poſſibly can themſelves well? What truth can they know, that cannot abide to heare indifferently both parties? No, every man ſhall frame himſelfe to their humours till his turne bee ſerved, and truth ſhall never dare to appeare before them. What danger can be prevented, or what guilefull gueſt can bee diſcovered, when heate doth thunder out threats, ere the time ſerve to take knowledge of the matter? The enemy is armed, the friend is diſcouraged, and judge your ſelfe then how ſtrength is impaired. What ſervant, if God rule not in him mightily, will truly ſerve, where comfortable countenance either giveth not hope of convenient reward, or at leaſt preſently accepteth what is done in favour? What one that hath any gifts, friends, or ability, will ever abide with a loving and true heart, where reproaches and diſcomforts are his daily death? No, no, it will never bee, nor it cannot be. VVell may a worldly minde, in regard of paſſed time and charge, make men rubbe out, and carry coales till they can doe better, or may get a cheate, but the heart being alienated, and the true faithfull kinde affection that is above gold, worne away with often rebukes, which being not digeſted, ſend up at times as tokens of their remaining a bitter taſte, all is but hollow, all is but in regard of themſelves, and if time ſhould ſerve to need them, God knowes, how their ſnubbed hearts would call their ſnubs to remembrance, whereas meekneſſe, gentleneſſe, comfort and countenance maketh a ſervant true in his dealings, painfull, willing, conſtant in his place, and ready even to die in the ſervice of them whoſe loving uſage hath pierced his ſoule with a permanent affection, if hee bee of any good nature, and if hee bee not, the ſame vertue of meekneſſe, watcheth, looketh, heareth, and conſidereth all things wiſely, not bewraying himſelfe till hee have found indeed a hollow ſervant, and then weedeth out ſo ill a member.

That we hurt our ſelves alſo in earth by heat of affections.

member. Therefore I ſay againe, whatſoever your occaſions bee of order in your affections, be they at home or abroad, truly Frailty, fight with your ſelfe, and never ſuffer your infirmity to prevaile. For God requires it; and even worldly wiſedome requires it, and the very hardeſt things are made eaſie by ſome uſe: now you have a God to helpe you beſides uſe, who with his bleſſed mouth hath promiſed helpe, and with his mighty Spirit ſhall aſſiſt you, if you pray.

FRAILTIE.

Yea, but the courſe of the world ſerveth not for ſuch counſell. For I tell you now a dayes, who ſuffereth a little ſhall ſuffer more, and who putteth up one wrong, ſhall put up twenty. Men cannot live now, and either get or keep, if they be ſo gentle as you would have them.

FAITH.

O Frailty, how are you deceived? And how ſtill ſavour all your ſpeeches of your Nature? I pray you tell me, if God would ſay to you bee meeke, and will confirme thee in this world, both with ſufficient maintenance and continuance in the ſame, be the practices never ſo peeviſh againſt thee, would you not beleeve him?

FRAILTIE.

Yes, for I know he is able to doe it, if he ſay he will doe it, and I am not yet ſo weake to doubt his power.

FAITH.

Very well, and I pray you what followeth in this verſe, of Chriſt which now we handle? Is it not a flat promiſe, that the meek ſhall inherit the earth? If you will then ſtand to your ſpeech, and beleeve the Lord upon his word, doe it now then and ever hereafter, for here you ſee his promiſe. The whole world may rage againſt us, and yet ſhall we inherit the earth in deſpite of them all, if we will be meeke.

That is, we ſhall both get and keepe that portion which the Lord thinketh meet for us, will they nill they that doe trouble us: neither ever ſhall the force of foe further prevaile againſt us than ſhall bee good one way or other for us. Bleſſed Father of heaven, what a promiſe is this, and how contrary to mans reaſon and ſenſe: yet repeated over and over in the Scripture for further aſſurance, as you may ſee, if you reade but that one Pſalme the 37. confirmed to us by Paul, who ſaith he had nothing, and yet poſſeſſed all things, and by the experience of all the godly that ever was. Therefore even a thouſand times marke it Frailty, and lay it up. The world pittieth theſe meeke ones, and calleth them Gods fooles; but the Lord bleſſeth them, and his bleſſing maketh wiſe. The world judgeth meekneſſe the very high way to beggery, and yet you heare the Lord even flatly ſay, they ſhall inherit the land that have the ſame, were all the world againſt them. Therefore to goe no further, conclude now with your heart Frailty, to uſe this remedy of the Lords, laid downe to bridle fraile affections and truſt his Word. Certaine now you ſee it is, for the Lord hath ſaid it, Bleſſed are the meeke. And even by that hold that I for my part have taken of this promiſe, I pronounce unto you againe, that the very day and houre of your birth you may bleſſe, if the Lord give you victory over your affections, and make you meek: and ſo I leave you to his mercy.

The fourth temptation, ariſing of want of Iuſtice in our cauſes, &c.

FRAILTIE.

I Cannot deny, but your perſwaſions are upon true warrant, and they ought greatly to move, yet me thinke you doe not fully marke my caſe. For if I ſought any thing either at home in my houſe of my family, or abroad in the world of others, which were not both meet for a Chriſtian to demand, and in truth mine own flat right, I could ſee mine anger to be faulty, and patiently learne to put up the matter, I truſt in time. But I tell you Faith, I doe not ſo: I ſeeke nothing, but, as I have ſaid, mine owne due, what I ought to have, and what I truly pay for: and therfore I tell you in this caſe my choller hath more warrant than you well marke. For it would touch my body to loſe his right. And a man were better out of this world, than to be robbed thus of Iuſtice and lawfull favour, as I am. It makes me weary of my life: and I tell you I feele it ſtirre within me, even to ſtrike hands with the wicked, and to doe as men may like me, that I may be quiet.

FAITH.

Softly Frailty, ſoftly, your tongue tumbleth too faſt, and your nature I tell you plaine, breaketh out too much. Shall I loſe my labour with you, and prevaile nothing with either ſpeech or good will? Are you not aſhamed with this affirmation, that if you ſought any thing unlawfull, you could beare in meekneſſe the deniall? Why no thankes to you, this could a Turke or Heathen doe, and almoſt the devill: common reaſon would make them. But I tell you, except your meekneſſe exceed this, you ſhall never be ſaved. For the Scripture is plaine, there is no praiſe to be patient, when a man deſerves of a man his paine, but if when we doe well, we ſuffer wrong, and yet be meek and patient, this is acceptable to God, ſaith the Apoſtle. And even in your very caſe of ſutes and demands, that are but right, if juſtice bee not had, yet muſt this vertue of meekneſſe remain in us, as may evidently appeare in the very next verſe of Matthew. For there the Lord knowing the nature of fraile fleſh, how it would ſtartle and ſtorme at this matter, and be tempted by it to forſake his truth, as it were of purpoſe hitteth your objection on the mouth with his hand, and biddeth it ſtand backe, as not worthy to appeare and bee heard. For Bleſſed (ſaith he) are they that hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſſe, for they ſhall be ſatisfied. That is, bleſſed are they that notwithſtanding they ſo moderate their deſires, as never they ſeek or wiſh but what is juſt and right, and their owne due debt, yet as hungry and thirſty live in patience and cannot be ſatisfied with receipt of Juſtice for their owne. Bleſſed I ſay are theſe, and they ſhall be ſatisfied. Where you ſee even with both your eyes, except you will wink, that even in our owne right we muſt want right ſometimes in this world, and yet muſt bee meeke, and godly, and faithfull ſtill. And in the end we ſhall be ſatisfied, either of man or God, or both, as ſurely as we live. Therefore Frailty, if it be poſſible ceaſe to be Frailty, and governe affections by theſe ſweet promiſes of eternall truth. Chap. 5.

No want of juſtice, no wrongfull oppreſſion, no croſſe and unconſcionable dealing of men, muſt make us fall out with our God, or ſtrike hands with the wicked. God forbid. Shall wee ſerve God no longer than he will rule his wiſdome by our wiſdome, and ſerve our deſires fitly? But words be but words, and yet I tell you theſe words are true reaſon. Notwithſtanding, conſider you for your confirmation, what godly men in the Scriptures have ever done: and if God will have mercy upon you, reforme your nature to their allowed courſe. I pray you, if a man ſerve at the Altar, is it not reaſon that he live of the Altar, that is, if a man ſpend himſelfe, his body, his minde, his goods to inſtruct people in the way of ſalvation, and require of them againe, meate, drinke, and clothing for his paines, doth he require a thing unreaſonable, or doth he demand any more than is his due right? Yet did Paul the deare ſervant of the Lord hunger and thirſt after this righteouſneſſe, and had it not. For unto this houre, ſaith he of himſelfe, we both hunger and thirſt, and are naked, and are buffetted, and have no certaine dwelling place, &c. Yet was he meek, patient, and his affections orderly for all this, and yet he had not his right as you ſee. 1 Cor. 4. 11. 2 Cor. 11.

What did David againe deſire at Sauls hand, but that ſince he had vouchſafed to make him his ſonne in law, he would likewiſe uſe him ſo, or at leaſt as a true ſubject and ſervant, with ſafety of life till he deſerved worſe? And was not this right and his very due? Yet pleaſed it God, David ſhould hunger and thirſt for this righteouſneſſe, and not have it. And yet you ſee I ſay againe it was his right. What did Ioſeph hunger and thirſt for, but to bee reputed honeſt, when he was honeſt, and not ſtained with the crime which his ſoule abhorred? Yet did he want it. What did all the Prophets and Martyrs deſire, but Gods glory to be increaſed, and their owne lives ſaved when they deſerved no death? Yet did they want it. Nay what did even Chriſt himſelfe hunger and thirſt for, whileſt he here lived, but the riſing up of Gods kingdome in the hearts of men, and the ſalvation of their ſoules? Yet even this right and due to him, and this great and endleſſe good to men themſelves, could he not obtaine, but hungring and thirſting after it, was deſpiſed and ſcorned, and in the end killed. Yet were all theſe meeke and gentle, and quiet in their affections, notwithſtanding all this, and never fretted themſelves at the crooked courſe of a curſed world, but ſtayed themſelves, and at the Lords hands they were all ſatisfied in the end, according to this promiſe. Ye have heard that it hath been ſaid, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, but I ſay unto you reſiſt not evill: but whoſoever ſhall ſmite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other alſo. Yea even yet further, they thus wronged in the world ſpake of meekneſſe, and commended it both to themſelves and others. For, Learn of me (ſaith our Saviour Chriſt) that I am meek and lowly in heart. And them that be meeke (ſaith David) ſhall the Lord guide in judgement, and ſuch as be gentle, them ſhall he teach his way. Wherefore I conclude, if it pleaſed the Lord thus to deale ever with his children, and even with his owne deare Sonne, yet ſatisfying them in the end, and hath in mercy made a faithfull promiſe to deale no worſe with us in the end, if we will be content: truly then no want of Juſtice, even in our moſt righteous ſutes and demaunds, ſhould make us intemperate, but rather drive us to this promiſe, Mat. 13. 38.

and in it we to be content with all meeke mildneſſe, both of heart, tongue and countenance, till the Lord ſee his time to ſatisfie us. And I pray you Frailty conſider of it. You ſee it with your eyes, your excuſe is naught, be your right never ſo good, and your wrong never ſo great. But we cannot doe what we ſhould doe ever, and eſpecially in theſe hard conflicts. Yet as neare as we can, let us be ruled, and draw to this heavenly vertue daily more and more of meekneſſe and patience, if we will not, ſurely as we live, when the Lord hath tryed us a while with mercy, ſeeking our good and cannot bow us, he will at laſt ſcourge us in anger, and fiercely breake us. If the Judge ſhould ſay it, or any mortall man, be content and I will ſatisfie you, we would be quiet, and ſhall the God of heaven and earth ſo ſaying not be heard, truſted, and regarded? The Lord ſhew his worke upon us: for otherwiſe, if there bee a Hell, or he bee a God, this intollerable contempt of ſo ſweet a promiſe, and ſo ſure a bleſſing will have a ſcorching reward at the laſt. I can ſay no more Frailty, but bid you looke upon his owne words, he ſaith, you are bleſſed when you are oppreſſed for want of right, if you will bee content, and you ſhall of his owne ſelfe be truly and fully ſatisfied, if you will mildly tary for it. Now if you will call him liar to his face, and ſay you are miſerable becauſe you are ſo dealt withall, or not happy, neither ſhall it be better with you unleſſe you will leave his Lawes, and joyne fellowſhip with the wicked, you may worke your owne woe, and who can help it? But I hope better of you, and I wiſh better to you, which you ſhall never miſſe if you will bee meeke. And ſo let the Lord worke with you, you ſee his word, and you know my minde.

The fifth temptation againſt mercifulneſſe by reaſon of unthankfulneſſe.

FRAILTIE.

SInce then you are ſo plaine and comfortable, I will yet further bewray my ſecret aſſaults unto you, if I ſhall not be troubleſome, and crave your ſtrength as in theſe, hoping when the remedy appointed of God is uſed, it will prevaile with me. I doe then over and beſide all theſe, finde many other infirmities and even in any thing that God hath commanded, ſomething or other faſt creepeth upon mee to ſlack me from that duty, which I know to be enjoyned me. As firſt, in dealing with ſuch as have need of my help as a good Chriſtian ſhould, truly you will not beleeve how the ingratitude of the world quencheth my heart, and ſtayeth my hand. For I ſee the courſe of men, and the naughtineſſe of natures in theſe evill dayes. Let a man lend his poore neighbour ſomething to help him withall, as God commandeth, or let him even give clearely for ever to him, yet ſhall he never a whit be better loved of a number for it: but if he lend, be driven to ſue for his owne: and if he give have rather unkindneſs, and a taunting ſcornfull ſpeech, than any other commendable & thankefull conſideration for his good will. Whereby I am often (I confeſſe my corruption) driven even to the point of this worldly and wicked concluſion with my ſelfe, Let them ſink or ſwim for me, I will ſeek to live my ſelf out of all mens danger, and I will neither borrow nor lend, give nor take, make nor meddle. Let other mens wants be other mens woes, and God help them, there are many wayes to make a man poore, though his hand bee hard enough. Now this I know is ungodly, and I was not born to do thus, yet Frailty I am, and by reaſon of the monſtrous ingratitude that the world aboundeth with, perforce I confeſſe it, I am often driven towards this Rock. Again, I ſee every man even from the head to the foot, ſo given to halting, cogging, gloſing, lying, ſoothing, ſmoothing, flattering, and diſſembling, and ſo thereby to win favour, to winne wealth, to win friends & countenance in their dealings, that me think I cannot ſtand any longer in the innocency of a good conſcience, but I muſt do as they do, that I may get what they get Yet know I this to be deviliſh, but I am Frailty by name, and I feare me by nature I ſhall be no leſſe. Thirdly, when any unquietneſſe grows in town and country, or any jarring unkindneſſe, I ſee ſuch hazard in dealing betwixt them, ſuch ſubtilties and fetches to make a man a party in that which his ſoul hated, and ſo to trouble him: and let the beſt be ſuppoſed, I ſee uſually ſo ſmall thank gotten of either party, but even the contrary, that I aſſure you, I ſit ſtill, and let them bate the fire that made the fire, and themſelves waſte one another, and a thouſand moe for me, if they will. Notwithſtanding, my conſcience accuſeth me ſecretly, that this is not well done of me. And thus endangered without, and accuſed within, me think my caſe is hard and grievous. But I will not weary you with any moe of mine infirmities. For I even ſhame to ſhew theſe, but that you are Faith, a friend where you take, ſtrong and comfortable, and gave me liberty to be thus bold with you before.

FAITH.

FAITH.

Indeed Frailty you are, when theſe things thus flow upon you, yet Frailty may you ceaſe to be, by the grace of God, if you will diligently weigh what ſtrength in the Scriptures is miniſtred againſt them. For to begin with the firſt, and letting ſtore of other Scriptures paſſe, to keep me ſtill in this fifth of Matthew, evidently it may there appeare, that the Lord knew it would aſſault his children, and therefore uttered this ſentence, no doubt of purpoſe to confirme them ſtill, that Bleſſed are the mercifull, for they ſhall obtain mercy. Wherein, if it were well marked, there is comfort hidden, even ſufficient againſt this vile ſuggeſtion. For ſhall the Lord of heaven ſet a bleſſing upon the head of a thing, and wee not bee moved with it? Nay, ſhall it not more move us, than all the ſpeeches or conceits in the world to the contrary tending? What though a dull heart ſay, Let all men periſh, ſo I may be ſafe, or what though a thouſand policies prick to a private regard, above meaſure of private well-being, doe we not heare with our eares, and ſee with our eyes, the ſpeech of truth, which ſhall ſtand when heaven and earth ſhall fall, Bleſſed is the mercifull? Either then make God falſe, or this bleſſing aſſured to the vertue ever. And if it be aſſured, then never regard the conceits of a witleſſe world, but conſider the vertue in it ſelfe, and what it ſhall pull upon you. Mat.5.

Then to the imagination of want that may grow by this grace, and to the ſting that ariſeth upon their ingratitude, whom we have been mercifull unto, oppoſe the promiſe that followeth in the place: For they ſhall obtaine mercy. Doth a man obtaine mercy when he is in this world made worſe, and in the world to come no better? No, you know he doth not, and therefore it muſt needs follow that this promiſed mercy implyeth a greater good than ever can come harm by a liberall and mercifull hand in order, either in this world, or in the other, or in both. And it hath confirmation alſo of Scriptures beſide. For I have been yong (ſaith the Prophet David) and now am old, yet ſaw I never the righteous forſaken, nor his ſeed begging their bread. But the righteous is ever mercifull and lendeth, and his ſeed is bleſſed. And again in another Pſalme, A good man is mercifull and lendeth, and his ſeed is bleſſed. And againe in another Pſalme, A good man is mercifull and lendeth, and he ſhall never be moved, but had in everlaſting remembrance. Whereby it is plaine and plaine enough, that let the world and her chickens be as churliſh as they may be, yet mercy is gainfull by the promiſe of the Lord unto the mercifull. And more ſhould wee regard, what our God liketh, loveth, and bleſſeth, than what with worldly wretches getteth reward. Yet even here alſo it hath his praiſe, as you may ſee by proofe in Iob, and others many, though not peradventure ever in all that are moſt bound unto it. Wherefore even a thouſand times we ſhould contemne this rude nature of unreformed worldlings, and let them be as unkinde, as ungratefull, and as perverſe as their corruption can make them, if the Lord ſoften our hearts, and give us this vertue of mercy, our reward is certaine, the bill of our bleſſedneſſe is ſigned, and we, as we could ever deſire, aſſured to be gainers. Sink it then Frailty in your heart, if I may obtaine any thing of you, and heare not theſe things without any profit. Ponder the good promiſed in your minde, and ponder the truth of him that promiſeth it, God of heaven and earth. If the good countervaile your hurt, as a thouſand times it doth, your temptation is ſtrengthened, and if he never deceived, that hath given his word for payment of you, it is more ſtrengthned, but both of theſe are true, and therfore God give you uſe of them, the bleſſing of mercifulneſſe to all that truly need your helpe, is aſſured. This were enough then if you be not utterly fallen out with me, and will credit nothing that Faith telleth you, to ſtay your ſteps in this godly duty of mercy, yet regarding your nature rather than the need of the thing, adde unto all this but ſome little view in your minde of the vertue it ſelf in it ſelf, and it may be you ſhall finde ſtrength increaſed by it. Is it not in his nature (think you) an aſſured vertue, that God maketh ever any promiſe of reward unto? Or can it make miſerable that the Lord ſaith, maketh bleſſed? Or is it not cauſe enough to continue you ever in the practice of it, that the Lord ſo often, ſo earneſtly, and ſo generally to all eſtates commandeth it? Surely it is, and therefore mercy in it nature, is a moſt notable vertue. It is to be honoured that maketh men in whom it is, ſo renowned, as that all ages ſpeak and write of their names and natures of it? But this vertue of mercy hath been ſuch to many, and therfore in all truth, a notable vertue. For proofe of my aſſertion, I let paſſe the multitude of the faithfull whom either Scriptures or ſtories, or preſent practice, as yet among us honourably ſpeak and think of. And I remember you only of his name, whoſe nature in this action (being an Heathen) hath often well liked me, Alexander the great. Whom when one Perillus humbly beſought to help him with ſome mony, towards the beſtowing of his daughter in mariage, by & by he commanded fifty talents to be given unto him: & when the man refuſed ſo great a gift, ſaying that ten talents would ſuffice, being told of it, he alſo anſwered, that it behooved a good nature, not only to conſider what an honeſt friend doth ask, but what his ability is well to ſpare & give. Thinking belike (which in truth is often ſo indeed) that either modeſty, or feare, or ſome one regard or other, may make an honeſt nature, not ask ſo much as indeed he ſtandeth in need of many a time, and therefore good reaſon a faithfull friend ſhould have reſpect to ſuch an one about his asking ever. Was not this a ſweet nature then, and a notable vertue in this man? Or can any man reade this of him, and not love and like him for it? Great therefore is the praiſe of mercy and tender kindneſſe ever. By mercy we reſemble God, & prove our ſelves his children: For our heavenly Father is mercifull. By mercy we become inſtruments, and as it were Almners unto the Lord, to deliver his gracious benefits to our brethren, and even very equity requireth it at our hands, that if wee finde mercy in all our needs with God, wee ſhould not deny it in their wants unto our brethren. For ſo ſaith the Lord to that evill ſervant in the Goſpell, that he ſhould have forgiven, becauſe he was forgiven himſelfe, and ſhewed kindneſſe to his fellow, ſith he had found it with the Lord himſelfe.

Laſt of all, that fearefull threat of mercy ever to be denyed to us, if we doe deny it our ſelves to others, ſhould ſtrengthen and ſtay us in this vertue for evermore. Therefore looke not I ſay againe upon mens acceptance of our doings, but looke upon the vertue it ſelfe how it adorneth a man, how it commendeth a man, and how it maketh his fame to flye both farre and neere in every place. And look upon the ſure reward that is promiſed to it by the Lord. If you be mercifull, you ſhall be bleſſed, if you be mercifull, you ſhall have mercy, if you bee mercifull, you ſhall be renowned, you ſhall aſſure your ſoule that you are the Lords, becauſe you reſemble his nature: and if you be not, both God and man ſhall curſe you: Therefore be mercifull. This may encourage us certainly Frailty, if the Lord bee not quite departed from us. But as it is needfull that this vertue ſhould be in us, ſo is it as needfull that it be rightly in us, for otherwiſe we deceive our ſelves, and we ſhall miſſe the reward in the end. And therefore, as I have endeavoured to ſtir you up unto it, ſo it ſhall not be unprofitable peradventure altogether if I alſo direct you a little in it. Some then have thought this vertue to have been delivered in the verſe before, which we have heard of under the name of meekneſſe, but indeed they differ much. For meekneſſe then is ſhewed, when we our ſelves are wronged, and yet revenge not, but put it up, and leave it to the Lord. And mercy when we our ſelves, being no way hurt, yet are touched and moved with other mens wants, and even ſuffering with them becauſe they ſuffer, endevour our ſelves to our ability to releeve and help them. So that this vertue of mercy as you ſee, ſtandeth of two parts, to wit, of a tender feeling, and compaſſion within us, and of an outward loving help with our ability whatſoever it is without us. The miſery of man is of two ſorts, and therefore alſo this mercifull pitty and help of as many. For either a man wanteth what is needfull for his ſoule, or what is convenient for his body. And both of theſe doth a mercifull Chriſtian tender and pitty, and help as he can.

Luke 10.

Of the former we have a proofe in the example of our Saviour Chriſt, whoſe bowels even yerned and heart aked to ſee the ſpirituall miſery and want of that great multitude that then he ſaw being deſtitute of knowledge, and altogether as wandring ſheep without a ſhepheard. Of the ſecond we have a proof alſo in the Samaritan, whoſe mercifull nature ſhewed it ſelf toward bodily wants, and outward griefes of him that theeves had ſo ill handled. And in both theſe you ſee the parts I ſpeake of, namely, inward compaſſion and outward helpe. Without which never can this vertue ſtand, nor we be liked either of God or man. For if we pitty and yet help not, that fearefull ſpeech of Iohn lighteth on us. How dwelleth the love of God in us, and we ſhall aſſuredly heare it in the day of judgement. When I was naked ye clothed me not, when I was hungry ye fed me not, and ſo forth. And if we help a man in his need, and yet doe it not upon any tender compaſſion toward him, but upon a jollity and pride in our ſelves, and upon an imagination of the merit for the work ſake, or ſuch like, it is lothſome againe, all that ever we doe, to the Lord, and we loſe our reward. If you doubt of this, you may ſee it proved in the Phariſies. whoſe almes abounded and made a glorious ſhew. But becauſe they let the weightier matters paſſe, as judgement, and mercy, and fidelity, their outward deeds had never reward. Therefore even a thouſand times marke it, how want of right diſpoſition in the heart, maketh outward dealing of gifts, bee it never ſo magnificall, but Phariſaicall and wicked: againſt that blockiſh aſſertion of ſome, that the deed done muſt needs bee rewarded. This tender feeling doth the Apoſtle both profeſſe in himſelfe, and require in others. In himſelfe, when he asketh, who is weake and he is not weake, who is offended and he burneth not? In others, when hee ſaith, weep with them that weep, and rebuketh the Corinthians, for that they ſeeing ſo great a fall of their brother, were puffed up, and did not rather ſorow. So well thus you ſee what manner of mercy muſt be in you, if it be allowed of the Lord. Now how this good vertue is begotten in us let us alſo conſider, and beſide divers others that might bee named, you ſhall ſee the workers of it eſpecially and above other meanes to be experience and ſight. For the firſt, we ſee it in the wiſdome of the Lord our God moſt plainly, who therefore gave his owne Sonne a ſenſe of our woes, that experience might make him a more mercifull, ready and carefull regarder of ſuites. It behooved him (ſaith the Apoſtle) in all thing to be made like to his brethren, that he might be a mercifull and faithfull high Prieſt. And againe, We have not an high Prieſt that cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but we have one that was in all things tẽpted in like ſort, yet without ſin: concluding thereupon preſently; Let us therefore goe boldly to the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy and grace to help in time of need, Why ſo ? Aſſuredly becauſe wee can never feele that want which he knoweth not, and knowing, experience worketh effectually a ready regard and help. Whereupon by the way, we may ground a great comfort againſt any croſſe if we mark it. For thus may we think, if mercifulneſſe make us bleſſed, and experience make us mercifull, then whenſoever the Lord giveth us any taſte of woe, hee doth but ſchoole us unto happineſſe. But I paſſe it over, and now let us conſider, what a very monſter and ugly beaſt in nature he is, who having himſelfe drunk of the beggers diſh, and taſted the ſmart of needy want, yet never the more is moved in tender kindneſſe to others, when God hath made him able to help them, but as braſſe or yron turneth both hand and heart away, when pittifull ſuites are made unto him for ſome comfort. And then view we in like maner the force of ſight in ſuch examples as we have commended to us in the Scriptures.

Sight a worke of mercifulneſs

When Pharaohs daughter ſaw little Moſes in the basket, ſhe pittied it: when Jeſus ſaw the multitude, hee had compaſſion on them, and healed all their ſick: when hee ſaw their want of teachers, he pittied them: when he ſaw the woman weep whoſe ſon was dead, he pittied her: when the Samaritan ſaw the wounded man, he pittied him: when the Lord ſaw his debter fall downe, he forgave him all: and he that ſeeth his brother want, and turneth his face away, O how is the love of God in him ? with a number ſuch. So that ſight I ſay above either hearing or many other meanes, is a vehement worker of this vertue in us, if wee be the Lords: and of this vertue not in part, but in whole, for if you mark the examples againe, you ſhall neither ſee pitty without help, nor help without intire compaſſion in them, but both together, the one following ever after and upon the other: which if it bee ſo, then ſhould wee take a view of our ſelves occaſioned by this Doctrine, and diligently weigh what either ſight of other mens woes, or hearing, or any other meanes worketh in us, and if we finde a flinty heart within us, whatſoever we ſee or heare, judge then betimes what will be our caſe at one time or another, when bleſſed ſhall be the mercifull. Surely we ſhall finde what the Lord hath ſpoken, that judgement without mercy ſhall be unto us, becauſe we have ſhewed no mercy. And if wee finde the contrary, as greatly may it joy us againe on the other ſide.

But I forget my ſelfe in following this diſcourſe too farre, and therefore here will I cut it off, once again deſiring you, neither in this vertue, nor others, ever ſo much to regard what the world doth think, as what the God of heaven that made the world, doth judge. For if you do, you ſhall never whileſt you live, keep a ſtraight courſe in any good. The Lord ſaith, the mercifull man ſhall be bleſſed, therefore ſhame unto the face that once avoucheth it, that mercy maketh miſerable. The Lord accepteth it, let the world neglect it: the Lord rewardeth it, let a ſenſeleſſe worldling be never ſo ungratefull, and what the Lord rewardeth, it can never make a man worſe if he uſe it, therefore be mercifull. What ſhould I ſay ? Certainly Frailty, till God become falſe, till his bleſſings become curſings, his promiſes unprofitable, and his rewards not worth having, the feeling heart, and the helping hand, head, tongue, or any member, gift, or ability in us, can never impoveriſh us beyond our good, as you plainly ſee: and therefore your temptation is anſwered, and your weakneſſe ſtrengthened, if the Lord grant you feeling and uſe of his word: which I truſt he will, and beſeech him that he may.

Strength againſt diſſimulation, the ſixth Temptation.

YOur next Temptation ariſeth by diſſimulation, and a mighty motion you finde to do as the world doth. But Frailty, would you leave to thinke gaine to be godlineſſe, and beginne to thinke only godlineſſe to be gaine, as the Apoſtle teacheth, and a little to weigh with your ſelfe, what in every age every honeſt man and woman hath thought of this beaſtly vice, were it never ſo generall, ſurely you would finde ſtrength againſt it in your ſelfe, and a marvellous hatred kindled in your heart of it I beleeve verily. For there is nothing that pulleth any body into this Metamorphoſis of nature, but a careleſſe contempt of all opinions of us, ſo we may flouriſh and get our deſire of this curſed world. Which I muſt ſay again, is a beaſtly vice in man or woman, becauſe it ſo maketh them that uſe it, this being ever the property of a man, to prefer honeſty before all utility. Now if you aske what hath been thought, I am able to ſhew you even under one ſight both God and man againſt it, and man, not only Chriſtian, but heathen, ſuch as beſide the light of nature had no direction by the Lord. For, Woe unto them (ſaith the Lord) that ſeek deep to hide their counſels from me: that is, they cary more ſhew than truth, as they do which are outwardly religious, and inwardly moſt prophane contemners of the ſame. Help Lord, ſaith the Prophet David, for it is high time, there is not one godly man left, but the faithfull are miniſhed from the children of men: they talke of vanity every man with his neighbour, they doe but flatter with their lips, and diſſemble with their double heart. And then in the deteſtation of ſo vile a thing, the ſpirit of the Prophet breaketh out into a curſe, as the Lord roote out, ſaith hee, ſuch deceitfull lips, Which certainly is a ſpeech that ſhould pierce us deepe, when wee conſider and thinke of it.

Scripture againſt it.

Pſal. 12.

1 Pet.2.1. The Apoſtle Peter alſo cryeth unto all that feare God, Lay aſide all malicious neſſe, and all guile, and all diſſimulation, envy, and all evill ſpeaking, oppoſing theſe to the ſincere milke of the word of God which all men ought to defire, that they may grow thereby: as things that cannot agree and dwell together in any man. And if we marke examples, was it not I pray you, a horrible thing for Simeon and Levi to pretend ſuch friendſhip to the Sichemites, and to harbour ſecretly ſo bloody conceits? Did not the ſoule of their godly Father Iacob deteſt both ſuch men and ſuch dealings? Was it not vile and unſeeming either for a King, or an honeſt man, to diſſemble
1 Sam.18.21. ſuch liking of David, as that he would give him his daughter to wife, and yet meane nothing thereby in truth but to ſnare him, and to worke his certain overthrow by it? Such love come to them that long for it, and ſuch fathers in law God keepe us ever from, may wee thinke and ſay, if we marke it.

Was it not a deteſtable nature in Cain, under a brothers face to diſſemble a murdering heart and minde? Can you abide but even to thinke of that curſed Courtier Ioabs ſpeech: Art thou
1 Sam.20.16. in health my brother Amaſa, and leaning forward to kiſſe him, ſecretly to ſtab him with his dagger that he dyed preſently? Theſe are the effects of this cruell vice, and theſe are the fruits of ſuch unnaturall men as have caried faces under a hood more than they would ſhew, which aſſuredly the Lord hath cauſed to be written, to confirme our hearts in an unfained lothing of it, ſeeme it never ſuch wiſdome in a wicked world, and bring it never ſuch gaine to the uſers of it. Now on the contrary ſide conſider againe what a laſting praiſe is given to the contrary, namely, to ſincere and faithfull, true and plaine honeſt dealing with all men. So ſhall it ſtill appeare unto you clearer, that deteſtable in the eyes of God, is a gloſing tongue, with an hollow, halting Pſal.34. and diſſembling heart, What man is he, ſaith the Prophet David, that liſteth to live and would faine ſee good dayes, let him keep his tongue from evill, and his lips that they ſpeak no guile. As if he ſhould ſay, halters will be halted withall, one way or other, let them doe what they can, and ſo evill a nature ſhall find either with God or man, or with both at laſt a deſerved recompence, and therPſal.32. fore be ſimple. Againe in another place, Bleſſed is the man in whoſe ſpirit there is no guile. And againe, Lord who ſhall dwell in thy tabernacle, or who ſhall reſt upon thy holy hill. Even the man, ſaith the Lord, that amongſt other vertues hath this by name, to ſpeake the truth, when hee ſpeaketh from his heart. And what a ſpeech is that of the Apoſtle Paul to the Corinthians,
2 Cor.1.12. Pſal.15. Our rejoycing is this, the teſtimony of our conſcience, that in ſimplicity and godly purenеſſe, and not in fleſhly wiſdome, we have had our converſation in the world. His conſcience bore him witneſſe of plaine dealing ever, and it joyed him. Ours cry within us, our diſſembling is monſtrous, and ſhall it never thinke we bring ſorow to us? Reade it at your leiſure the firſt of Syrach, from the 33. Verſe to the end. Never forget alſo the commendation that Chriſt giveth to Nathaniel. But what ſhould I heap up many moe teſtimonies? May I not ſtill referre you to the fifth of Matthew, and you there ſee even in this temptation alſo, as one that ſhould aſſault the godly, provided for in theſe words, Bleſſed are the pure in heart, for they ſhall ſee God.

Conſider then of it well Frailty, and be aſſured where there is a bleſſing ſet upon the head of the vertue, there is alſo a curſe upon the head of the vice ever. If they be bleſſed of the Lord, that reſerve in themſelves, notwithſtanding all temptations to the contrary, an honeſt, faithfull, ſimple, true dealing and meaning heart toward all men, and in whoſe ſpirits there is no guile, then as you live, you may aſſure your ſoule the contrary are curſed before the face of him that is truth it ſelfe and never any thing but truth. And whatſoever they gaine and get in the world, they gaine and get the devill and all with it, unleſſe the Lord turne their hearts. But let this ſuffice a while touching God and his word, how they doe allow this vice whereunto you feele your ſelfe ſo greatly tempted. And a little alſo weigh his childrens judgement of it, the Fathers againſt it. ancient, grave, and godly Fathers of his Church. Saint Chryſoſtome writing upon the ſeventh of Matthew, and conſidering this ſly nature of men and women, ſo faithfull in ſhew, and ſo faithleſſe in proofe, breaketh out into this deteſtation of it: Fie, fie, ſaith he, what a curſe is this? If it be a ſhame to ſeeme to be falſe and naught, is it not more ſhame to be ſo indeed? Therefore either be as thou ſeemeſt, or ſeeme as thou art ever. Whereupon you plainly ſee, the true loathing, that this godly Father lodged of this vice in his heart. Saint Auguſtine ſpeaking upon the words of Chriſt to Nathaniel, concludeth this glorious gloſſe that many make, and this deepe diſſembling that many uſe, to bee a ſpeciall of the generall head fraud and deceit, the very naming whereof we all abhorre. And upon theſe words againe of the Pſalme: Keepe thy tongue from evill, and thy lips that they ſpeake no guile. Then ſaith he, is the trecherous fraud, Cum aliud in pectore clauſum habetur, aliud promittitur aut verbo aut actione: When one thing is hidden in heart, and another thing promiſed either by word or action. Now of the contrary vertue openly and expreſly he affirmeth that the ſimple, God heartily loveth, & another ſheweth who they Simplices quaſi ſive plicatione Anſelm. in Rom.9. Lib.1. be, even they whoſe dealings are without pleats and wrinkles every way. Againe, that ſimplicity and plaine open honeſty, that is contrary to fraud and ſubtilty ever, is commended ſaith Lactantius. And ſimplicity is ever joyned with true wiſdome, ſaith Tertullian. No vertue ſo neceſſary betwixt man and man, as humble ſimplicity, and modeſt gravity, ſaith another. And to conclude, conclude, if we regard the ſenſes and judgements of any, but our ſelves certainly, mee thinke it ſhould never be forgotten, what S. Hierome ſo heartily ſpeaketh; Have ever ſuch a regard of truth in all thy doings, as if once thou haſt ſpoken it, all one thou takeſt thy ſelfe preſſed with it, as if thou hadſt ſworne it a thouſand times. Ad Cælant.

Thus ſee you ſecondly then the judgement of true Chriſtian teachers touching the vice you are ſo ſtrongly tempted to ſtraine your ſelfe withall. Thirdly, now view the opinion of the Heathen concerning the ſame, and if nature taught them very heartily ever to abhorre it, what will be the end Frailty, can you ſuppoſe either of your ſelfe, or any other, in whom neither nature, nor the renewed light and ſtrength thereof, the bleſſed Word of God, can keep upright in the Chriſtian courſe of plaine, true, faithfull, honeſt meaning, ſpeaking, and plaine dealing with all men.

Heathen againſt it. Cic. Offic. 2.

What is horrible deceit and fraud ſaith one of them a famous Counſellor, but when one thing is done, and another pretended in outward ſhew? Therefore like of the one and like of the other, hate the former, and abhorre the latter, though this may you ſee plainly in this place; And in another place, he hath this reaſon againſt it; Suſpition (ſaith he) of others, was never good, but the more any man or woman uſe diſſembling and halting themſelves, the more ever they will ſtand in a ſuſpitious feare of others that they likewiſe uſe it, therefore never was it, nor ever ſhall be a commendable courſe in any. Againe, how ſoundeth it ſtill to all poſterities, the diſcredit and ſhame of thoſe cavelling, gloſing Thracians, who having taken truce for thirty dayes, ſpoyled their enemies in the night, with this ſhamefull ſhift, that named no truce to bee kept on the night, but onely on the day? and how liveth ſtill, and will doe long on the contrary ſide, the praiſe of M. Regulus amongſt theſe Heathens, becauſe he rather choſe to die a cruell death, than once to breake the faith he had truely plighted, and any way by fraud, ſubtiltie, and diſſembling trechery to take the courſe that others did? But I ſtay my ſelfe, and aſſure you of this, that in all orations and ſpeeches, in all places, and actions, for and againſt any man amongſt them, honeſt plainneſſe was ever an argument of favour and ſuccour, and hollow ſmoothing glavering, a note of reproach, and an argument to perſwade the contrary. Now therefore let us gather up all theſe againe together, and if Heathens hate it, Chriſtians loathe it, and the God of life and death abhorre it, what ſtrength ſhould any cauſe in the earth have to tempt you unto it? Nay, Frailty, how dare you for any favour or gaine under the Sunne oppoſe your practice to his allowance, whoſe diſliking killeth, and caſteth into hell for evermore? Therefore I pray you bee warned, and wipe off that miſt of earthly covetouſneſſe, and ambition, that bleareth your eyes, looke with another ſight upon theſe things, and be aſſured, if the truth of God bee aſſured, that ſince honeſt hearts, and plaine dealing hath a bleſſing promiſed, the gaine of flattery, gloſing and halting, is not the beſt wealth, nor the beſt wiſedome. But this little is more, whoſe heart is purer than mountaines of gold and all honoured ſtate, that is crept unto by deepe diſſembling, and ſo will the end prove in them or theirs, if God be God. For they are curſed, if the pure in heart be bleſſed, as I have often now repeated. And judge if the curſe of God will want his effect at one time or other, at firſt or at laſt. But now if all this ſhould not yet fully ſtrengthen you (which God forbid) then proceed we with the ſentence in Matthew, and ponder well the other part of it, For they ſhall ſee God, (ſaith it.) VVhat is this? But the Lord ſhall reveale unto them daily more and more as a reward of their ſincerity and honeſt walking, his will, his mercy, his favour, his comforts, his joyes prepared, and all his goodneſſe in Jeſus Chriſt, toward them. Which indeed is to ſee God as man is able to ſee him in this life, and therefore is called bleſſedneſſe, becauſe the end of ſuch knowledge and ſight is bleſſedneſſe, as woe and miſery is of the contrary. VVhere by the way wee are notably taught what is neceſſary in either man or woman that ſhall ever profit by reading or hearing the VVord of God, namely, a pure heart, that is even a ſincere mind and upright purpoſe to learne of the Lord, and not to doe what they doe, either for one cauſe or other whatſoever beſide, that a ſubtile minde can lay downe. Which words of Chriſt include a ſtrong comfort to honeſt ſimplicity, and as touching a terrour againſt ſmoothing hypocriſie. For the one ſhall ſee God, the other ſhall never behold him to their comfort, but all their reading, all their hearing, all their knowledge, if the Lord beſtow any, ſhall be to death, and not to life; to woe, and not to well: a favour ſending them body and ſoule to everlaſting miſery, as by neceſſary conſequence followeth of the place. Yet I doe not meane in all this, that a man ſhould all be open to every one, and in every matter: for that were as great an extremity the other way, and full of incoveniences. And I remember well what good counſell wiſe experienced Syrach giveth in this point: Namely, That we ſhould not open our hearts to every one, leſt they be unthankefull to us, and put us to reproofe. Syrac. 8. 16. And in another place, Be not too humble in thy wiſedome. And I remember Chryſoſtome confeſſeth of himſelfe, without feare of blame for it, that hee uſed a little ſubtilty to make Saint Baſil accept his Biſhopricke and charge which otherwiſe he would not. Therefore I ſay againe, under the praiſe of honeſt ſimplicity and purity of heart, I doe not ſhrowd or bolſter any plain fooliſhneſſe and undiſcreet ſillineſſe, but my ſpeech tendeth to the preſſing of that, even to hell, if I can, which you Frailty are De Sacerdotio Lib. 1.

are tempted to, namely, to lie, flatter, cog, halt, gloſe, ſooth, ſmooth, crouch, creepe, ſigh, ſorrow, fawne, and fall downe at ones feet, ſweare and proteſt, liking, love, faithfull ſervice and friendſhip, and what not, that may allure for credit and favour, lucre and gaine, when there is no more truth of good meaning in you than is in the Devill, but onely for your turne. This is that that I inveigh againſt, and that that God and all good men have ever hated, as I have proved; to carry two faces under an hood for commodity, and mine owne ſafety. To ſerve God with lips and outward ſhew, becauſe the Law ſo preſſeth me, if I will live in account, and inwardly to be a deepe diſſembling hypocrite and a ſecret ſcoffer at his truth. To ſalute with a kiſſe the Miniſters of the word, as Iudas did his maſter, and yet in hidden ſoule to abhorre them and their counſell as I doe a toade, and every way to remaine a beaſtly man, unreformed in word, deed, and thought utterly, and to care more in the very truth of my heart for one ſecret houre amongſt my mates, where my thrice damnable deſire and unregenerated humour may bee ſatisfied, than I doe for a thouſand dayes in any Miniſter or mans company in the world, whoſe tongue rebuketh, countenance frowneth, or heart miſliketh of my ſinne. To ſay as Ioab ſaid with a fleering face, How doſt thou my brother Amaſa, and to ſtabbe him preſently with his dagger, or as we ſay commonly many an one of us, God give you good morrow ſir, and ſo forth, when bitter gall in a feſtered heart biddeth the devill fetch you ſir, & worſe too if I could tell how. To prate and ſpeake as a faithfull ſubject, and yet to be a longing foe to worke a ruine to my will. And what ſhould I ſay? to ride and runne, to watch and waite, and performe all duties, as if I were the trueſt ſervant that draweth breath, and yet is my heart onely bent upon my maſters preferments, and not one jote at all of faithfull duty and affection in me to his perſon. This, this abominable and even more than devilliſh nature, if more may be, is that I meane, and that the world too much liketh of, that you are tempted to Frailty, and that Jeſus Chriſt in this verſe now named, armeth his children and choſen againſt. Wherefore my companion Frailty, weigh my drift, and marke my proofes, conſider what you deſire, and by what meanes you incline to get your deſire. You deſire but the world (to ſpeake in a word) and for the world to loſe your ſoule, what a gaine is it? But if you take this courſe, you ſhall as certainely loſe body and ſoule, as you now live and heare me, for it is curſed of the Lord, and they that uſe it ſhall never ſee God. His nature is all truth, and ſimplicity, and therefore what fellowſhip can ever he have with a falſe gloſer? But if you ſet the Lord before your eyes, hang upon his mercy, and truſt to his mercy, and truſt to his providence, dealing with all the world ſincerely, honeſtly, plainly, and uprightly, beſtowing not face and forme, but even all the love, and duty of your heart where it is due, be it to God or man: you heare the Lord, you heare the Lord, I ſay, that never lyed; Bleſſed are the pure in heart for they ſhall ſee God: you heare his ſervant David againe, Bleſſed is that man in whoſe ſpirit there is no guile; no guile I ſay againe, and the Lord give us ſtrength.

Againſt diſcouragement from peace-making, the ſeventh temptation.

YOur next complaint is of ſlackneſſe, that creepeth upon you daily more and more, in labouring to pacifie diſagreeing neighbours, againſt which your conſcience cryeth, and indeed with cauſe: for it is a great offence, hatefull to God, and hurtfull to the common wealth in generall, and to many a man in particular. But in the name of God Frailty, ſtrengthen your ſelfe by an earneſt conſideration of the great exellency of that Chriſtian vertue of peace and unity, and fixe not your eye ſo much upon the acceptance of men, that have ever had their corruptions, and ever will. The vertue you ſhall finde in very high degree commended unto men by the holy Scriptures of God in many places, and by many arguments: but I will referre the noting and naming of them to your owne diligence, and content my ſelfe in a ſhort ſpeech with a very few: Beginning firſt with that notable Pſalme of the Prophet David wholly ſpent in this matter. Where his firſt argument is this; That which is good ought ever greatly to bee regarded and maintained amongſt men, but much more if it bee both good and pleaſant too, for theſe both doe not ever concurre together. But ſuch a thing is peace and love amongſt men. For behold, how good and pleaſant a thing it is brethren to dwell together in unitie. Behold I ſay, and even marke it earneſtly. Therefore it ought to bee regarded and maintained ever to the uttermoſt of our powers amongſt us. His ſecond argument is this: That which caſteth a comfort from it like the precious oyntment that was appointed for the Prieſts of the Lord, Aaron and his ſucceſſors, and even ſuch a comfort as that oyntment hath when it is not ſparingly dropped, but even plentifully powred, and ſo plentifully, as that it runneth downe, even from the top of the head, to the skirts of his cloathing, that is a notable thing amongſt men, and by all meanes to be retained and ſought: but this is peace and unity, love and agreement amongſt them. Therefore to bee regarded and maintained greatly. His third argument is this: That which being had, is to men as the dew deſcending from the Mountaines to the ground, and being wanting, is as the want of moyſture to the earth, that is thrice needfull, gainfull, and good to men: but ſuch is unity, peace and love, even like the dew of Hermon that fell upon the hill of Sion. Therfore to be regarded and maintained greatly. His laſt, and not his leaſt argument, wherewith he endeth both this matter, and that Pſalme withall, is this: That which pulleth upon men even all the temporall bleſſings of God, and life for evermore, that is a thouſand times profitable both to them and theirs: but ſuch (ſaith the Prophet) is peace and unity, love and agreement amongſt men, therefore to bee regarded and maintained greatly. Thus you ſee one mans judgement, and that ſuch a mans as had abundance of Gods moſt holy Spirit to direct his heart to thinke, and pen to write, and as in truth was every way then renowned, and now remaineth by the Lord himſelfe in high degree above others commended to us, unto whom if you adde ſome other Scriptures, you ſhall more peradventure be confirmed with diverſity, though this indeed were ſufficient. Conſider therefore alſo thoſe often repetitions of Chriſt in the Goſpell, My peace I give to you, my peace I leave with you, love one another, for this is my Commandement, that you love one another, as I have loved you; and hereby ſhall men know that you are my Diſciples, if you love one another, yea, a new Commandement I give you, that ye love one another. Iohn.14.

Would ever the Lord Jeſus have thus gone over and over it againe, and iterated charge upon charge in this order, if it had not beene a moſt excellent vertue in every countrey, towne, and houſe, love and agreement? Marke againe that moſt earneſt exhortation of the Apoſtle Paul unto the ſame, in his Epiſtle to the Epheſians, deſiring them in his bonds for the Lords cauſe that they would ſupport one another through love, endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. And why? For there is one body and one ſpirit, one hope of calling, one Lord, one Faith, one baptiſme, one God and Father of all, &c. A moſt vehement and urging reaſon if I ſhould follow it, and lay it plainer open. And marke a multitude of other places to the ſame concluſion, which aſſuredly the Lord would never have uttered, but the price of peace, unity and love is very precious in his eyes, and to all eſtates a moſt ſoveraigne good in the world. See alſo how ſenſible things in nature carry us to this conſideration. For by experience we finde it, that if the heavens agree to moiſten the earth, and the earth being moyſtened, to give her encreaſe, wee are all the better for their unity, and if yet ſhould but even a little while either of them deny his office, quickly and greatly ſhould wee feele the ſmart of it alſo. Therefore judge by this the fruit of good agreement. Againe, if the humors in mens bodies bee at an agreement, not one above another but very equally, as is beſt proportioned and mixed, all the whole body is comfortable, proſpereth and doth well: but if once any one aboundeth or wanteth, and their ſweet harmony is broken, then by and by the whole body feeleth it, and if a reconciliation be not made with convenient ſpeed, it periſheth. Therefore judge by this the fruit of good agreement. Againe, if the members of the body well agree to doe their ſeverall duties, all is well: but if either eye deny to guide, foot to goe, hand to reach, ſtomack to digeſt, or ſo forth, ſtraight the whole body falleth to hurt. And therefore ſee by this the fruit of good agreement. Epheſ.4.1. Things in nature teach unity. Hoſ.2.22. Deut.28.32.

Laſt of all, even in muſicall inſtruments marke how well wee like the noyſe ſo long as every ſtring doth keepe his juſt proportion, and how preſently we ſtop our eares from hearing, if any one be out of tune, twitched up too high, or let downe too low, and all the muſick is marred. All which and many moe in nature ſound unto us, and as they can deliver it out, that great is the fruit, comfort, and good of peace and love amongſt men: and as great the evill, as odious the ſight, if any one member in his owne vaine conceit bee twitched over high, or negligently ſlacked overmuch, whereby that fit proportion is not kept, that ever ſoundeth and ſeemeth ſweet. For then will follow aſſuredly ere the time be long, the proofe of Chriſts ſpeech, A kingdome divided in it ſelfe can never ſtand. And that other alſo of the Poet:

By concord, ſmall to much is brought,
And diſcord great things bring to nought.

Upon all which then gather this concluſion, and if this great vertue of peace and love bee to the Lord himſelfe ſo acceptable, and to all eſtates in the world ſo profitable, muſt it not needs be in it ſelf, howſoever the world accepteth it, a moſt ſingular thing, and a moſt deſerved praiſe to a man to be a peace-maker amongſt men? Certainly it muſt: but wee need not to gather it by concluſion; for the Lord Chriſt himſelfe hath ſaid it in the ſame fifth of Matthew, as preparing ſtrength before hand for this very ſame temptation, that now you feele, that Bleſſed are the peace-makers, for they ſhall be called the children of God. And never, as I have now often ſaid, doth he ſet a bleſſing upon the head of any thing, but the ſame in it nature, and before his Majeſty, is a worthy thing. Wherefore this place ſhould be to you even a thouſand arguments, to confirme your obedience in ſo Chriſtian a duty as peace-making is, and a thouſand ſpurres to pricke you daily to it, when opportunitie is offered, and occaſion given to the ſame. For Frailty, what can you reſolve this ſpeech of Chriſt into, if you marke it well, but into this ſenſe? As if he ſhould have ſaid to his Diſciples in this order: I know the manifold diſcomforts that ſhall be given given to all men, and eſpecially to your Miniſters in that duty of peace-making, which yet both belongeth to all men, and eſpecially to your calling, notwithſtanding ever to endeavour ſo farre as power ſhall ſerve. And therefore leſt hereafter when it ſhall ſo fall out, either you or any other ſhould be tempted through mens unthankfulneſs, to the giving over of that ſo thrice needfull a thing. I fore-warne you here before hand, and even give you in charge, as I am your Lord and Maſter, that you never regard, cleave and ſticke in the acceptance or thankfulneſſe of men for your paines and travell in this matter; for if you doe, you ſhall be diſcouraged. But ever looke you up to heaven, what is there thought of it, and to the better ſort of the world alſo, whom the Lord hath given eyes to diſcerne good things withall. And whatſoever you find at mens hands for ſo godly a labour, you ſhall well know it, finde it, and feele it, that with the Lord in heaven, bleſſed for ever ſhall be the peace-makers, and both of him and his true children here in earth, that know what is what, they ſhall be counted, taken, and acknowledged for the ſonnes of Almighty God, that ſhall live with their Father for evermore. Which is enough Frailty, if there be either touch or taſte, or any feeling in the world in us, to ſtay us for ever in this duty, be the perverſneſſe of men never ſo much. For what can we deſire more, than to have our doings accepted of the Lord, and our ſelves aſſured of everlaſting reward at his hands for men? Let men be mad, and mad againe, let their crooked affections worke and writh them whither they can, and even all unthankfull ſpeeches burſt from them againſt us for our good will, that may bee imagined, my God is pleaſed, ſhould a Chriſtian heart thinke with my endevour, and his acceptance is my ſatisfaction, his content is my reſt, and a ſufficient requitall of all my paines. Otherwiſe Frailty, I pray you even earneſtly conſider it: what love of God is that in us, that the love of man driveth out of us, what care to pleaſe him is that, that mens diſpleaſure quencheth? Fie, fie, it is too groſſe, and ten thouſand wonders may it bee, that ever any of us can ſleep with this imagination, that we love God above all, and yet in ſuch things as by name are commanded and by promiſes commended to us, wholly guide our obedience according to mens acceptance or not acceptance, liking or miſliking.

Wherefore on ſtill Frailty with this duty and endeavour, to reconcile diſagreeing mindes in the name of God, and where the bitter gaule, the ſpiteful peeviſhneſſe, and all the unthankfulneſſe of the Devill, and his whole hoaſt in every man and woman doe deale withall, yet have you comfort enough, if either the Lords acceptance can content you, or your owne promiſed reward and bleſſing pleaſe you, or good account to be one that God hath choſen for his childe, with the better ſort of the world comfort you.

Now by the way of a little digreſſion, I hope I doe not weary you, I would alſo wiſh you a little to conſider, that if this peace and agreement amongſt neighbours in towne and countrey be ſuch and ſo ſweet in the ſence of the Lord, as that even preſervers of it, and reſtorers, when it is broken, are ſo heartily bleſſed, and accounted for it the ſonnes of God, muſt it not needs follow, that thoſe things likewiſe are in high account before his Majeſty, which being in men and women, doe moſt mightily maintaine this bleſſed vertue in all and every ſociety under heaven? Surely it muſt needs follow. And what are they? Many and divers are they if one ſhould make a curious recitall, but for my part, when I marke the courſe of things, and the cauſes of good agreement in any place, I thinke but even eſpecially of theſe three.

Firſt, a patient and meeke nature in our ſelves, able to beare and tolerate ſomething, without mounting into the houſe top immediately, and flaſhing out all on fire by and by, upon the ſight or hearing of it.

Secondly, a well judging heart of others, till we bee certaine of the contrary. And laſtly, a good tongue. Muſt not I ſay (if peace be ſo pleaſing to the Lord) theſe things alſo be precious in his eyes, which all the world knoweth to be nouriſhing Nurſes of the ſame, whereſoever they are? If peace-making pull a bleſſing upon us, as the Lord liveth, theſe ſo great preſervers of peace ſhall have a happy reward. And if this be true, then on the other ſide againe, the contrary vices for their contrary effect muſt needs be as loathſome, hateſull, and accurſed: Namely, an impatient haſty, fierce, froward, furious nature that is as ſhort as moſſe, that hath never fought withall and foiled any affection, but cleaving ſtill in pure naturals, is unregenerated, and ever caſteth out the ſavour of old Adam, upon every occaſion, be it but a triſle.

Secondly, a ſuſpitious miſdeeming minde of every body, that they ſay thus of us, worke this againſt us, or at leaſt thinke thus of us, when in truth it is nothing ſo. O poyſon of peace in any Kingdome, Countrey, Towne, Houſe, or perſon living in the world, this miſdeeming mind. And to a mans ſelfe there is no more twitching torment under the Sun. For it is even a worme that is ever gnawing, and can never be contented.

Laſtly, an evill tongue, a peaceleſſe tongue, that can never bee quiet from prittle prattle, from ſcanning this neighbours wealth, that neighbours wit, this mans doings, that mans ſayings, and from curſing even the whole country over, till all men have bin within the ſpeech of our tongues drawne out of us by the power peradventure of a pot too much, or ſuch a like influence. Muſt not theſe things, I ſay, and the owners of them bee accurſed, as ſure as they live, if peace and love, loue and good agreement amongſt men be of the Lord bleſſed? They muſt, they muſt, Frailty, For all the world knoweth the venome of theſe things in any towne, and their mighty working againſt unity, and therefore I pray you, & I pray you heartily conſider of it, and caſt even a long looke upon them, ſuch an one as wee doe when wee would marke a thing indeed, and beare it away. And I doubt not but God ſhall give you ſtrength againſt your temptation. There is no one thing ſo great a nurſe of two of them, namely of a miſdeeming minde, and a pratling tongue, as idleneſſe is, when a man hath nothing to doe, and to apply himſelfe unto, but to ſit on a bulke in the ſtreet, or a bench in the Taverne, or an Alehouſe, and to wet his tongue with drinke, and to drie it with talking, or when a woman hath no ſetled government of her ſelfe in houſe, but is in the number of thoſe that the Apoſtle Paul ſpeaketh of, which being idle, learne to goe about from houſe to houſe. Yea, they are not only idle, but alſo pratlers and buſie-bodies, ſpeaking things which are not comely. Therfore whoſoever will be a preſerver of peace, hee muſt bee an enemy to theſe courſes aſſuredly, and heare more with two eares than hee ſpeaketh with one tongue. But I weary you with this digreſſion, which is longer than I meant, and therefore I cut it off, againe and againe requiring of you, that you never hang upon the account of men in any thing that ever you goe about, being commanded by the expreſſe Word of God; but fully ſuffice your ſelfe with the acceptance of God, and that which you have here an aſſurance of, if you be a peace-maker. Bleſſed ſhall you bee, and ever accounted both with God and his true children, the ſonne of God. And if this will not content you, quicken you, ſtrengthen and ſtay you in this vertue, but that worldly ingratitude ſhall quench you, and draw you to ſuch extremity as you ſpake of, certainly Frailty you deceive your ſelfe, there is no true godlineſſe in you, but even your name is too gentle for your nature, you are become plaine infidelity. But I hope the beſt, and performe you no leſſe, if you regard your owne comfort. Sufficient is this, yet once againe, if you be the Lords, Bleſſed are the peace-makers, for they ſhall be called the children of God.

1 Tim. 3. 15.

FRAILTIE.

ONce more would I trouble you Faith, if I might, before we end, and it is in this, I fear my nature if perſecution ſhould ariſe for Religion. And what ſhould I doe to obtaine ſtrength?

FAITH.

There are many Treatiſes of this point, godly and comfortable, whereunto for larger diſcourſe I referre you, and wiſh you to peruſe them. For mine owne part, whenſoever I thinke of this matter, theſe and ſuch other conſiderations ſeeme moſt ſweet unto mee as yet: further tryall ſhall give further aſſault, but God will be ever good to Iſrael.

Firſt, it is ratified, decreed, eſtabliſhed by the Lord our God, that through many tribulations we muſt enter into the kingdome of heaven. And therefore ſince it muſt bee ſo, ſo bee it in the name of God; and be it unto us as it pleaſeth him: neceſſary things are to be borne neceſſarily, and with cheare. For in vaine doe we grudge to do what we muſt needs doe, or grieve to beare what we muſt needs beare. Heathens and Pagans have made a comfort of neceſſity, and ſhould Chriſtians in better cauſe bewray more weakneſſe? No, God forbid. But let it ever bee our ſpeech rather than theirs in ſuch matters as our God ſendeth and layeth upon us: Ferenda quæcunque ſunt, They are welcome whatſoever they be.

Secondly, this degree and courſe that the Lord hath laid downe for his children, thus to keepe, proceedeth not of anger and diſpleaſure, or of a mind delighting in our woe, and ſeeking to puniſh us, but of great love and moſt fatherly affection toward us, and indeed wonderfully worketh our better beeing, and therefore ten thouſand times welcome ſhould this good will of his be to us, and very farre from ſhaking us from the true profeſſion of his name and truth. For his affection, we heare his owne mouth ſpeake it, that whom he loveth, he rebuketh and chaſteneth, many a time repeating the ſame that we might remember it. And for the other we ſee it, and know it by the proofe of every dayes experience. For what maketh us ſee the gall of Satans heart towards us, and even our everlaſting overthrow ſworne of him by his devilhood, if by any meanes he can worke it, to the end wee may perfectly hate ſo perfect a foe; and yet ſo flyring a friend? The croſſe. What rowſeth us out of dull ſecurity, and cold conceit of our owne wants, or the neceſſity of Gods protection and ſuccour, and maketh not only our tongues to ſpeake, but the fire to kindle and burne within us, and ſo our prayers to have ſpirit and power before the Lord? The croſſe. What killeth this intemperancy of our affections, & this bluſtring impatiency of our natures, and maketh us meek, milde, humble, gentle, and like lambs, not Lions, appointed to the ſlaughter? The croſſe. What worketh the decay even of the whole old Adam in us with all his luſts, concupiſcence, and venome, and daily raiſeth up, as a meanes, the new new man, with all his ſweet motions, heavenly and reformed actions? The Croſſe. What maketh us ſpit in the face of this flattering world, whoſe love cauſeth loſſe both of body and ſoule in the world to come, and to be content to part with her pappes, and to bid all pleaſures adue? The croſſe.

Apoc. 4.

Laſtly, what maketh us teare our bellies from the earth, whereto they cleave ſo faſt, and lift up our heads to heaven, long for the life that laſteth, and deſire heartily to be clothed with our houſe which is from above? The croſſe.

Wherefore then ſince it is decreed, and that in love to our ſo great good, that all which will live godly in Jeſus Chriſt muſt ſuffer perſecution, what cauſe have we, would the Lord vouchſafe us eyes, with the Croſſe to be diſcouraged and driven from the Lord?

Thirdly, it never happeneth to us by fortune and chance, or by ignorance in our God, or inability to let it, if it pleaſe him, but by his knowledge, by his will, and by his hand, and he is our Father, bound unto us in league and covenant of love, that for his part ſhall never bee broken while we hang on him. The mother may forget the childe that is her fleſh, before he can forget us; and as well can a man ſuffer the apple of his eye to be pricked, as he us to be hurt, if we cleave to him; then judge if his Croſſe ſhould ever diſmay us.

Fourthly, it is no ſtrange thing or unheard of, or unſeene before, that befalleth us when wee are perſecuted, but ſuch as all our brethren have taſted, found and felt before us, and why then ſhould wee faint, when wee drinke but of the ſame cup that the deareſt Saints and ſoules, now bleſſed with the Lord, have begun to us in? Caſt your eyes about, and ſee the courſe of times, although I know you know it well enough. Began not Abel unto us in this cuppe and courſe, as ſoone as ever the Lord bewrayed his love unto him, before his brother? Followed not the Patriarkes and Prophets, men and women, old and young, in their times and meaſures ever, till Chriſt came? Then was it not the cup that his owne ſelfe began to his children in, and the Baptiſme wherewith he was baptized? Followed not his Diſciples, ſet out into the world as ſheepamongſt Wolves, whipped and beaten, checked and ſnubbed, impriſoned and chained? &c. Followed not again after them, thoſe thouſands of his children under the primitive perſecution, ſome ſcalded, ſome burned, ſome boyled, ſome hanged, ſome headed, ſome throwne downe from the Rocks upon ſtakes, ſome ſtabbed in with forkes, ſome racked and torne in pieces, their tongues cut, their eyes boared out, their fleſh pinched off with pinſons, womens breaſts ſeared off with hot irons, pricked under the nayles with needles, & a thouſand wayes tormented? Yea, was it not ever true with the godly, In hoc vocati eſtis; For this end were we called? And good Lord then, why ſhould not a common caſe bee a common comfort? Why ſhould any man or woman that loveth God, ſeeke or wiſh a priviledge above all the children of God that ever were, and above the Sonne of God himſelf, Chriſt Jeſus? Is it not honor enough, mercy enough, and favour enough to be dealt withall as they were? Therefore the community of it to us, with all our brethren and ſiſters, and even with our eldeſt brother Chriſt Jeſus, ſhould ſtay our hearts whenſoever it pleaſeth the Lord to ſend it.

Fiftly, the cauſe being not ours, but the Lord our Gods, and good, ſhould alſo confirme us. The ſhort time that it can endure, were it (ſuppoſe) as long as we live, ſhould comfort us: for our life is but a flower, as graſſe, as ſmoak, as a bubble of the water, and as the vaineſt fickle fading thing that you can imagine. Againe, that paſſed promiſe from the Lord of life and truth, ſealed with the blood of his owne Sonne unto us, the ſweetneſſe whereof all the tongues of men and Angels can never expreſſe, That he will never lay more upon us than he will make us able to beare, ſhould be like a thouſand ſtayes round about us to hold us up. The promiſes of peace, comfort and quiet, for evermore above meaſure and conceit of man, in heaven, if wee continue faithfull to the end, ſhould hold us up. That ſentence paſſed in the Lords Court, of baſtardie, and conſequently of depravation of all inheritance, if wee bee without correction, ſhould hold us up. And what ſhould I goe any further? The examples of our brethren of all callings, of all ages, men and women, that have conſtantly carryed their croſſe, and never delivered it up, till they delivered ſoule and all to their God, ſhould hold us up. Wherefore Frailty, even as Judas the Machabee could incourage his men, not to feare the multitude of their enemies, neither to be afraid of their aſſault, but to remember how their Fathers were delivered in the red Sea, when Pharaoh purſued after them; ſo ſay I to you, and to my ſelfe, let us never feare affliction, nor the evill day, for our momentary croſſe cauſeth an everlaſting weight of glory. But let us remember the firme faith of our Fathers, of our Mothers, of our Brethren and friends; let us looke upon their patience, upon their conſtancy, their hope, and beſeech the living God wee may follow their good ſteps, and ſtay in ſtrength upon his mercy, whatſoever hee ſendeth us, knowing it, as we know we live, that though our braines cleave to the wals, though our bones be ſtrowed in the ſtreets, and our blood runne downe every channell, yet ſhall we riſe againe reſtored by the power of our God, be gathered into his barne as his pure wheate, our blood revenged, wee crowned, and our tongues ſound the praiſe of him that ſitteth upon the Throne with Majeſty and honour, above all conceit of any earthly heart.

FRAILTIE.

O but Faith, the world will give ſuch a ſpiteſull cenſure of a man or womans life, religion, honeſty wiſedome, and ſuch like, as that it is even a bell to heare them, when the Lord doth exerciſe us. For it was ever, and I thinke ever will bee, the conceit of fleſh and blood, that a good man and woman truely religious, truely honeſt, and ſufficiently wiſe, cannot be ſo plagued as they tearme it, of God at any time, and therefore the croſſe muſt needs teſtifie to the world, a want in all theſe.

FAITH.

It is moſt certaine and dayly found what you ſay, yet is there nothing under heaven more abſurd than that opinion. For loved not God Abel, Abraham, Iſaac and Iacob? loved hee not his Prophets? loved hee not his owne Sonne, and all that follow his ſteps to this day? Were none of them of a true religion, of an honeſt life, and wiſe enough to take that courſe in the world that God allowed? Yet all of them plagued he, as they call it. And never any further humbled in this world than Chriſt himſelfe, and therefore proſperity or adverſity may not be taken for ſignes ever of favour or diſpleaſure. But the worſt man moſt quiet often in the world, and moſt honoured, loved, promoted, and renowned, his deſerved torment being deferred to another day, and the trueſt Chriſtian moſt troubled, toſſed, rejected, and humbled, his comfort and reward remaining for him in another world.

But beſide all this plaine demonſtration of a tried truth, uſe with your ſelfe, Frailty, to oppoſe againſt the conceit of the world, the ſentence of the Lord our God next following in the fift of Matthew, after thoſe that now have beene conſidered of, Bleſſed are they that ſuffer perſecution for righteouſneſſe ſake, for theirs is the kingdome of heaven. And thinke with your ſelfe, as I have now often ſaid, that if our God now ſet a bleſſing upon it, what skilleth it what the whole world, and ten thouſand worlds moe if they were extant, doth judge? Shall the voice of man bee the guide of our courſe, and the line of our life? Shall mans judgement or Gods judgement ſtand in the latter day? O Frailty, wee may not hang upon ſo broken a reed as fleſh and fleſhly wit is. Wee may not bee lifted up with mans liking, unleſſe it have further warrant: nor caſt downe with his diſliking, unleſſe we know he ſo deemeth juſtly. And therefore againe, I ſay, conſider of this comfort. Conſider of this world, and conſider of the world to come, the one is tranſitory, and the other is permanent: the one full of woe and ſecret ſorrow in the very midſt of pompe, the other full of joy, comfort, and ſolace, and that without all ending. Then whether is here good to bee happy, and there unhappy, or here judged miſerable, and there found moſt bleſſed, judge your ſelfe even with very reaſon. Certainly therefore it is a comfort ſufficient, ſo knowne to bee by Chriſt that gave it, and ever hath, and ſhall comfort the children of God againſt worldly conceit, Bleſſed are they that, for a good cauſe, ſuffer perſecution, for theirs is the kingdome of heaven. That is, all comfort poſſible to be thought of, & ten thouſand times more.

This was Pauls comfort in the middeſt of all his miſery, and therefore he boldly and cheerfully ſaith, he never counted the afflictions of this world worthy the joy that ſhould bee revealed. This comforted David alſo, that hee periſhed not in his affliction, as himſelfe witneſſeth, and as that ſpeech by compariſon may ſhew: I ſhould utterly have fainted, but that I beleeve verily to ſee the Lord in the Land of the living. And (what ſhould I name them?) this ever hath comforted firſt or laſt, leſſe or more, yet ever ſufficiently any that were the Lords. But ſee further how not onely thus in generality againſt perſecution it pleaſed Chriſt to ſtrengthen our weakneſſe, but even in ſpeciality alſo againſt thoſe kinds which moſt bitterly taſte unto us and ſhake us ſore, if we be not ſtrong; to wit, reproach, and report. For, Bleſſed are you (ſaith he) when men revile you, and ſhall falſly ſay all manner of evill ſaying by you for my name ſake, rejoyce and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven: a ſaying never to bee forgotten of us whilſt the life is in us. For the gall of theſe croſſes is not little, and the power of this aſſault hath appeared not as feeble in great Prophets and members of the Church. The very words alſo of Chriſt his comfort, inſinuate a ſecret force above many others of this temptation. For hee biddeth them rejoice, and promiſeth great reward in heaven, as foreſeeing a great downefall both of heart and countenance in man, when hee is once touched, either with reviling ſpeeches to his face, or falſe reports behind his backe. Wherefore to conclude, and leave you now to your other readings of this matter, I pray you Frailty open your eyes, or rather deſire the Lord to open them, that you may both now in the day of peace, and whenſoever alſo it ſhall pleaſe the Lord further to try you, ſee with your eye, heare with your eare, and beleeve with your heart, your offered comfort in the word, both againſt all other, and againſt this temptation by name of perſecution. The word teacheth it, and we know it is decreed by the Lord, to bee the lot of his deare ones ever in this world, and therefore welcome be it. The word teacheth it, and we know it, much good is wrought in us by it, and therefore welcome bee it. The word teacheth it, and wee know it, no chance nor fortune, but the will of our heavenly Father layeth it upon us, and therefore welcome be it. We know it is no new thing, or unſeene before, but the old portion of the godly that have ever beene before us, and therefore welcome be it. The cauſe is not ours when it is a truth, but his that made us, and therefore welcome be it. Wee have a promiſe wee ſhall not bee oppreſſed with more than we may beare, and therefore welcome be it. We know we are children, if as children wee bee corrected for it, and therefore welcome be it. Wee are told wee are baſtards, if wee bee without it, and therefore welcome be it. And all our forefathers have patiently carried it, and now are rewarded, therefore welcome be it. Welcome I ſay the croſſe in generall, and perſecution for truth, all or part, as it pleaſeth God, and welcome in particular this kind of croſſe, if ſo our God will, revilings, reproches, reportings falſe and unjuſt. For wee know our caſe, the plea is ended, and ſentence is given never to be revoked, bleſſed are we, good cauſe we have to rejoice and be glad, for great is our reward in heaven. O the God of heaven, and Father of mercy, ſtrengthen us, that theſe ſweet promiſes may prevaile with us, and that our eyes may ſee the comforts of his word.

What ſhould feare us Frailty, that have ſuch a God, and that ſtand in ſuch a ſtate? I pray you looke up, and claſpe your God in your armes, embrace his mercy, beleeve his truth, and as you live, though you be afflicted on every ſide, yet ſhall you not be in diſtreſſe: though you be in doubt, yet ſhall you not deſpaire: though you be perſecuted, yet ſhall you not bee forſaken: though you bee caſt downe, yet ſhall you not periſh: and though every where you beare about in your body the dying of the Lord Jeſus, yet ſhall the life of Jeſus appeare in your body, and there is neither life nor death, Angels, principalities, nor powers, things preſent, or to come, height or depth, or any other creature, that ever ſhall be able to ſeparate you from the love of God, which is in Chriſt Ieſus.

FRAILTIE.

The Lord change me and I ſhall be changed, and greatly both ought I, and doe I thanke you, Faith, for this conference, beſeeching you ſtill to pray for me, as for one whoſe name and nature you know but too well. I can promiſe nothing, but ſeeing what I would doe, I leave my ſelfe to his mercy that is able to make me doe both what I ought, and would doe: and ſo the Lord keepe us both.

FAITH.

Amen, Frailty, Amen. And the Lord give us eyes to ſee what it is to have a true heart to God, and to embrace true Religion. Is it not to ſtand in poſſeſſion of all theſe heavenly promiſes, and whatſoever befalleth to us in this world, to be happy and bleſſed in it and by it? Be it poverty, be it ſorrow, be it oppreſſion, or whatſoever? And contrariwiſe, what it alſo is to be of a prophane heart, and of an uncircumciſed life: Surely, even to ſtand as deprived of all theſe comforts, and if wee be poore, to bee alſo accurſed in our poverty, in our ſorrow, and whatſoever befalleth unto us grievous in this world. The Lord, I ſay, give us eyes to ſee it, and hearts to thinke of it. For full well we know, that were every one of us a Monarch of a whole world by himſelfe, they being as this world is, the glory both of them and us muſt paſſe away like a ſhip in the water, whoſe tract cannot bee ſeene againe, like an arrow thorow the ayre, or a weavers ſhuttle thorow his worke, like a fading flower, ſuddenly plucked up and withered like graſſe, like ſmoke, and like the bubble of the water. Wee ſhall bee forgotten with all our pompe, as the traveller is that tarrieth but a night, our honor ſhall come to an end, as the players part upon the ſtage; our doings, ſayings, lookes, geſtures, ſtates and majeſties, ſhall bee rowled up as a ſcroule, and caſt into the office of forgetfulneſſe, where nothing can be found againe. And then what remaineth? I ſay what remaineth? any thing but woe and wormes, if we have contemned Religion, and lived diſobediently againſt the Lord? any thing but vexation and torment, both of body and ſoule in hell fire? Will then ſwearing be liked, or drunkenneſſe, or whoring, or tipling and taverning, ſporting in vanity, laſcivious talking, writing or looking, carding and dicing, roiſting and roving, pride and exceſſe, or any kinde of ſinne deteſted of the Lord? Will then a diſſembling time-ſerver not be uncaſed? Will then any unjuſt ſervant not be found out? Will then an unfaithfull wife not bee diſcovered? or a beaſtly furious franticke husband, not bee rewarded? Will then any thing abide the face that commeth in the clouds with thouſands of Angels, but onely a religious heart and ſoule, that hath laboured to know, and endeavoured to live, truſting onely to the mercy of God in Chriſt for all wants to bee pardoned? Alas wee know it, even as we know wee live, it will not: but deſtruction and death ſhall then be to the man or woman for ever, that lewdly hath lived in this world, and comfort endleſſe to the contrary. Therefore once againe I ſay, the Lord give us eyes to diſcrie betimes the reward and end of true Religion, and of a reformed mind and life in that day, even for his Chriſts ſake our bleſſed Lord and Saviour. Amen.

Comfort

Comfort againſt the death of friends.

RIght well ſaid Chryſoſtome of the word of God, Habes oracula Dei? Ne moveris alium Doctorem. Nemo te docebit quemadmodum illa: Haſt thou the Oracles of God? care not for any other Teacher: For there is none ſhall teach thee like them. So ſay I for comfort, as he doth for Doctrine, haſt thou the holy Scriptures? care not for other comforters: For none ſhall comfort thee as theſe doe. Whatſoever woe wringeth, whatſoever ſorrow nippeth, the word hath a comfort, and that a ſweet one, if it be ſought out and applied faithfully. In Coloſ. Hom 9

No marvell therefore if the ſame Chryſoſtome ſaid in the true feeling hereof, Semper hortor, & hortari non deſinam, Ever I exhort, and I will never ceaſe exhorting, that not onely here in the Church, you would attend to thoſe things that are ſaid, but at home alſo, you would daily give your ſelves to reading of the Scriptures: Touching this matter that now is moved, I have read, and you may ſee what Heathens by learning and naturall light have ſaid to ſome themſelves, and their friends in ſuch loſſes: but this never read I, neither ſhall you find, that all their comforts have countervailed one promiſe out of Gods Booke. They ſaid well in many things, but never like this word that is from the Lord. They conſidered the neceſſity of death, the miſeries of life, the examples of great men that had gone before them, and ſuch like. But what are theſe to thoſe which the word will ſhew us? Our ſafety in Chriſt, our reſurrection, our immortality in the preſence of the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt, with ſuch like? Yet both good to a ſanctified mind, and now that we are to conſider of this thing, let us view them both. Hom 3. de Laz.

1 Firſt, the neceſſity of death, is a true comfort againſt death, bee it of our ſelves or our friends. No fleſh alive but it muſt die. And ſhall we feare that in our ſelves, or immoderately bewaile that in our friends, that cannot bee avoided? This were with witleſſe will to diſturbe the peace of our whole life, and with a ſervile dread of the laſt houre, to bereave of comfort all the reſt of our houres that we are to live in this preſent world. Which how fooliſh it were, your ſelfe conceive.

The carefull view of natures courſe, doth ſhew us degrees from age to age, till wee come to a full, and then a like decreaſe by ſtep after ſtep, till wee come to the change againe. Youth followeth childhood, and age followeth youth by an aſſured neceſſity, if wee live. But when wee are children, we feare not to be men, neither when we are men, to become old men, but many rather wiſh it. Why then ſhould we either feare our ſelves, or lament in our friends, death to follow age in his courſe appointed, more than age to follow youth, as was ſaid before? Surely the one muſt bee received as well as the other, without choice. And therefore a wiſe content both in our ſelves and our friends, ſhall become us beſt. Who will not die, let him never live. For wee receive the one to endure the other, when God appointeth, and wee muſt all die. To wiſe men neceſſity is a comfort, and I hope to you.

2 The miſeries of this life is another head from which Heathen men have derived comfort againſt death. Conſider them with your ſelfe from the firſt age, to the laſt houre. The diſeaſes incident to our bodies to vexe us with woe, according to their natures, ſome more, and ſome leſſe, and the leaſt too much. All the changes and chances of this wretched world, whereunto whilſt we live wee muſt lie open, will we, nill we. Warres and maſſacres, publike and private, bloody and cruell, want of children, and wickedneſſe of our children, to our great griefe, touching infamy by ſlanders and contumelies, errors, and hereſies in mind damnable, feares and cares, doubts and dumps, anguiſh and unquietneſſe, entring even up the inward parts, with a thouſand like, are they not woes? From all which our death doth free us. And therefore how ſhould we either feare or ſorrow for our ſelves or our friends, what ſo doth friend us? Truely if wee thinke of it as we ſhould indeed, we muſt needs bee of Seneca his judgement, and approve his ſpeech made in this ſort. O ignorant men of their owne miſeries, who praiſe not death, as the beſt invention that ever nature had: which includeth felicity, excludeth miſery, finiſheth the toiles of age, preventeth the perils of youth, to many it is a remedy, to ſome a wiſh, to all an end, and deſerveth better of none, than to whom it commeth before it bee called for. Yea, wee muſt confeſſe, theſe things well conſidered, that it befalleth to men concerning death, as it befalleth to young children concerning their friends. Ad Martian.

Little children, if their friends be diſguiſed with ſome ſtrange ſhowes, they are afraid of them, and crying flie from them as ſome that would hurt them, but take off theſe vizards, that they may appeare as they are, and by and by they are comforted and embrace them gladly: even ſo is it in death when we are miſſ-led. It appeareth to us diſguiſed and covered with ſome evill, that is terrible to us, and our ignorance of his truth, maketh us ſhrinke to thinke that hee doth approach. But plucke off that vizard of ſuppoſed evill, and behold his nature, as hee is, wee ſee him our friend, yea, our great friend, that cutteth the threed which wee doe weave, and wee flie no more, nor feare no more, but are comforted truely, and embrace him willingly as wee ought.

They conſider againe the famous men that have died before them; and what ſuch have endured, and could not avoid, they thinke great ſhame either to feare or flie, to lament in themſelves or in their friends. The greateſt lights that ever were amongſt them died all. Socrates and Cicero, Demoſthenes and Plato, Cæſar and Pompey, learned, or martiall, or whatſoever. Yea what wiſedome and knowledge, what valour and proweſſe, what act or what government ſoever they had, all gifts and graces, all pompe and power, all Empire and majeſty, were it over thouſand thouſands, yeelded to death. Death had his place when the time was come, and as well theſe light and lofty gallants, as the loweſt poore ones and leaſt wormes, drunke of his cup when they were injoyned. Shall it not then even in reaſon ſeeme unright, if any of leſſe merit, yea, of no merit, in compariſon of ſuch men, ſhall grieve for themſelves, or any friend of theirs to endure that which theſe endured? Surely, not onely to grieve, but not moſt willingly to welcome what theſe all embraced, is tenderneſſe intolerable, folly unfitting, and a fault that no way may be excuſed. Yea, the fault is ſo much the greater, by how much either you or your friend are inferiour to theſe men in ſervice and uſe unto the common ſtate. Thus did the Heathens ſeeke to ſalve the ſore that grew by death of any. And to this end many things of like perſwaſion they heaped up. I paſſe them over, as haſtning to the word of God, the fountaine of all comfort above compariſon. This onely I ſay, and pray you to obſerve as the end of the naming of thus much, That Heathens were aſhamed to feare death in themſelves, or immoderately to bewaile it in any friend. And will you faile of the ſtrength of an Heathen? Shall they fight better againſt fooliſh affections by the light of nature, than you by the power of grace and the bright Sunne-ſhine of Gods word? The Lord forbid. And as you tender your credit to be judged truely a ſouldier, that anſwereth the promiſe made in Baptiſme, that you would fight manfully under Chriſts banner, and not yeeld to your foe, and your Gods enemy, let not Satan overcome you in this, to make you worſe than an Heathen, more paſſionate, more impatient, more ſubject to will, and leſſe ſubject to reaſon, nay, more diſobedient to God, and of leſſe reputation before men for government of your mind than they were. You know more, performe not leſſe than they did. You have ſeene a light that they never ſaw, walke in the ſame as a child of that light, and be comfortable.

And now to the word of God, the ſweet fountaines of Iſrael, that coole indeed the ſcorching heate of all ſorrowes; and by name, of this, when God taketh our friends away by death. Many are the places whence comfort may flow, if they be conſidered, but meaning onely to give you a taſte, ſome few ſhall ſerve you at this time, and to them may bee added by your owne diligence ſome moe daily.

Iob 1. The firſt is in Iob the firſt Chapter: The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken, and bleſſed be the name of the Lord. Where I pray you conſider well what Iob loſt when he ſaid thus, and conſider what you have loſt now at this time. You ſhall find your caſes farre differing. Iob had his Oxen and his Aſſes taken away by ſtrangers, and his ſervants ſlaine with the edge of the ſword, this was his firſt newes. The fire of God fell downe from heaven, and burnt up his ſheepe, and his ſervants, and devoured them, this was his ſecond newes. His camels were taken by the Chaldeans, and his ſervants ſlaine againe with the edge of the ſword, this was his third newes. All of them bitter and grievous to happen at once, I am ſure you will confeſſe, and full ſore any one of them by it ſelfe alone, would have plunged many of us in theſe daies. Yet ſee farre greater: His fourth and laſt newes was, his ſonnes and daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldeſt brothers houſe, and behold, there came a great wind from beyond the wilderneſſe, and ſmote the foure corners of the houſe, which fell upon his children, and they died all, yea all, and all at once, by this ſuddaine meanes, to the utter amazing of all that ſhould ſee it and thinke of it. Yet for all this, ſaith the holy Ghoſt, Iob did not ſinne, to wit, by raving and railing, crying and roaring impatiently, neither did hee charge God fooliſhly, as doing any thing unjuſtly or cruelly: but conſidered who had given, and who had taken, weighed with himſelfe they were Gods, and not his, and ſhould hee forbid the Lord to doe with his owne what was his good pleaſure? Sweetly and meekly, patiently and peaceably hee caſt up his eyes, his heart, his ſoule, his mind, his affections all unto the Lord, and ſaid, Bleſſed be the name of the Lord. And of which Lord? Surely of this Lord that had thus dealt with him, and now taken all that ever hee had from him.

God hath not dealt thus with you by many and many degrees at this time, and will you then take on, and as it were bid battell to the Lord by weepings and wailings, by ſobbings and ſighings, by gronings and cryings, by mutterings and murmurings, and many other teſtimonies of a diſcontented and offended mind, above that which can ſtand with a dutifull childs behaviour, lawfull to his heavenly Father? If your loſſe were as great as Iobs was, yet you ſee what he did, and this was Gods Spirit in him; much more in a farre leſſe loſſe muſt you doe it, if you be indued with the ſame Spirit. Thinke with your ſelfe, as you ſee Iob did, what eſtate you had in this friend of yours that now you have loſt. You held him not in fee, but for tearme, and what tearme, no certaine tearme neither, but during the Lords good pleaſure. Now your tearme is out, and the Lord will have his owne againe, grieve not then at the loſſe, but bee thankefull for the lone ſo long.

Againe, I warrant you Iob very carefully caſt with himſelfe what the Heathens about him, and ſtrangers to Religion would ſay, if he ſhould take on and outrage by any impatiency. Surely even thus, Behold the man that feared God, and was ſo religious, that taught others, and rebuked many when they did offend, that ſpake ſo much of the Lord, and had his will ſo ever in his mouth, that gave ſuch teſtimonies ſundry wayes to the ſhew of man, of a reformed mind, &c. Now where is all become? Now ſee this mans practiſe how it anſwereth his ſpeeches when hee was not tried. What doe wee ſee more in him than in another, that made not halfe the ſhew that this man did? Is there but ſo much in him as in many Heathens, that knew not his Religion? Have not they taken patiently loſſe of fathers and mothers, wives and children, kindred and friends, and never ſtarted at it in compariſon of this man? O vaine fable then of Religion that yeeldeth no more patience and quiet content in time of need than this mans doth, wee will no ſuch Religion for our parts, neither will wee hereafter regard this man, as we have done before, and ſo forth. What a fearefull fruit had this been of Iobs impatience? How could the Lord have endured it at his hands, if hee had opened in this ſort the mouthes of the wicked againſt his holy feare? Therefore Iob laid his hand upon his mouth, and ſubmitted himſelfe wholly with all his affections, to the Lords good pleaſure, without cauſing any one to ſpeake evill by his meanes, to Gods good liking, and his owne laſting praiſe to the worlds end.

The caſe is yours at this time in a ſort and meaſure. You have loſt a loſſe, and mens eyes are upon you. You have loved the truth, and ſpoken of the Lords feare before divers. Now they looke for the power of it in your ſelfe, and as they ſee you now to governe your affections according to the ſame, ſo happely will they thinke both of Religion and of your ſelfe while they live.

Plucke up your heart then in Gods name, and ſhew patience and comfort. Honour the Lord, by bleſſing his name, as Iob did. Honour his truth which you profeſſe by a godly ſtay of weake nature, and as the Lord liveth, he will honour you againe, with mercy that ſhall countervaile this loſſe, and farre exceed it. All is his that you enioy, and this friend of yours was his alſo. Hee hath not taken all, but part, and left you much more than hee hath taken. Say then with the Prophet David in a ſweet comfort and eaſe of your mind: O my ſoule, why art thou ſo ſad, and why art thou ſo unquiet within me, ſtill truſt in God, &c. Pſal. 42.

Ever bee content, and now bee content with his holy will. He gave, and none but hee, hee hath taken, and none but hee, not mine, but his owne, my time was out, and the right returneth to the true owner.

I may not grudge a mortall man his owne when my time is out, much leſſe God, my deare God, my ſweet God, my good God, that lendeth mee mercies many, and comforts many, though this be gone. The Lord ſtrengthen me. Amen, Amen.

Secondly, to your comfort, conſider what this ſame Iob ſaith againe in his ſecond Chapter to his impatient wife. She rageth and ſtormeth, ſhe fretteth and fumeth, not onely like a weake woman as ſhee was, but like an ungodly woman, as ſhe ſhould not be, and comming to her husband in this great affliction, encreaſed now much more by Satans malice upon his owne body, ſhee biddeth him curſe God and die. To whom this ſweet ſpirited man made this anſwere. Thou ſpeakeſt like a fooliſh woman, what? Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and ſhall we not receive evill? Not ſinning yet for all this with his lips, but ſo brideling his affections, that his tongue through impatiency did not once murmure againſt the Lord. Iob 1.

Now marke, I pray you, Iobs reaſon to his wife. He telleth her, both he and ſhe had received many good things at Gods hand, and therefore they were bound to welcome ſuch woe as the Lord ſhould ſend, without any wayward grudging at the change. Becauſe good things binde to take worſe things well if the Lord doe ſend them. Himſelfe followeth this rule, and for the mercies which he had had, he will now endure with willing heart and quiet minde, the miſery which was preſent.

Bleſſed Iob, thou man of God for thy ſo doing. How ſweet was this argument in Gods eares, that prevailed not ſo much with thy wayward wife? Apply this now to your owne eſtate, and tell mee as you tender truth, whether God hath not beene full good unto you many wayes as well as Iob? Caſt up your bills of receits, and call your ſelfe to a Chriſtian Audit. I warrant you the Summa totalis will amount very high, and yet you can never remember halfe. Your election, your creation, your redemption, with the wounds and woe of Jeſus Chriſt, your juſtification by his perfect innocency, your vocation by his heavenly word, and ſanctification by his bleſſed Spirit, your glorification in his moſt glorious kingdome, which in hope you enjoy, with all other mercies in body and ſoule, in your ſelfe and your friends, ſo infinite wayes beſtowed of him, and ſo to your comfort received of you ſince your firſt conception, they will make a ſumme (as I am ſure you will confeſſe) very great. Thinke then what Iob ſaid for his part, that he tooke himſelfe bound by the good to endure the evill,and ſee if your caſe be not all one. You may not gaine-ſay it. And therefore except you will maliciouſly fight againſt the Lords good pleaſure, you muſt yeeld as he did,and ſay even as he ſaid in effect or words. O my deare God and bleſſed Father, how many have thy mercies beene upon mee? How deepe a draught have I drunke of this ſweet cup of thine? Now thou haſt taken once comfort from mee, ſhall I not ſet the one againſt the other, as thy ſervant Iob did? Shall I receive good things at thy hands,and not evill? Shall I preſcribe unto thee what I will have? O farre bee it from mee. I thanke thee my deare God for thy manifold and infinite mercies. And in this change I couch my ſelfe at the foot of thy Majeſty, thy will bee done and not mine, Lord make mee content, and ſweet Lord I am content,as a weake wretch can be content. To will is preſent with me through thy grace that hath wrought it, but I find performance hard through the ſinne that is in me. My loſſe thou haſt gained I doe not doubt. This friend is removed from me to dwell with thee,and I may not grudge it. Many mercies I enjoy ſtill, and they ſhall content me.

Thus if you reaſon you ſhall pleaſe God, reſemble Iob here before your eyes, and that eye of God that ſpied him, and made his boaſt of ſo patient a ſervant, ſhall doe the like of you to your great good. In the Lord then comfort your ſelfe after this ſort, and remember this ſpeech of Iob to his wife Iob received good things, and ſo have you, Iob received evill, and ſo muſt you, Iob yet was patient, and ſo ought you. Now the God of patience give it to you.

Thirdly, I thinke in this caſe of the Apoſtles words, All things worke for the beſt to them that love God. If the dead belonged then to God, this was beſt for him, to bee releaſed, and if your ſelfe belong to God,this is alſo beſt for you at this time to loſe him. Beſt I ſay in the wiſedome of God, and to ſome end, although not ſo in your owne reaſon,which ſeeth not ſo farre, and in all reſpects. Now thinke with your ſelfe thus much: If you had done good to one and pleaſured him much,and all the friends hee hath,or any of them ſhould cry out for it, would it not grieve you? Surely it would grieve you even ſo much more, by how much that unthankfull diſlike ſhould be more vehement and laſt long. So is it with God. And therefore ſee what you doe and whom you anger. The Apoſtles words are plaine, All things worke for the beſt to them that love God. If you beleeve it, and thinke both of your deed and your ſelfe that you have loved God, the holy Ghoſt concludeth, which cannot lie, that this ſame was beſt both for him and you, that now is effected and come to paſſe. When good is done we ſhould not grieve,and when the beſt is done, much leſſe ſhould wee grieve. Away then with ſorrow and ſowre lookes, and let the Lord for his mercy receive your thanks from faithfull content, and not murmurings and repinings from unbrideled affections. Not onely good is done, but the beſt, even the very beſt by him that ever knew what ever was beſt, and it ſhould appeaſe you. God is no lier, neither can be deceived, but if one houres life might have beene better either for him or you, then is not the beſt done, and then the Apoſtles words are not true. But that were wicked once to imagine. Therefore no longer life would have profited either him or you. But the very beſt is done. Bleſſed be God for his goodneſſe ever.

Rom.7. Fourthly, I conſider what the ſame Apoſtle ſaith in another place: I deſire to be looſed, and to bee with Chriſt, which is beſt of all. And I aske of you whether your ſelfe doe not the like as you are able. If you doe not, you are not yet over earthly, and further in love with this wicked world than you ſhould be. If you doe it, why then grieve you that your friend hath obtained what you deſire? This will ſeeme envie rather than love in you, to conceive diſlike for once well doing. What againe if your friend wiſhed as the Apoſtle doth long before hee obtained his requeſt,and now the Lord hath granted what he ſo heartily wiſhed? This is mercy to be rejoyced for, and not any miſery to bee wept for. A true friend acknowledgeth a debt for the pleaſuring of his friend, and is not moved with anger or griefe for the ſame. Stay your teares then, if you will be judged a friend, and grudge neither to God the company of his child,nor to the child the preſence of his God, for this is wicked. Thinke of the glory, immortality, comfort and joy with the bleſſed Trinity, and all the hoſt of heaven that your friend now enjoyeth, ſuch as no eye hath ſeene, no eare hath heard, neither ever could enter into mans heart. Thinke of the woes and miſeries in this curſed vale, that he is freed from, and judge if the Apoſtle ſay not true, It is beſt to be loſed and to be with Chriſt. If this beſt be ſalne to your loving friend by Gods good mercy, bleſſe God for it, and comfort your ſelfe that your friend enjoyeth ſuch endleſſe comfort. So ſhall you ſhew your ſelfe a friend indeed, and all godly and wiſe ſhall thinke well of you. Thus may you gather many and many places of holy Scripture, and meditate of them after this ſort: for ſweet is the word of God againſt all griefe, and by name againſt this.

2 Corinth. Wee know that if our earthly houſe of this tabernacle be deſtroyed, we have a building given of God, that is, an houſe not made with hands,but eternall in the Heavens. Therefore we ſigh, deſiring to bee cloathed with our houſe which is from heaven. If your dead friend have now obtained what all Apoſtles and faithfull men and women ſigh to obtaine, and is now dwelling in that heavenly houſe that they ſo covet,mourne not for it,but joy in it,conceive no heavineſſe but ſweet comfort that God hath beene ſo kind to one whom you loved. Againe, ſaith the ſame Apoſtle in the ſame place: We know that whileſt we are at home in the body, we are abſent from the Lord: Therefore we love rather to remove out of the body and to dwell with the Lord. This abſence from God is your friend freed from, and this preſence and dwelling with God he is now bleſſed withall a true cauſe, and a great cauſe, as hath bin ſaid, of good content. Provoke not the Lord then with unthankfull teares, ſighs and groanings, but ſtay the courſe that offendeth greatly, and tread the ſteps of ſuch as have walked rightly. They were ever patient, and moderate in ſorrow, they ruled affections, and gave them not a looſe reine, and ſo do you. Verſe 6. 10.

1 Theſ. 4. 13. I would not Brethren have you ignorant concerning them that ſleepe, that yee ſorrow not even as others that have no hope, &c. Reade the place, and examine your owne courſe whether you hope or no. Firſt, that your friend is well, and then that Almightie GOD will ſupply his want to you ſome other way, for both theſe are neceſſary. Our friends are our comfort, and our great comfort if they bee good, but if I tie God to them, and thinke all is gone when they are gone, where is my hope? What pleaſure to God ſo to truſt in him, that I truſt more in my friends and crie out when they goe? how ſhall I doe? what ſhall I doe? whither ſhall I turne mee? how ſhall I live? what joy now can I have? Woe is me, O heavy day, alas alas, and ſuch like! Is this hope? is this truſt? is this faith? Fie, fie, that ever affections and paſſions ſhould carry any good child of God ſo farre from his duty and from true knowledge. I ſay againe, our friends are our comfort while the Lord lendeth them, but yet the Lord is my ſtrong rocke, ſaith David, in whom I will truſt, my Caſtle and deliverer, my ſhield and my refuge, &c. And when man returneth to his earth againe, yet the Lord is in heaven where he ever was, to bee my father if I have loſt my father, to be my mother, ſiſter and brother, if I want any of theſe, and to bee all in all to me whatſoever I need. Therefore while he liveth (which ſhall bee ever) I cannot bee friendleſſe, though my friends dye and depart from me, but either for one hee will raiſe up another, or himſelfe ſupply the place, which is beſt of all. Mourne not then as men without hope, I pray you, but hearken to the Apoſtle, and ſhew forth your faith, your hope, your truſt to Gods glory and your owne praiſe. Conceive well of our friend that is departed, and conceive well of your owne eſtate now remaining, for it cannot be evill, if you take this loſſe patiently, as yeelding to God with all your heart, what is his good pleaſure now to have. Pſal. 18.

Apoc. 14. 13. Bleſſed are the dead which dye in the Lord. Even ſo ſaith the Spirit, for they reſt from they labours, and their workes follow them. Your friend is dead in the Lord, and therefore bleſſed. Will you then weepe for him? His workes follow him, and the Lord in mercy hath crowned his true obedience according to his promiſe, and will you looke awry at it? God forbid.

Levit. 10. 3. Nadab and Abihu the ſons of Aaron, are ſlain by the Lord in his anger and wrath for their ſinfull preſumption. A fearefull ſight for a fathers eyes. Two ſonnes at once in ſuch ſort dead. Yet what did Aaron? I pray your marke the Text. Aaron held his peace, ſaith the holy Ghoſt there. And what an example is this, if you care for any thing to ſtay your affections.

Laſt of all, conſider with your ſelfe, that your friend walketh with God, is gone to his fathers in peace, is gathered to his people, is not dead, but ſleepeth, and his fleſh reſteth in hope. He is gone the way of all fleſh, and behold now the face of God in heaven, and what cauſe of ſorrow is this to any friend that loved him? If your friend were preferred to an earthly Princes Court to his great good, would you ſhew your love in lamenting it? How much leſſe his preferment to Gods kingdome, to his immortall, everlaſting, and unſpeakeable good? If you will not verily warre againſt all truth and reaſon, and even God himſelfe, I know you will hearken to theſe things. The Lord in mercy give us uſe of them in time of need.

Objection.

But haply it is your child that is dead, and it died before it could be baptized. This grieveth you more than otherwiſe it would, and you feare your childs eſtate.

Anſwer.

Reade the notes upon the 17. of Geneſis, and I hope they ſhall content you for this matter. God is not tied to the Sacraments, neither ever was. The contempt damneth, but not the want, when it is againſt will. Reade more where I referre you now for brevity ſake.

Objection.

Haply your child of riper yeeres, ſo toward that it could not bee but hee ſhould have come to great preferment, if he had lived, both to his owne good, and his friends great comfort. And that he in his youth and flower ſhould be thus taken away, O bitter loſſe ſay you, &c.

Anſwer.

Anſwer.

True it is, the loſſe is greater in reſpect of the world, but what is that if wee conſider God. God is able to ſupply all that ſome other way if we take it well. This is apparent, that what comfort by him could have come to friends any way, or preferment to himſelfe if he had lived, the Lord for ſome purpoſe that as yet is happly hidden, hath prevented. But yet his arme is not ſhortned, as I ſaid, to do us good ſome other way. And as for his preferment, he is preferred to the higheſt heavens, to the preſence of God, with all the hoſt of heaven, and no earthly preferment could ever match this, if we ſavour any thing but earth our ſelves: his youth may not grieve us, for no youth too good for God, if he will have them. Youth and age indifferently the Lord taketh, and the times of all are in his hands, which they ſhall not paſſe, if you will be ruled to weigh things with reaſon, you may well ſee mercy even in this timely death. For many are the perils both of body and ſoule, that young men avoid when they are taken hence. Falſe doctrine, errors and hereſies, and many grievous ſinnes wounding the conſcience with a biting worme that ever gnaweth. Publike calamitie of ruines of ſtate bitterer to good men than any death. Private miſeries, many and grievous, that no man can thinke of before hand. From all which this happy deliverance in the time of youth, doth free your childe, and ſet him ſafe that you never ſhall mourne with him and for him. Nazianzene ſaid in his time truly, and you muſt thinke of it. Hoc nobis adfert longius vitæ ſpacium, quod plura mala partim videmus, partim ſuſtinemus, partim perpetramus: This bringeth a longer time of life unto us, that more evill we partly ſee, partly endure, and partly commit our ſelves. Which you ſee is ſmall good to any. And therefore no great cauſe we ſhould deſire many dayes in this world. Quem diligunt dii juvenis moritur: Whom the gods love, he dyeth a yong man, ſaid Menander. Et Deus ſæpe quos plurimi facit eos citius auferri vita: God whom he maketh moſt account of, thoſe he ſooneſt taketh, ſaid Euripides. The wiſe man alſo in his booke of wiſdome, ſpeaketh very well, and I pray you let him perſwade you ſomewhat in this point. The righteous, ſaith he, are prevented by death, that they may bee in reſt. He pleaſed God, and was beloved of him, ſo that where he lived among ſinners, he tranſlated him, he was taken away, leſt wickedneſſe ſhould alter his underſtanding, or deceit beguile his mind. For wickedneſſe, by bewitching, obſcureth the things that are good, and the unſtedfaſtneſſe of concupiſcence perverteth the ſimple mind. Though he was found dead, yet fulfilled he much time. For his ſoule pleaſed God, therefore haſted hee to take him away from wickedneſſe. The righteous that is dead, condemneth the ungodly which are living, and the youth that is ſoone brought to an end, the long life of the unrighteous. This is comfortable if you marke it, and is alſo confirmed by the Prophet Eſay, when he ſaith, the righteous are taken away from the evill to come. If truth then may ſtay you, being ſpoken by any, let this ſuffice.

Objection.

Haply his death was more ſudden than you did wiſh, and you are diſmaide with this.

Anſwer.

But be not ſo, further than cauſe is miniſtred, for feare you grieve God. The truth is this. The wicked that dye out of the true faith through a ſudden taking away, ſuch ſudden death is fearefull. But to one grafted into Chriſt by a lively faith, hoping ever by him, and onely by him, at his death to be ſaved, and living in a continuall expectation of that happy comfort, alwaies ready with oyle in lamp to meet the bridegroome, ſuch death yeeldeth to friends no cauſe of deſpaire, but rather comfort and cauſe of thanks to God for ſuch ſpeedy deliverance without paine and torment as many have. Such ſpeedy tranſlation and ſudden change ſhall they have that remaine alive at the laſt day: in a moment, and in the twinckling of an eye they ſhall be changed, and yet no danger or cauſe of feare, and is not God the ſame God now? Wherefore bee not diſmaide without cauſe. Many good men have beene thus taken, and yet good men and the Lords deare ones no doubt.

It is written of a godly Preacher, that having made a notable Sermon of the raiſing up of the womans ſonne of Naim by Chriſt, and by that occaſion, of the reſurrection and joyes of the life to come, to the great comfort of all that heard him: within three houres after himſelfe departed, being when he preached well and ſound. Not unlike to this is written of Luther and many others. Deſpaire you not then for this thing, neither make it an argument of Gods wrath. For we ſhall erre grievouſly if we do ſo. Onely conclude by it, and learne by it, how fraile the eſtate of our life is, and how good it is to be ever ready. If God give time, it is a ſweet bleſſing, and that wee ſhould pray for ever, but if God prevent any more haſtily, whom wee knew to hold the head Chriſt in their health time, enter not into Gods ſecrets by that occaſion. let him be judge in his owne matters himſelfe. Conceive you charitably and the beſt of all, and eſpecially of ſuch an one, leaving the falling of any to his owne Maſter.

Objection.

Dyed your friend in debt, leaving wife and children behind him in poore eſtate, ſo that your heart bleedeth to thinke of their miſery, and this is your griefe?

Anſwer.

Still, ſtill be patient I pray you, and drinke oft of the Lords fountaine ſome ſweet water to refreſh you even here alſo. I know this you ſpeake of is a great griefe, and biteth the heart, not onely of friends which remaine, but of the party himſelfe that dieth, while hee is living, to the very bottome. It goeth to bed with him, and riſeth againe with him, it lodgeth all night, and lieth all day in his boſome, pinching him every time hee waketh in the night, and every houre in the day, though hee ſeeme in face to have no much trouble in his mind, and alas, ſaith hee, how ſhall I doe? how will theſe neere ones and deare ones do when I am gone, if God ſhould call me away? Little I have, and even that ſhall be taken from them. My wife ſhall be forced to run headlong to her woe, beſtowing her ſelfe where ſhe affecteth not, for very need, having it often in her diſh to her dying day inſteed of better dainties, I tooke thee with nothing, thou ſhouldeſt have begged but for me, &c. My children ſhall either begge, or indure bitter ſorrow till they come to yeares, under ſome hard Maſters and Miſtreſſes that will bee bold upon them becauſe they releeve them, with a thouſand ſuch helliſh conceits that even teare a mans heart in ſunder, and eate him while he is alive. I know I ſay this, and ſuffer with you in this your griefe if this be it. I know alſo, that even this maketh many a man and woman more loath to die than otherwiſe they would be, wiſhing of God that they may live to be out of debt, and leave wife and children, friends and lovers free, though they leave them little beſide. And becauſe divers men have divers meanes to rid their debts by, ſome by leaſes and livings in reverſion, ſome by diſcharging every yeare a portion by ſuch helps as already they enjoy, every one wiſheth as his caſe is; Some, to live till thoſe leaſes come to them and theirs, til they may by ſuch yearly parcels acquit the whole, and ſo forth. Every one wiſhing life, and ſhrinking and ſhaking to thinke of death till this be ſo. To all which minds thus grieved and pinched, not I, but the ſpirit of comfort, with great comfort ſpeaketh often in the word moſt ſweet things, Caſt your care upon him, for he careth for you. As if he ſhould ſay, I know your woe and wofull thoughts, be not diſcouraged, neither faint in feare under this affliction, you have care in your heart, caſt it upon mee, and I will diſcharge it; what you cannot I can, and of my will be aſſured I doe care for you. 1 Pet. 5. 7.

O my God what ſayeſt thou? Doeſt thou care for me? And ſhall I remove it from my ſelfe to thy Majeſty, and lay it all upon thee? So indeed thou ſpeakeſt, mine eyes ſee, and mine eares heare. Why ſo then indeed will I both beleeve and doe moſt deare Father, and groveling here in the duſt before thee, bleſſe thee and praiſe thee for eaſing my ſoule of ſo ſowre a ſop. From mee upon thee be my care hereafter, my ſweeteſt God, and as thou haſt ſpoken, do for mee and mine I beſeech thee for Jeſus Chriſt his ſake.

In like ſort ſpeaketh the Prophet David, Caſt thy burthen upon the Lord, and hee ſhall nouriſh thee. He will not ſuffer the righteous to fall for ever. Conſider the Ravens, ſaith our Saviour Chriſt, how they neither ſow nor reape, how they have neither ſtore-houſe nor barne, and yet God feedeth them. How much are ye better than fowles. Conſider the Lilies of the field how they grow, they neither labor nor ſpin, and yet Salomon himſelfe in all his royalty was not cloathed like one of theſe. If then God ſo cloath the graſſe, which is to day in the field, and to morrow is caſt into the oven, how much more will he cloath you, O yee of little faith? What can mans thoughts profit him? Which of you, ſaith our Saviour, by taking of thought can adde to his ſtature one cubit. If then by taking of thought you be not able to doe the leaſt thing, why take ye thought for the remnant? Pſal. 55. 22. Luke 12. 22.

What then concludeth our Saviour there? Surely even thus, your heavenly Father knoweth that yee have need of theſe things. As if he ſhould ſay, let this ſtay you and ſtrengthen you, ſatisfie and content you evermore, that God, and God your Father, knoweth your caſe, what you and yours from time to time, and ever are in need of: a naturall Father upon earth, cannot ſuffer his ſonne to ſinke, when hee knoweth and is able. And can a kind God doe it, that both knoweth and is moſt able? It cannot be. O ſtrange comfort then drawne from Gods knowledge, how overwhelmeth it all that ever fearfull man can object? I am unworthie. True. My debts be great. Be it ſo. The creditors cruell and mercileſſe. Grant it. My ſelfe friendleſſe and ſhiftleſſe, or ſuch like. Whatſoever it is, ſinke it, ſaith Chriſt, with this, your heavenly Father knoweth. And deſpaire you of helpe when he faileth to know, not before I charge you, but take it at my hands as a ſequell ſure, he knoweth, therefore hee will provide in fit time for all things, and his care ſhall doe what yours never can, both for you and yours if you commit it to him him, and onely caſt your owne care chiefly upon this, to ſeeke his kingdome, and the righteouſneſſe thereof. Sweet is the comfort, and ſweet is his mercy, that ſo ſaith. And therfore now when you feele theſe thoughts ariſe, what ſhall become of you and yours. Lord ſay, thou knoweſt my full diſtreſſe, in thy knowledge thou haſt willed me wholly to reſt, and upon the ſame and from the ſame to conclude my comfort, thou wilt provide according to thy knowledge to relieve my want when thy good pleaſure ſhall be, which I muſt expect and tarry for in ſure faith and Chriſtian patience as I will.

Ever againe in ſuch griefes as theſe, we ſhould remember the promiſe of the Lord, that he is our God, and the God of our ſeed. The children we have are his gift, the wife of our boſome is from his providence. Hee will never forſake his owne, nor give over to nouriſh whom hee hath created, and hitherto by our ſelves provided for. And therefore feare not, but if hee take you away, hee will give ſome other good meanes to performe his promiſe by, he is your God, and their God after you, and he will not faile. In the very matter we ſpeake of ſee experience, and be comforted with it. In the Booke of the Kings you have this Story. That the husband dyed, being one of the ſons of the Prophets, and a man that feared God. Hee dyed in debt, and left his poore children to the cruelty of the Creditor, that came full fiercely to take them from their Mother, to anſwer the debt by bondage. A heavy croſſe to a man that feared God; To live in debt, and die in debt, when debt to his poore ones was ſo dangerous. Yet thus it was, that we may not be diſcouraged our ſelves, or others bee over heady to cenſure too farre if the like befall us. Happely this man might wiſh to live till he had payed his debt, as you doe. And with condition of Gods liking it was but well, if he did ſo. For a man is bound to his Family. But it pleaſed not God. He dyed and left the debt unpaid. And the Creditors will bee anſwered, as I ſaid, with the bodies of his poore babes, which hee left with a poore mother behind him. How now ſhall this wofull widow and fatherleſſe children doe? O comfort! And O God, the true God of thy ſervants, and of their ſeed they leave behind them! The true God of the widow and fatherleſſe. Now ſee what hee doth. Now ſee if hee faile to provide for that thing that he knew this poore mother had need of, for her ſelfe and her children. He directeth his Prophet to bid her, and himſelfe by his powerfull mercy, and moſt merciſull power, ſo increaſed that little Oyle which ſhe had in a Cruſe, that it paied her Creditors, and yeelded her maintenance further for her and hers, to their unſpeakeable comfort. You know the Story. Then this behold and thinke of, and this write in the palmes of your hands that you never forget it. God is not the God of this man alone, or of his widow and children which he left behind him, but he is your God, and our God, and a God to all that depend upon him. If you may live to free things your ſelfe it is to be wiſhed, and you may with condition aske it. But if you cannot, God pleaſing to have it otherwiſe, grieve not to depart, leſt you appeare to tie God to your providence, life and meanes, when you ſee by this example what he can doe when you are gone. And not what he can do, but what he ſhall doe, if you waver not but beleeve. God was to this woman inſteed of her husband, and better farre; ſo ſhall he be to your wife. God was to theſe children in ſteed of their father, and better farre, ſo ſhall he be to yours. God was executor and paid the debt, God was over-ſeer, and all was well.

Friends neither wanted or failed both mother or children, but God was a friend in the greateſt need, that moſt fully and mercifully performed all, and ſuffered not the care of his deceaſed ſervant to be uncared for, nor uncomforted. It is enough then. Grieve not to die if the Lord will have it ſo. But leave all to him, and remember his promiſes, together with this practice. He ſhall never forſake you, nor faile you. What is unpaid he ſhall pay as ſhall be beſt, and hee ſhall effect what you cannot thinke of, to give teſtimony of their mercy to you and yours. He is not tied to your leaſes and livings when they ſhall deſcend unto you. If he pleaſe he will uſe them, if not, hee can well want them, and pay all, and ſet up the poore fatherleſſe child even with the Rulers of the people, as he hath done in all ages. Much more may you marke in Scripture to this end, if you read it carefully. Let this ſuffice now. And thus have I given you a taſte how you may plead with your ſelfe againſt your fault if you be uncomfortable for the death of friends. This is the Lords word and his eternall truth able to ſtay you, if you be not too heady and wilfull, and I hope it ſhall.

CYPRIANS Sermon of mortality.

IF I ſhould note unto you the ſpeeches of men, I might make a long book. For many worthy men in their times have ſpoken and written moſt comfortably of this matter which now wee ſpeake of. But I would the word ſhould be our chiefe ſtay ever. Therefore I will be ſparing in this thing, and yet ſome thing out of many, that you may ſee in them the practice of that which now your ſelfe are to performe. And by name out of this good Sermon of Cyprian: Ejus eſt mortem timere qui ad Chriſtum nolit ire: ejus eſt ad Chriſtum nolle ire, qui non credit ſe cum Chriſto incipere regnare: It is for him to feare death, that is unwilling to goe to Chriſt: and it is for him to bee unwilling to goe to Chriſt, that beleeveth not when hee dyeth hee beginneth to raigne with Christ. Quis non ad lætitiam venire festinet? Quis non tristitia carere optet? Who would not haste to come to joy, and who would not joy to want woe? But this workes death, therefore, &c.

Abraham, ut Deo placeret, nec amittere filium timuit, nec quærere parricidium recusavit: Abraham, that hee might please God, neither feared to lose his sonne, nor refused to slay him with his owne hands. (Your case is not such, &c.) How can we pray thy will be done, and yet strive against the same in the death of friends. Quid rogamus & petimus adveniat regnum cœlorum, si captivitas terrena delectat? Why pray we and begge we thy Kingdome come, if earthly captivity please us better? Non amittuntur, sed præmittuntur: Our friends when they die, are not lost but sent before us. We should not weare blacke garments for them when they weare white. Wee should give no occasion justly to the Gentiles to reproove us, Quod quos vivere apud Deum dicimus, ut extinctos & perditos lugeamus, & fidem quam sermone & voce depromimus, cordis & pectoris testimonio reprobemus: that whom we say to live with God, we lament as lost and perished, and so overthrow by action, that faith which with mouth and word we professe. Nihil prodest verbis proferre virtutem, & factis destruere veritatem: It profiteth nothing in words to speake of power, and with deeds to overthrow the truth. Cum mundus oderit Christianum, quid amas eum qui te odit, & non magis sequeris Christum qui te redimit & eligit? Sith the world hateth a Christian, why loves thou that which hateth thee, and followest not rather Christ that redeemed thee, and loveth thee indeed? Who would not be gladly out of a house that tottereth and shaketh every houre, like to fall upon his head? Such is this world, &c.

Quis non peregre constitutus properet in patriam regredi, &c? Who being in a strange Countrey would not haste to be at home in his owne? Who going to ship, doth not wish for a prosperous winde that quickly he may be with his friends? Heaven is our country, the Patriarks be our Parents, why haste we not then to salute such friends, &c.

Ambrose hath written a booke of the good of death, with many moe, if this course might profit you. By all which, I pray you consider how they were comforted when God tooke away their friends, or when themselves had thoughts of their owne departure. God is the same that ever hee was, heaven is as glorious, and earth as wretched as ever they were. If they then were glad when either themselves or their friends were to enjoy the one, and to leave the other, what should it be that should hinder us from the like comfort? Nothing of a truth, but either want of such knowledge, or such obedience to knowledge as they had. Both which are such faults, as ought speedily to pricke us to amendment. Conclude then with your heart that you will be strong, pray to the Giver that you may be strong, and leave your losse to the Lord your God that hath gained him, blessed for him, and blessed for you, with many thankes for ever and ever. Amen.

A Prayer for a Familie in the Morning.

Most gracious God and loving Father, the very comfort that any sinfull soule can have, when wee miserable sinners here mette together, doe consider of the great mercy and goodnesse, that wee have ever since wee were borne, and before found, and daily doe finde at thy Majesties hands, together with our great unkindnesse shewed every way to thee againe, for the same, wee must needs confesse, and even doe from the very bottome of our hearts acknowledge, that marvelous is thy mercy in sparing us still to live, and in not consuming us away from the earth, and from before thee. For hast not thou, O deare God, of thy free mercy, before the foundations of the world were laid, chosen and elected us for thy children, when others as good as we by nature shal burn in Hell eternally, being rejected of thee in that hidden counsell of thine. Hast not thou to our endlesse comfort certified, and made knowne unto our spirits the same? Hast thou not created us neither Beasts, Toades, Wormes, or any such like ugly Creatures, but in thine owne Image, according to thy likenesse, to rule over the Fishes in the Sea, over the Fowles of the Heaven, and over every thing that mooveth upon the Earth? And when being thus created innocent, yet wee persisted not in the same, but fell into the curse that bringeth eternall death, didst thou not so pitie us, as that for our redemption and safety, thou grudgedst not unto us, and for us to be powred out the heart blood of Jesus Christ thy onely Sonne our Saviour, no,

no other meanes being, wherby we could be saved? Hast thou not by thy holy Spirit wrought faith in our hearts to beleeve by him, and for him to be justified before thee? Hast thou not in some measure begun the death of sin in us, and wrought our sanctification. Injoy we not the benefits of thy word? The freedom of conscience, great peace and plenty in outward things, with many and infinite benefits more, waking and sleeping, at home and abroad, in our selves, and our friends? For all which, O good Lord, what do we? Are we thankfull unto thee for them? Doe wee often think of them, and labour to know thee and to serve thee with a perfect heart and a willing minde for them? No, no, deare God, we do not, we doe not as we ought to do. But with pleasure or profit, with vanity or self-love, we are carried away, spend our dayes in iniquity, careless and unfeeling of our sin, and there is no goodness in us: yet there is mercy with thee, O Lord, and pardon to repentance. Wherefore we all here meete together at this time before thy Majesty, humbly confessing our wants, most intirely beseech thee for Jesus Christ his sake to have mercy upon us: have mercy upon us, most mercifull father, and forgive us all that is past, strengthen us hereafter, that daily both in body and soule, we may glorifie thee more than we have done, yeelding thanks dayly for dayly benefits, and striving in holinesse and righteousnesse all the dayes of our life. But because wee cannot but offend and fall divers wayes, good Lord, for thy mercies sake pierce our hearts with a feeling of the same, and never suffer us to go on with dull and dead soules, nor seeing or sighing for our offences. As a speciall means to keep us in obedience before thee: O dear Father, worke in us a continuall, and an effectuall remembrance, that we shall not alwaies live here in the show of this wretched world, that doth so please us now, but that a day will come, when the trump shall sound, the dead shall arise, and all wee shall appeare before thy Tribunall Seat of judgement, there to receive according to our deeds without respect of persons. O good Lord, give us a remembrance and feeling of the unspeakable comfort, and eternall weight of glory, which in that day shall be given unto us, if in this life we serve and please thee. And contrariwise, even terrifie our consciences, and let us as it were see before our faces, the dreadfull judgements, and the fearfull torments, that both in body and soule they shall bee sure to have for evermore in the pit of hell, which in this life doe not serve and please thee, but follow their owne fancies and wicked delights. Give us a hatred of sin, and a true love of righteousnesse. Blesse thy word evermore with fruit unto our soules when we doe heare it, give us a desire to heare it often. Remove, O Lord, in thy good time, such hinderances of the fruit thereof, as are amongst us, give it full course, and send forth labourers into thy harvest, which not for filthy lucre and gaine, but of love and zeale to thee and thy people may preach thy word sincerely. Blesse us, O Lord, from all hypocrisie, glozing and halting before thee. And because we little know how soone thou shalt send this pampered flesh of ours to the Wormes, stop our breath, and call away for our soules to come unto thee, whether this day or no before the evening, blessed Father, for Jesus Christs his sake, prepare and make us ready for thee, that when the houre commeth we may neither feare, nor faint in faith, but joyfully, without any skrikes and cryes of desperation, and of a troubled and vexed conscience, passe away in full hope and assurance, that all our sins are wiped away in the blood of Jesus Christ, and we to thee in him so reconciled, that life for evermore is certaine unto us. Last of all, good Father, with most humble and hearty thankes for thy goodnesse to us this night, let thy mercifull eye looke upon us this day, and so keepe us body and soule, that being occupied in our severall callings we may be safe by thee from all our enemies, and live to thee, or die to thee, as it best shall please thy gracious goodnes. These things, O Lord, and whatsoever else we have need of, grant us, for Christ his sake, in whose Name we aske them, saying, as he hath taught us.

forgive us our treſpaſſes,as we forgive them that treſpaſſe againſt us, and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evill, Amen.

Let thy mighty hand and out-ſtretched arme, O Lord, be ſtill our defence, thy mercy and loving kindneſſe in Jeſus Chriſt our ſalvation, thy true and holy word our inſtruction, thy grace and holy Spirit our comfort and conſolation unto the end, and in the end. Amen.

The Lord bleſſe us and ſave us, the Lord make his face to ſhine upon us, and be mercifull unto us, the Lord turne his favourable countenance towards us, and this day and evermore vouchſafe to ſend us peace, Amen.

The bleſſing of God Almighty, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, bee amongſt us and remain with us both now and ever, Amen.

Another of the ſame for night.

O Immortall God, Creator of Heaven and Earth, before whom all creatures feare and tremble, were it not that thou haſt commanded us, never durſt we appeare before thee, ſo corrupt is our nature, and ſo many are our ſinnes. But good Lord thou doſt bid, and therefore we obey: thou doſt call, and therefore we come, give us Spirits to pray aright. Firſt then here met together deare Father,we yeeld thy Majeſty moſt humble and hearty thankes, for all thy mercies that ever thou haſt beſtowed upon us,in body or minde,in our ſelves or ours,private or common,temporal,or eternal. Many and marvellous have they been,and ſtill are upon us; yea, even good Lord, paſt finding out. This day what thou haſt done for us, which of us knoweth, or is able to expreſſe? Father of heaven forgive us,that we cannot acknowledge them, or praiſe thee for them as wee ought, and quicken us in this duty more and more. Pardon and forgive us whatſoever we have offended thee withall this day, or ever before, either in thought, word, or deed: yea even our ſecret ſinnes, ſuch as wee have committed and know not of, remit them unto us for Chriſts ſake. Change us, O Lord, and we ſhall be changed. Create in us cleane hearts,and renew a right ſpirit within us.

Break the ſtrength of ſin,that would ſubdue us more and more. And O mercifull Father, ſo frame theſe hearts of ours with us, that wee may more delight to live according to thy will,than to enjoy all the world,and all the pleaſures therin. Lay it often good Lord,before our eyes by thy remembring Spirit, that thou haſt not breathed the breath of life into us,that we ſhould live as we liſt,but that in holineſſe and righteouſneſſe we ſhould walk before thee all our dayes. Lay it before us, O Lord, that the time will come when the trumpe ſhall ſound, the dead ſhall riſe, and we, even we here met together at this time, all and every one of us, ſhall moſt aſſuredly ſtand before thy judgement ſeat, with naked hearts, with open and unfolded conſciences, there to give an account how wee have ſo done. In which day, O the joy! O the endleſſe joy that they ſhall have, who waining themſelves from the gliſtering ſhew of this wretched world, in heart & truth have ſought and ſerved thee! Come, Come, ye bleſſed of my Father, to their comfort ſhall they heare, and poſſeſſe the kingdome prepared for you. But woe, woe to all careleſſe livers in that fiery day, they ſhall drink the Wine of the wrath of God, bee tormented in fire and brimſtone before the holy Angels, and before the Lambe, they ſhall have no reſt day nor night, and the ſmoake of their torment ſhall aſcend for evermore. Father of heaven have mercy upon us, knit theſe hearts of ours faſt unto thee, and now, while we have time, give us grace wiſely to thinke of theſe things. O continue thy word of truth amongſt us ever to our comfort. Let the ſeed thereof now ſowne in our hearts, take ſuch deepe root, that neither the burning heat of perſecution cauſe it to wither, nor the thorny cares of this world, riches, or voluptuous living choke it, but as ſeed ſowne in good ground, it may bring forth fruit according to thy pleaſure. O Father give grace, that when wee heare, or finde by thy word any ſin that is in us touched, we may ſtrive and ſtudy without delay willingly to reform it. Keep us good God, that we never ſwarve for the feare of man from our owne true knowledge, becomming ſervers of time, and denyers of thee. Keepe us from all hardneſſe of heart, contempt of thy word, and from all diſſembling of ſincerity, increaſe true love amongſt us more and more, ſtay our heady, wrathfull and wicked affections more and more. And every way good Lord renew us to thy liking. Bleſſe thy whole Church, O God, with graces neceſſary, this parcell of it, our Native Land and Countrey, deare Father bleſſe it ſtill with continuance of thy truth. Leſſen in it daily the number of blinde and wilfull Papiſts, prophane Atheiſts, and increaſe the number of thy true Children. O preſſe us not deare God, with the weight of our ingratitude, whoſe lives and knowledge anſwer not the dayes that we have had: worke with us hence forward for thy mercy ſake. Preſerve unto us long alive good Lord, our gracious Prince and Governour, multiply thy Spirit unto him, that ſtill more and more he may ſeeke and ſet out, keepe and maintaine that which pleaſeth thee. Give unto his honourable Councell graces neceſſary for ſo high a calling. Bleſſe all other Nobles, Magiſtrates, and the whole body of this Realm, with true hearts to thee and this Countrey. Increaſe in Iſrael the number of true Watchmen, whoſe hearts may ſeek thee, and thy people, and not their owne glory and commodity. Bring to thy fold by them, ſuch wandring remnants as are thine, and O Lord, be gracious to our kindred and friends in the fleſh, lighten their hearts with the Sun of underſtanding, that they and we acknowledging one truth, may glorifie thee in the true and conſtant profeſſion of the ſame all the dayes of our life. Comfort O Chriſt, thine afflicted members, whereſoever or howſoever troubled, and grant us peace if it be thy pleaſure in our dayes. Finally, becauſe the night is now upon us, and we ready to take our reſt, let the bed O Lord, ſtrike into our heart, that the grave is almoſt ready for us. Which of us can tell, whether theſe eyes of ours once cloſed up, ſhall ever open any more againe or no? Lord therefore receive us into thine hands, wee all here now commend our ſelves, body and ſoule we bequeath unto thee, keepe us this night and evermore ready for thee, when thou ſhalt call us. Heare us O Lord, O God, and Father mercifull in theſe our petitions for thy Son Chriſt Jeſus ſake our Saviour, in whoſe Name we altogether beg theſe mercies, ſaying:

OVr Father which art in Heaven, hallowed be thy Name, thy Kingdome come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven, give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our treſpaſſes, as we forgive them that treſpaſſe againſt us, and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evill, Amen.

Let thy mighty hand and out-ſtretched arme, O Lord, be ſtill our defence, thy mercy and loving kindneſſe in Jeſus Chriſt our ſalvation, thy true and holy word our inſtruction, thy grace and holy Spirit our comfort and conſolation unto the end, and in the end. Amen.

The Lord bleſſe us and ſave us, the Lord make his face to ſhine upon us, and be mercifull unto us, the Lord turne his favourable countenance towards us, and ſend us ever his peace, Amen.

The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the love of God the Father, the moſt comfortable fellowſhip of the Holy Ghoſt, be with us all, bleſſe us and keepe us this night and for evermore. Amen.

The Concluſion of this Booke, containing an Exhortation to all Eſtates, to prepare themſelves to dye well, leſt the uncertaine houre of Death take them at unawares.

FVrthermore, my Brethren and friends, it reſteth that this Book be not in your hands, but in your hearts, and that if we have any will to amend our lives, that the ſame be not put off untill to morrow, for when to morrow ſhall become, we yet deferre it untill the day following; and ſo conſequently, we ſhall ſtay untill the yeares end: yea, even untill our lives end. If then at this preſent time there bee ſome little good affection in us, let us not quench it, nor kill that grace which the Lord giveth us; but contrariwiſe, by all meanes poſſible, let us endeavour to do ſo, that from time to time the ſame be not only confirmed, but alſo increaſed in us. God is merciſull and liberall enough to grant our requeſts, but he will be importuned, and earneſtly called upon, not for his own ſake, but for ours: for he knoweth how ſlow and backward we are to pray and call upon him, and how ſoone wee are weary, although there be nothing in this world that ought to be more acceptable unto us, for it is not a ſmall thing to ſpeake unto God. And that which ought yet to ſtir us up more hereunto, is, that he willingly heareth us, and never putteth away thoſe that come unto him with a true heart. This I ſay, becauſe I ſee not that by any other better meanes we may prevent our confuſion, than by our Prayers and ſupplications unto God.

This book to be in our hearts not in our hands.

Not to deferre amendment of life.

To pray often and earneſtly.

God willingly heareth us.

Truly, if ever any men had need of this help, we have moſt need thereof now in theſe laſt times and old age of the world, for no doubt but Satan now ſetteth abroach all his weapons, ſeeing the time approach that he cannot doe that he hath done heretofore, and that the Son of God muſt be manifeſted to all creatures, and that then muſt be the perfection of the faithfull, and the end of their felicity, whereof hee knoweth right well that hee ſhall have no part.

This old age of the world moſt requireth prayer.

If then for his part he doe his uttermoſt, it reſteth that we doe the like, and be alſo defended with all the heavenly armour, and that we be not terrified with all theſe practices and ſleights, for truly the victory is in our hands, if ſo be that we fight againſt him, and not for him, as almoſt all the world doth at this day, although it ſeeme contrary to the greater part: for, ſo that they be called Chriſtians, and be without reproach before men, who are no better than they, it ſeemeth unto them that they are moſt aſſured.

Other thinke that there needeth but one good ſigh, as they ſay, at the laſt houre, to blot out all their life paſt, and to cary them ſtraight to the kingdome of heaven: but who can aſſure them, that God will give them grace ſo to ſigh, and to repent truly of their ſinnes at the houre of death? From whence have they ſuch good aſſurance not to die of a ſudden death? Is not this plainly to mock God? If that might take place, truly Peter and Paul, with the other Apoſtles, ſhould have been deceived in travelling and taking ſuch paines to beare ſo heavy a croſſe, if it were ſo eaſie to enter into the kingdome of heaven: I mean ſo as theſe Libertines doe pretend.

Wicked ſecurity dangerous.

Let us be ſure, that the way is narrow that leadeth to ſalvation, and that there are few that walke therein. Theſe words are not lies, but I pray God that we prove not the truth to our great griefe. I know that the mercy of God is incomprehenſible and infinite, but that is towards his Servants, and thoſe that feare and reverence him. Furthermore, I know right well, that amongſt the Children and Servants of God, there are many infirmities; yea, a moſt great imperfection in all vertue and righteouſneſſe, which remaineth untill death, but there is a difference between your life, O you worldlings, and that of the Children of God. The righteous ſinneth ſeaven times a day, but hee is lift up ſeaven times againe. But you remaine in your ſins, and dwell therewith, as with your friend and companion. A man may well ſay a Confiteor, knock himſelf on his breaſt, or have ſome griefe at his ſin, but if we look neere unto the matter, we ſhall finde it is nothing but kery and hypocriſie.

Gods mercy is infinit towards his Servants.

If our friend or kinſman die, if we loſe our goods, if one doe us any injury, if one ſlander our good name, if we be beaten, buffetted, or hurt, behold, we are ſtraight in choler, or in extreame ſadneſſe, our heart is ſhut up with melancholy. But if our ſpirit die, or that we loſe the heavenly riches by our ſins and tranſgreſſions, wee make no account, wee are not troubled: we grieve more at the loſſe of this world, which is nothing, than at the loſſe of God himſelfe, who is all in all.

In ſeeing all this, cannot ſuch people yet feele their owne griefe? Can they not know how vaine and fooliſh the opinion which they had of their owne vertue and honeſty is? Can they not ſee how far they are from their reckoning? Truly all the world is full of ſuch people, who have no ſenſe or feeling of their evils, but the prophecies muſt be accompliſhed to the end, that when the Son of man ſhall come, he may ſcarce finde any Faith upon the earth. Truly this houre commeth on apace, the ſights are all manifeſt, but to the end we may not be amazed, ſeeing ſuch a diſorder come about us, let us be ſure, that the Lord will be with us untill the end of the world, if ſo be our Lampes be burning, and that in ſtead of the daily impairing of the wicked, we labour and take paines to grow and increaſe in righteouſneſſe and holineſſe, I know that they will mock at us and at our ſimplicity, and that they will caſt us out of their companies, but we ſhall be exalted of God, and received into the aſſembly of the bleſſed.

The Lord will be with us unto the end, if we grow and increaſe in holineſſe and righteouſneſſe.

Wherefore, let us with all patience waite for the comming of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, and let us labour that we may be found of him without ſpot, and blameleſſe. Surely, that day ought to be fearefull to the wicked, but of us it ſhould be moſt deſired, knowing aſſuredly that there is no condemnation to thoſe that are in Ieſus Chriſt, and his great kindneſſe and meekneſſe, when he commeth to make us alive with him for ever. Amen.

They wait for the Lord with patience.

A SERMON PREACHED AT PAVLS CROSSE.

JOHN 6. 37.

All that the Father giveth me, ſhall come unto me, and him that commeth to me, I caſt not away.

IN the Verſe before (Right Honourable, and beloved in the Lord all) we heare our Saviour Chriſt affirme of the Capernaites, that they alſo, amongſt others, had ſeene him, but beleeved not. The reaſon is implyed in theſe words which I have read, becauſe they were not given of the Father. For, All that the Father giveth me (ſaith our Saviour in this Text) commeth unto me, and him that cometh to me, I caſt not away. So is this verſe (I ſay) a reaſon of the former, and we plainly ſee it, added of our Saviour Chriſt in his moſt deepe wiſedome, to anſwer both then, and whilſt the world endureth, for the unbeliefe of many which contemne the Goſpell, that it ought not, as it often is, be a ſtumbling block to any, to make them miſlike or doubt of Gods truth, becauſe many reject the ſame, and cannot bee won to regard and follow it as they ought. For they that ſo do, and continue, are not given to Chriſt of the Father, and being not given, they come not, it being an effect of the Fathers giving, to come to the Sonne, as witneſſeth our Saviour both in this place, and elſewhere, when he ſaith; Hee that is of God, heareth Gods Word; ye therefore heare them not, becauſe ye are not of God. Againe, But ye beleeve not, becauſe ye are not of my ſheepe. And thirdly, As many as were ordained to eternall life, beleeved: [as many as were ordained,] with divers ſuch places, all proving, as I ſay, that to come to Chriſt by faith, proceedeth as an effect from the Fathers giving of us to Chriſt by election.

Iohn 8.47. Iohn 10.26. Acts 13.48.

A Doctrine, if ever neceſſary, now ſurely moſt neceſſary, when the fearefull contempt of Gods Word, that ruleth in many, either is, or may be a ſtumbling blocke to weake mindes that judge not perſons by faith, but faith by perſons, as Lactantius ſpeaketh, not knowing, or elſe not weighing this point of Gods ſacred truth, that they onely beleeve which are ordained, which are of God, which are ſheep, or as this Text ſpeaketh, which are given to the Sonne by the Father. Which becauſe many, yea, the moſt part of men are not, therefore they beleeve not, neither imbrace that thing, which in it ſelfe yet is worthy all love and following. Neceſſary I ſay to theſe weake ones, that they may learne not to fall away from goodneſſe for this cauſe: and neceſſary to theſe unbeleeving contemners, to awake them, to looke how this contempt taketh any roote in them, leſt haply it bee, by their rejection from God, becauſe they are not of the number of them, whom the Father hath given to his Sonne, to be ſaved of him, and by him, and in him, in his judging day.

Acts 13.48. Iohn 8.47. Iohn 10.26.

Purpoſing then by the Lords aſſiſtance, and your godly patience to ſay ſomething of this matter; matter; let the order for me to ſpeake, and you to heare, be the ſelf-ſame, which the Holy Ghoſt directeth us unto in the Text.

First, of the Fathers giving.
Secondly of their comming that are given.
Thirdly, of the entertainment with Chriſt, that they finde, which being given, doe come. [Non ejicio,] I caſt not away.

1 Part.

COncerning the firſt, to wit, the Fathers giving, contained in theſe words, [All that the Father giveth me,] a learned writer ſaith thus: Quos Pater dedit prædeſtinatione, veniunt per fidem, & tales non ejicit Chriſtus; Whom the Father giveth by predeſtination, thoſe come to Chriſt by faith, and he caſteth not away ſuch commers. Making this giving of the Father to bee nothing elſe but his eternall election, and appointment unto life of ſuch as he will have ſaved in Chriſt, and by Chriſt. And indeed ſo it is. Dat enim Chriſto Pater, cum eligit in Chriſto tanquã in capite, in quo omnia membra ſalva erunt: The Father giveth to Chriſt when he electeth in Chriſt, as in the head, in whom all the members ſhall be ſaved. Proofes of Scripture are the grounds of grounds, to direct both my ſpeech and your faith; and of thoſe I could remember you of many, if it were needfull. But the ſeventeenth of Iohn ſhall ſuffice us for all, where it is ſaid: I have declared thy name unto the men whom thou gaveſt me; thine they were, & thou gaveſt them me. I pray not for the world, but for them whom thou haſt given me. Holy Father keepe them whom thou haſt given me. Them whom thou gaveſt me I have kept. Over and over repeating this word you ſee, and ever by the ſame, noting Gods election of his ſervants and children appointed to bee ſaved. Therefore this expoſition is plaine not onely by teſtimonies of Interpreters, but by conference and witneſſe of Scriptures themſelves.

The Fathers giving is our election.

Verſe 6. Verſe 9. Verſe 11. Verſe 12.

So then the Doctrine of Gods Election is the firſt point, that to day we are occaſioned by this text to ſpeake and heare of, it being meant by the word [giving,] as I have ſhewed.

A Doctrine as you well know, that both heretofore hath, and even yet ſtill is of ignorant mindes avoided, as a dangerous Doctrine, judged not fit to be ſpoken of, except it be in ſchooles, and charged with many wicked inconveniences, as flowing from the affirmation thereof. The Epiſtles of Proſper and Hilary prefixed before the bookes of Auguſtine, De prædeſtinatione Sanctorum, will juſtifie what I ſay, inſtead of many moe which might bee brought. What others of later time, and eſpecially Papiſts, have both written and daily ſpeake, would be too tedious to obſerve.

Whatſoever they were or are, old or new, this is moſt certaine, they conſider not,

Either the duty of Gods Miniſters and Children:
Or the great evidence of Scripture for this Doctrine:
Or the ſweet uſe of it to many ſpeciall purpoſes.

For all theſe doe ſhew, that the Doctrine in no caſe is to be avoided, but both ſpoken and heard of, as occaſion ſhall ſerve, to Gods great glory, and his true ſervants ſweet comfort.

And firſt for our duty. Thinke of it I pray you. Surely it is this: Vt arcana non inveſtigare, ita revelata non occultare & ſupprimere; as not to ſearch the ſecrets of God which are not revealed: ſo not to ſuppreſſe and hide what is revealed: for, ſo teacheth us Moſes, if you remember when he ſaith; The ſecret things belong to the Lord our God, but the things revealed belong to us, and to our children for ever, that we may doe all the words of the Law.

Our duty bindeth us to conſider this Doctrine. Deut. 29. 29.

Againe, it is our duty to eſteeme of the Lord and his Word thus, that as he hath omitted nothing that is needfull to bee knowne, ſo hath hee laid downe nothing but what ought to bee knowne, and is moſt profitable. But he hath laid downe this doctrine of our election, therefore neceſſary to be taught and looked into of all men.

A ſecond reaſon.

Thirdly, it is the duty of all faithfull Miniſters to preach the Goſpell wholly to Gods people, and to deliver unto them even all the counſell of God: But this Doctrine is a part of the contents of this Booke of God, therefore to be delivered to Gods people, as occaſion ſhall ſerve, or elſe wee doe not our duties.

A third reaſon.

And leſt any man ſhould diſtinguiſh of Gods people, and ſay, ſome bee learned, ſome bee unlearned, the one may be thus preached unto, but not the other, conſider I pray you, the words of our Saviour Chriſt, Goe and preach the Goſpell [omni creaturæ] to all creatures, evidently giving the ſimpler ſort as good right to the whole Doctrine of his Word as the better; and the unlearned, as the learned. Which the faithfull Apoſtle well knew, when he ſaid: I am a debtor both to the Græcians and Barbarians, both to the wiſe men and to the unwiſe.

Rom. 1. 14.

If any man will ſay: yet a care muſt be had of mens capacities, and of edification, I confeſſe

it willingly, and therefore have alwayes added (as occaſion ſerveth) that is, as ſhall be fit for the people to whom we ſpeake, going by degrees in all our doctrine as may moſt profit, and ever ſoberly and carefully keeping within the limits of the word. But utterly to ſuppreſſe & alwayes to avoid any truth revealed in the Booke of God, or by name, this truth of our Election and Predeſtination, I ſay it is not lawfull, but the contrary a parcell of our bounden duty both to God, our ſelves and our brethren.

In the ſecond place they conſider as little the evidence of Scripture for this doctrine, as they have done before our duties. For, I may boldly ſay, there is no one thing more plainly and fully teſtified in the Word than this is, being often iterated and beaten upon in ſundry places. That a thing often ſpoken of might at one time or other be duly marked and borne away. Evidence of Scripture.

First, the Doctrine, then the Branches.

The Doctrine it ſelfe is laid downe in this ſort: That as the clay lyeth before the Potter, to bee uſed and handled, diſpoſed of and formed, as ſhall pleaſe him; ſo were all men at firſt before the Lord in his eternall counſell, to receive an end or uſe according to his will, to life or death, to honour or diſhonour, to ſalvation or damnation, to heaven or hell. In which good pleaſure of his (ever the rule of right) he hath diſpoſed of ſome one way, of ſome another: It being his glory in his houſe alſo, to have veſſels of divers ſorts, and not of all to one uſe. Of many Scriptures ſome few ſhall ſerve. First, for the Doctrine.

First, the teſtimony of the Apoſtle, who ſaith to the Romans: that, Whom he hath predeſtinate, them alſo he called; and whom he called, them alſo he juſtified; and whom he juſtified, them alſo he glorified. Boldly avouching this doctrine which ſome make ſo dangerous, with all the degrees and ſequels of the ſame. Rom. 8. 30.

In the ninth Chapter hee maketh expreſſe mention of Veſſels of mercy prepared to glory, and veſſels of wrath prepared to deſtruction. To the Epheſians hee ſaith, He hath choſen us in him, he hath predeſtinate us to be adopted, &c. In the Goſpell he ſees often two ſorts of men, one to whom it was given to underſtand the ſecrets of the kingdome of heaven; another to whom it was not given: one ſort to whō it ſhall be ſaid, Come ye bleſſed; another ſort to whom it ſhould be ſaid, Goe ye curſed. Behold againe, ſaith old Simeon, This Child is appointed for the fall and riſing of many in Iſrael. Therfore two ſorts there are in the counſell of God, one muſt riſe, and the other muſt fall, being ſo appointed. Eſau and Iacob, Peter and Iudas, with the two Theeves at the death of Chriſt, and many moe, declare thus much in example to us. God hath loved, and God hath hated; God hath elected, and God hath rejected; God hath ſaved, and God hath caſt away for ever: Still but in juſtice whatſoever hee doth, without wrong to any, all being his owne. Rom. 9. 22, 23. Ephe. 1. Mat. 13. 11. Mat. 25. Luke 2. 34.

Now if any man will not ſtay here, but will ſearch further, and aske a reaſon of this the Lords doing, why he rejecteth any, all being equall his workmanſhip, and alike by nature: to theſe the wiſe and ſober Apoſtle anſwereth no otherwiſe, but he willed becauſe he willed. Noting thereby that his will ſhould content us, which he hath revealed, without any reaſon which is not revealed. And if it doe not, then heare I pray you what Saint Auguſtine ſaith to ſuch curious inquirers: Tu homo expectas à me reſponſum, & ego quoque homo ſum. Itaque umbo audiamus dicentem: O homo, tu quis es, qui reſponſas Deo, melior eſt fidelis ignorantia, quam temeraria ſcientia. Quære merita, non invenies niſi pœnam. O altitudo! Petrus negat, Latro credit! O altitudo! Quæris tu rationem, ego expaveſcam altitudinem. Tu ratiocinare, ego mirabor. Tu diſputa, ego credam. Altitudinem video, ad profunditatem non pervenio. Paulus inſcrutabilia vocat, tu vis ſcrutatari; ille inveſtigabiles vias ejus, tu veſtigas. Cui reſponſio iſta diſplicet, quærat doctiores, ſed caveat ne inveniat præſumptiores. Thou O man lookeſt for an anſwer of me, and I my ſelf am alſo a man: Therefore both thou and I, let us hearken to him that ſaith: O man who art thou that diſputeſt with God? Better farre is faithfull ignorance than raſh knowledge. Seeke for merit, thou ſhalt finde but puniſhment. O depth! Peter denyeth, the Theefe beleeveth. O depth! Thou ſeekeſt a reaſon of this, I will tremble at the deepneſſe. Thou reaſoneſt, I will wonder. Thou diſputeſt, I will beleeve. A depth I ſee, to the bottome I cannot come. Paul calleth them the unſearchable wayes of God, and thou wilt ſearch them. Whoſoever is not ſatisfied with this anſwer, let him ſeeke for one better learned than I am, but let him take heed that he finde not a more preſumer. Thus much may ſuffice for the doctrine it ſelfe, that it is evident in the Scripture. De verbis Apoſt. Ser. 20. De ſpir. & lit. cap. 34.

Concerning the Branches of it, as evident againe is the Word for the ſame, and firſt for the cauſe. It telleth us plainly, that we are choſen according to his good will. His will I ſay, and not our will, or yet worke, any manner of way. That we ſhould be holy, ſaith the Apoſtle, not becauſe wee were holy, making our holineſſe an effect flowing from Election, not Election from, or for, our holineſſe. With which Saint Auguſtine agreed when hee ſaid: Prædeſtinatio eſt præparatio beneficiorum Dei, Predeſtination is a preparation to all the benefits of God. I have obtained mercy (ſaith the Apoſtle) to be faithfull, not becauſe I was faithfull, or would be in time. Againe, to the Romanes, There is a remnant according to the Election of grace, of grace I ſay, and marke it, he ſaith not of merit, or for merit; for grace excludeth merit, as the Apoſtle plentifully proveth, Rom. 4. And Saint Auguſtine plainly confeſſed when he ſaid, Gratia non eſt ullo modo, niſi The cauſe of Election. Epheſ. 1. 5. Verſe 4. 1 Cor. 7. 25. Rom. 11. 5. Rom. 4.

niſi ſit gratuita omni modo: It is not grace any way, except it bee free every way. And againe, writing upon theſe words in Iohn; Niſi Pater traxerit, Except the Father draweth: Cur ait traxerit, & non duxerit? Ne aliam præcedere noſtram voluntatem aut meritum credamus: Why ſaith he, Except the Father draw him, and not, Except the Father guide or lead him? Surely, for feare we ſhould thinke, by ſo ſpeaking, that ſome will of ours or merit went before.

The ſtability of our election. 2 Tim. 2. 19. Rom. 11. 25. A reaſon proving the ſtability of Gods decree.

3. Plaine againe is the Scripture for the firmneſſe and ſtability of this decree of God, as by many places might bee ſhewed. Writing unto Timothy, the Apoſtle ſaith thus in plain words: The foundation of God remaineth ſure, ſure I ſay: and marke it, having this ſeale, the Lord knoweth who be his. To the Romanes he ſaith thus, The gifts and calling of God are without repentance, that is, without change or alteration. It may appeare unto us alſo moſt evidently by this argument; If whatſoever befalleth the wicked, ſtill betalleth them to their damnation, being ſo by their great wickedneſſe perverted, & whatſoever befalleth the godly ſtill turneth to their good, then is the decree of God for the life of ſome, and death of other ſome, moſt ſtable and firme; but this is ſo, if you marke the particulars, therefore the Concluſion followeth. For particulars, name what you will, be it never ſo good, yet to them that be Reprobates ſtill it is a fall. The Goſpell of God, how ſweet, how good, how profitable? yet to the wicked it is a ſavor of death unto death, and not a ſavour of life unto life. The long ſuffering of God, how gracious, how good, how worthy praiſe and thankes for ever? Yet unto the wicked it is made an occaſion to harden their hearts to preſume in ſinning, and to heape up more and more wrath againſt the day of wrath for body and ſoule. Chriſtian liberty, what a bleſſed grace of God it is? Yet of the wicked it is turned into wantonneſſe, and made an occaſion of great offence. The Supper of the Lord, what a ſweet Sacrament is it? full of comfort to the godly, the increaſe of true faith in them, yet the wicked eate and drinke it unworthily, to their owne damnation, and regard not, as they ought, the Lords body. What ſhould I ſay? Is not Chriſt himſelfe our deare and bleſſed Saviour, good, and full of life and ſalvation to all that beleeve? Yet even this Lambe of God, and Sonne of the moſt High, to theſe curſed caſt-awayes is a ſtone to ſtumble at, and a Rock of offence; they being diſobedient, and even ordained to this thing.

2 Cor. 2. 16. Rom. 2. 4. Gal. 5. 13. 1 Cor. 11. 1 Pet. 2. 8. Tit. 1. 15.

Finally, in a word: unto them that are defiled and unbeleeving, nothing is pure, but even their mindes and conſciences are defiled. Contrariwiſe, to the godly which are pure, all things are pure: and even all things, all things, I ſay, worke to the beſt to them that love God. Yea, ſaith Auguſtine, Ipſa etiam peccata: The very ſinnes and falls of the godly turne unto their good, ſome way or other, though thereby they may not bee emboldened to offend. Therefore wee ſee how firme this decree of God is, the wicked cannot be ſaved, turning all things to their wo, and the Elect cannot finally bee caſt away, reaping through the aſſiſting grace of Gods Spirit, good from all things that befall them.

Rom. 8.

The number of the elect, and knowledge of them in God. Luke 12. 7. 2 Tim. 2. 19. Luke 10. 20. Iohn 10. 15. Aug. de Cor. & Grat. to 3. cap. 12, 13. Knowledge in us of the ſame. Iohn 16. 9.

For number and knowledge of God of theſe his elect and choſen, the Scripture againe is not ſilent, but telleth us thus much, that the haires of our head are numbred: then certainly our perſons. God knoweth who bee his: then certainly he knoweth the number, and the number is certaine. Our names are witten in the Book of life: therefore we are knowne, and the number is certaine. Hee calleth his by their names; therefore hee knoweth them, both who they are, and how many. With which proofes and many mo that might be named, Saint Auguſtine joyneth, when he ſaith: Prædeſtinatorum ita certus eſt numerus, ut eis nec addatur, nec minuatur: The number of the Elect is ſo certaine, that neither addition can be made unto them, nor diminution from them.

Laſtly, the Word inſtructeth even us alſo to know and to beleeve this matter in particular of our ſelves. For, The Spirit ſhall rebuke the world of ſinne, ſaith Saint Iohn, becauſe it beleveth not: And what is it to beleeve, but in my ſoule and conſcience to bee aſſured that Chriſt dyed, not onely for others, but even for me, and that by his death and Paſſion, as well I my ſelfe, my poore body and ſoule ſhall be ſaved, as many others? And what is this I pray you, but to beleeve that amongſt others, and with others, and as well as others, God hath choſen you to be an heire of his Kingdome? VVant this faith in your ſelfe, and the place I alleaged, ſaith, The Spirit ſhall rebuke you, and as many as want it, for ſinne, becauſe yee doe not beleeve this. Therefore wee are all bound, you ſee, even by the will of God, to beleeve our particular election and predeſtination, and he that doubteth or wavereth, muſt be rebuked, and is rebuked even of Gods Spirit for ſo doing. VVhy againe ſhould ſo much, and ſo many things bee ſpoken of the mercy and goodneſſe of God as is in the Scripture, but that you, and I, and all fleſh, ſhould catch hold of it, and conclude out of the ſame, that to us particularly ſuch, and ſo, ever God will be. Looke wee then at the light of the VVord of God both for election, for the cauſes of the ſame, for the firmneſſe and ſtability of it, for number and knowledge of God in our ſelves, and ſee whether theſe madde men, that cannot away with the doctrine of Gods election, doe not oppoſe themſelves directly and plainly againſt the evidence of Gods holy and ſacred Scriptures, ſtriving againſt the ſtreame, and kicking againſt the prick, to their fearefull confuſion if they leave not. The third and laſt thing which I ſaid they oppoſe themſelves againſt, is the

ſweet uſe of the holy Doctrine which it yeeldeth ſundrie wayes, to as many as rightly with underſtanding meditate upon it. As firſt, by confirming moſt ſtrongly this feeble faith of ours againſt Deſpaire, when troubles and croſſes do every way beſet us, and as it were overwhelm us. For truly may it be ſaid of the afflictions often of the godly, as one ſaid of another matter, πόνῳ πόνον φέρει, one labour begetteth another, one ſorow followeth another; and whoſoever will live godly in Chriſt Jeſus, muſt ſuffer perſecution, the troubles of the righteous being many. But feare not little flock, ſaith our Saviour Chriſt, for it is your Fathers will to give you a kingdome; as if he ſhould ſay, whatſoever befalleth you bitter in this world, deſpaire not, but comfort your ſelves and ſoules with this, that you are of the flock, that is, elect and choſen for a kingdome, which your Fathers will is, without all faile, to give you: Rejoyce that your names are written in the Book of Life, that is, ſtay your ſelves upon your election ever, and feare not. Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of Gods choſen? It is God that juſtifieth, who ſhall condemn? Who ſhall ſeparate us from the love of Chriſt? Shall tribulation, or anguiſh, or perſecution, or famine, or nakednesſe, or peril, or ſword? No, I am perſwaded that neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor Principalities, nor Powers, nor things preſent, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature ſhall be able to ſeparate us from the love of God, which is in Chriſt Ieſus our Lord. Sed ſuperatis omnibus procellis, tandem in portu, &c. But all ſtormes and waves of woe being paſſed over, and well broken off, at laſt in the quiet haven of everlaſting comfort I ſhall have my reſt for ever and ever. In a word, how can a man deſpaire of Gods mercy in due time, that findeth his election in the meane time? Sweet therefore ever againſt finall feare is this doctrine.

The firſt uſe of this Doctrine.

Luke 12.32.

Secondly it cooleth and quencheth the proud puffe of ſinfull fleſh, telling us that be we never ſo mighty, never ſo honorable and high, by place and calling in the world, yet we were made of the ſame maſſe and mould that the pooreſt man and moſt wretched catife to ſee to in the world was: we have ſtood before the potter no better matter than he, to receive a choice to ſuch uſe and end as might pleaſe him. What difference is in us (if any be touching election) it hath come by mercy, and not from merit, therefore no pride, but thankes: no diſdaine of any, but humility toward all, and ever in our ſelves beautifieth and adorneth us moſt. Hee that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord, ſaith this Doctrine of Election. For favour in God is the fountaine of our grace, whatſoever it is that we rejoyce in. Shall I hoyſe ſaile, and looke bigge upon others, when only by grace I am that I am? It may not be.

Another uſe.

Thirdly, it filleth our hearts with a feeling of love in God towards us, that is, ſweeter than hony or the hony combe, and forceth our ſoules to love againe, except we be dead; yea, to love moſt earneſt, according to the mercy that we have taſted of. Some ſhadowing of it wee may ſee in men, that ſtand all condemned juſtly for matter of treſpaſſe committed, and expect a ſentence of bitter death accordingly. Let the Prince in this caſe releaſe one, pardoning in mercy, and giving life, when parity of treſpaſſe called for equall puniſhment: O how leapeth the heart of that releaſed one, when he knoweth it, crying mercy, mercy, O ſweeteſt mercy, how bound am I for this releaſe? Can I love, can I think, can I honour ever condignely the fountaine of this favour towards me? I cannot, I cannot: and therefore I will die with this, O mercy above merit, and hope of requitall in me. So it is in our election, where only grace hath made the difference and ſaved us. The love is great, we cannot but ſee it, and what is due we may not deny it. If all love deſire love again, God forbid but ſuch love ſhould be ever thought of as the Lord inableth.

A third uſe.

Fourthly, it provoketh us to all good works, wee never thinke obedience too much that redoundeth to the good-liking of him that thus hath loved us. If men in this world ſhall ſtead us any way, how wiſh we, how will we, how care we, how ſeek we to do the thing that may content, and avoid the thing that may offend them? What compariſon is there betwixt the love of men, and this love of God towards us before the world was made? Can then the knowledge and true regard of it be without fruit in our converſation? It cannot be.

A fourth uſe.

Fiftly, it ſtayeth us againſt offence that would grow by ſuch as fall away, if this were not. For it telleth us, ſome ſtand in ſhew, and ſome ſtand in truth, ſome ſtand for time, & ſome ſtand for ever. If any had been of us, ſaith the Apoſtle Iohn, they would have continued with us. Feare we not therefore when men ſtart aſide, but ſtand we faſt whoſoever ſhake, remembring well that all being not appointed to the end, they neither are appointed to the meanes.

Laſtly, moſt ſweetly this doctrine of our election profiteth unto patience, telling us, that no tyranny in this curſed world, no malice, nor moods of mortall men, can, or ſhall ever prevaile beyond the limits and liſts of his counſell, that hath decreed their pitch. And therefore endure it, and endure it patiently, for he moderateth. This comforted the Apoſtles for their Lord and Maſter, in that notable place of the Acts, worthy reading a thouſand times, O Lord, ſay they, againſt thy holy Son Ieſus, whom thou haſt annointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Iſrael gathered themſelves together. But what could they doe? Surely they have done nothing, but what thy hand and thy counſell had determined before to be done. This comfort our Saviour himſelfe pleaſed to apply to himſelfe againſt the cruell enemy, lifting himſelfe up, and vaunting, as though he had all power of life and death againſt our Saviour. Thou couldeſt have have no power against me, ſaith he, except it were given thee from above. True in the head, and true in the members, ever to our great ſtay and comfort. Theſe and ſuch like are the fruits of this doctrine of our election; Which they never taſted, nor ever knew, that ſo wickedly condemne it. Let it ſuffice that we feele it to the praiſe of God and our comfort, and let them periſh with their errors, that ſo caſt away a doctrine of ſuch heavenly uſe, if they will not repent and bee perſwaded.

Cavils againſt Gods Predeſtination.

The firſt objection.

Away then with thoſe curſed Cavils that flie up and downe againſt this doctrine; for it is holy, it is ſweet, it is the Lords. It maketh no man ſet all at ſix and ſeven, as careleſſe what hee doth, ſaying, If I bee predeſtinate to be ſaved, I cannot be damned; and if I be appointed to death, I cannot be ſaved: But contrariwiſe, it maketh men rather carefull to uſe meanes, as knowing that the decree of God taketh his effect by meanes. And therefore ſuch as rightly underſtand this doctrine, and carry in themſelves a care not to ſpeake prophanely of any truth of God, howbeit they know that the decree of God ſtandeth ever in it ſelfe unchangeable and cannot be altered, yet looke they not at that, but at the meanes that God hath appointed all men to uſe, either for the obtaining or avoiding of any thing wiſhed or feared. And theſe meanes they uſe with all care and diligence, ſeeking the end, by the way ordained, and not any way made wretcheleſſe in the meanes by the end. As for example, that I may be plain: Rebecca knew that God had appointed her ſon Iacob to live, and to be a greater man than Eſau, becauſe God himſelfe had told her, that he would make two mighty Nations of her two ſonnes, and the elder ſhould ſerve the younger; yet did ſhe not conclude hereupon as theſe men doe, that therefore it skilled not what ſhe did when Eſau threatned to kil Iacob, for being appointed to live, he could not be killed. But contrariwiſe ſhee moſt carefully deviſed, and moſt ſpeedily uſed meanes to keepe him from danger, by ſending him away to her brother Laban, till Eſau his anger ſhould be aſſwaged. Knowing, as I ſaid, that the decree of God did not prejudice meanes, but rather binde unto the ſame, as being to take his effect in time by the ſame. And ſo ſhee ranne not raſhly to the counſell of God, as theſe men doe, but looked what her owne duty was, and uſed that. By which meanes her ſonnes both lived, and all came to paſſe well, as God had decreed.

Acts 27.

Take another example as plaine as this. In the Acts of the Apoſtles we reade that Paul and his company were in great danger upon the Sea; in ſo much that they were faine to throw all their lading out, and in the end the ſhip burſt in two. Before the extremity of the perill, God, that is ever carefull to comfort his by his Angell, in the night foretold Paul of all that ſhould happen, bade him not feare, for hee ſhould eſcape, and for his ſake all likewiſe that were with him, which were in number 276. ſoules. Here was Gods counſell knowne, his decree and purpoſe revealed, which Paul beleeved, and exhorted all them moſt firmly to bee perſwaded of. What now? Did Paul upon this conclude, as theſe men ſpeake? VVhy then it skilleth not what we doe; for God having determined to ſave us, we cannot be drowned? No ſuch matter, but leaving the decree of God, looketh ſtraight at the meanes that muſt be uſed, the induſtry of the Mariners, who would have ſtolne away, had not Paul prevented them; and the ſtrengthening of their bodies by taking ſome meate. VVhich being done, ſuch as could ſwimme threw themſelves firſt into the Sea, that getting to land they might helpe others, and the reſt on boards and broken pieces of the ſhip, came all ſafe to ſhore. Thus did meanes effect Gods purpoſe, and not Gods purpoſe knowne of Paul, hinder the carefull uſe of meanes in him or the company.

Verſe 30.

Mat. 2.

A third example, if you will, let us adde to theſe two, as pregnant to our purpoſe, as either of them. Our Saviour Chriſt himſelfe in his youth was ſought for by Herod to have beene ſlaine; yet God had appointed him to live, and to effect the worke of our Redemption. So, in reſpect of Gods decree it was not poſſible that Herod ſhould hurt him, doe what he could. What then? Would God have this counſell of his a cauſe of ſecurity or neglect of meanes in Ioſeph, the reputed father of our Saviour? No: but his owne ſelfe willeth him in a dreame by his Angell, to take Mary and the Childe, and to flie into Ægypt, there tarying till he ſhould bring him word. Which Ioſeph did, and ſo by uſe of meanes preſerved him, whom yet God had appointed to live from everlaſting, doe Herod and all the world what they could. Did Mary hinder Ioſeph from uſing theſe meanes, ſaying to him, Tuſh, doe not we know what God hath appointed this Child unto? Did not I heare what the Angell ſaid to me when I conceived; what the Shepheards and Wiſe-men ſaid when he was borne; what Simeon and Anna ſaid at my Purification; (all which things Mary laid up in her heart, ſaith the Text) therefore let Herod doe what he can, Gods appointment muſt take place, and cannot be prevented by his malice, though we ſit ſtill and flie not at all? Did (I ſay) Mary thus reaſon, and thus hinder him? Nothing leſſe. And therefore learne we ever by this example, the true dutie of Gods children, and the right uſe of the Doctrine of Gods Predeſtination. Surely it is this, that whatſoever the decree of God is, we ever pitch our own eyes upon the meanes that God hath appointed, knowing that as he hath appointed us to the end, ſo he hath preſcribed a way to come to the ſame by. If I will be ſaved, I muſt doe this, if I will not be damned I muſt avoid that. So you ſee did Rebecca, Paul, God himſelfe for his Sonne Chriſt, and all that have feared God, and underſtood this doctrine ſince the

the world began. So doe we our owne ſelves, I doe not doubt, at this day, carefully working our ſalvation with feare and trembling, by hearing the Word, receiving the Sacraments, and following the courſe preſcribed in the Word to ſuch as will be ſaved: Making the determined counſell of God in predeſtinating us to life, whereof in our conſciences wee feele a ſweet aſſurance, the end of this our obedience, a comfort againſt our imperfections, when we cannot doe the good that we would, and thereupon Satan ſeekes to terrifie us; and in a word, rather a chiefe cauſe to encourage us to the uſe of meanes, than any way to make us negligent in the courſe of good living. Let prophane perſons doe what they will, and ſay what they liſt, as both workes and words be unſanctified, yet thus both doe and ſay the godly, whom we are to follow. If for the abuſing of this Doctrine by ſome, the Doctrine it ſelfe muſt be rejected, then muſt the whole Word it ſelf be alſo prohibited, becauſe that unto ſome it is a ſavour of death unto death, as often as it is either read or preached. But God forbid. Let ſin bee ſin in them that abuſe it, and truth be free for them that will learne it. Vaine then is this Objection, I hope you ſee, againſt Gods Predeſtination, that it maketh us careleſſe what we doe. Surely, it maketh us moſt carefull, as I have ſhewed. And let this ſuffice.

Why, but if I did nothing, yet I ſhould be ſaved, being appointed to be ſaved, and if I do never ſo well, yet I ſhall be damned, being appointed thereunto.

Be not deceived. Being appointed to be ſaved, it is not poſſible that you ſhould doe nothing: For as well you are appointed to the meanes, as to the end, which appointment is effectuall ever, as examples have ſhewed, and no example can be ſhewed to the contrary. For, as Predeſtination hath followed upon love in God, ſo doth Calling follow Predeſtination, Juſtification followeth Calling, and Sanctification (which is this uſing of meanes that I ſpeake of) followeth Juſtification, till at the laſt we come to Glorification. You know it is the Apoſtles Chaine to the Romanes. Contrariwiſe, if a man be appointed unto death, and a reprobate, it is never poſſible that his deeds ſhould be good, in reſpect of himſelfe, but alwayes there will be ſome ſecret poyſon in them, as was in Iudas care for the poore, when he would have had the oyntment ſold, beare they never ſo faire a gloſſe to the eye of the world. And therefore, that againe is but an errour, that men ſhould be damned doe they never ſo well, being appointed thereunto. Rom. 1. 8.

Object. 2.

Well Sir, then may you ſay, this is alſo that which maketh againſt this Doctrine which you now handle, that it ſeemeth to juſtifie or excuſe the wicked, who are not able to doe otherwiſe than they doe, being marked of God unto perdition; and therefore ſhould not, as it ſeemeth, be puniſhed for that which they cannot chooſe but commit.

Neither in this againe let us be deceived. For to ſin neceſſarily, and to ſin conſtrainedly, are two things, far differing one from another. The reprobates they ſin neceſſarily in reſpect of Gods decree, but yet they ſin not conſtrainedly, or by force thereof at any time: for then might their puniſhment ſeeme ſomewhat hard. But there is in them knowledge many times when they ſin, will, delight, and anger if they be reſtrained or bridled any way, all which are teſtimonies againſt them of the juſtice of their puniſhment, fully convincing them in their conſciences, and accuſing them, and clearing this Doctrine of Gods decree, from being any compulſion to them to tranſgreſſe ever. Let this cavill therefore alſo ceaſe, and this holy Doctrine ſtand ſtill undefiled in our eyes.

Thirdly, it is not ſo high, myſticall, obſcure and hidden, if it be ſoberly intreated of, and within the limits of the Word; but that it may be underſtood with profit and comfort of a reverent minde. Witneſſe hereof all that I have ſaid of the points and ſeverall members of this Doctrine, ſo evident, and plaine, and eaſie, as we cannot deſire a greater light. If any thing be obſcure in it, or hard, yet may not that cauſe all the reſt to be rejected, as Auguſtine truly teſtified when he ſaid; Numquid negandum quod apertum, quia comprehendi non poteſt quod occultum? Muſt we therefore deny what is plain and manifeſt, becauſe we cannot comprehend what is hidden? Thus doe we ſee the vanity of mens cavils againſt this ſacred truth of God, and whatſoever elſe is brought of any man againſt it, falleth as theſe, with the light of truth, when they are conſidered and compared with it. And let thus much ſuffice for the firſt point.

2. Part.

[Venit ad me: Commeth unto me.]

VEnire ad Chriſtum, eſt Chriſtum fide amplecti, & locum dare veritati: To come unto Chriſt, is to embrace him by faith, and to give place to the truth, ſaith one. Quod dedit mihi Pater, (ſcilicet) per Prædeſtinationem, venit ad me, (ſcilicet) per fidem: What the Father hath given me (to wit) by Predeſtination, that commeth unto me (to wit) by Faith, ſaith another, as wee heard before in the beginning. Quid eſt, qui ad me venerit, niſi qui ſe mihi certa fide dederit? What is this, he that commeth unto me, but he that giveth himſelf unto me by aſſured faith? ſaith a third. By all which, and many moe that I could alledge, we ſee the ſenſe is thus much, as if our Saviour ſhould have ſaid, All that the Father giveth me, by his election to life, thoſe come unto mee by faith; that is, thoſe lay hold of me, and embrace me, by true beleeving in mee; and teſtifie that faith by fruits of the ſame daily, as God enableth. Which evidently confirmeth that which I ſaid before, that the cauſe of Election is in God, not in man. For here we ſee, Election floweth from Gods giving, and not Gods giving from our beleeving. Therefore is true faith called Electorum fides, The faith of the Elect, becauſe it is in none but in them, and ſpringeth ever from this fountaine: As many as were ordained to eternall life beleeved, ſaith the Apoſtle: Making ordaining firſt, and beleeving ſecond. The like doth that golden chaine teſtifie, in the eighth to the Romans, and many moe.

Titus 1.1. Act.13.48. Rom.8.

How to know whether we be the Children of God, or no.

See then (beloved) in theſe words given to us by the Lord Jeſus our Saviour himſelfe, a ſure token and a true way to know whether wee be the children of God or no, and ſtand in a comfortable eſtate, if God ſhould call us here-hence. Surely, if wee bee come unto Chriſt by a true faith, working to holy life, then are we ſure by Chriſts owne words, who is truth it ſelfe, that we are given by the Father, that is, choſen and elected to eternall life, and cannot periſh. And that the Lord would have us marke this, and make a tryal of our ſelves by it, his very ſpeech declareth. For hee could have ſaid as eaſily (every one that is elected is given unto me, as all that is given me commeth unto me,) but that by the former no light had broken out to us, whereas by the latter we have a moſt plaine ſigne. Looke we then earneſtly at this marke, and ſee if wee bee commers, and commers aright unto Chriſt. For Iudas came, and that with both lowly and lovely behaviour outward, but his drift was naught, and no leſſe than treaſon. In the ſeventh of Iohn, ſome came to Chriſt, but they came to intrap him. In this preſent Chapter they came to Chriſt, and that by flocks, but it was for loaves, and not for love, as our Saviour telleth them. The Capernaites alſo both came, and ſaw, as others did, but they beleeved not. Many amongſt us come to Church, Sermons and Lectures, as others, to the good comfort of men that ſee no more than what is without, but God knoweth ſecrets, and the end of all mens comming. Certaine it is that every comming proveth not a giving of God, and therefore looke we about us. It is no ſmall duty of a Chriſtian man or woman, to be carefully hearted, and ſharpely ſighted, to ſee into themſelves how they walke and live, and are like to die, when the tree falleth, and ſo ſhall lie till the judging day. For the Spirit often beateth upon this, as a needfull thing; Let us ſearch and trie our wayes, ſaith the Prophet Ieremy. Prove your ſelves whether you be in the faith or no, ſaith the Apoſtle, with many ſuch like. Many have thought too well of themſelves, and found too late. Here is a direction before our eyes. If we be Gods we are elected, and ſo given to Chriſt, as men that ſhall not periſh, but be ſaved in him, and by him eternally. This Election ſhall appeare to us by comming to Chriſt, For all that the Father giveth commeth to him, ſaith this Text. This comming to Chriſt is by faith. What faith? By a true and lively faith. And how is that knowne? Ever by fruits, as fire by heat. Here then is the point. Our fruits ſhew our faith, our faith ſhewes our comming to Chriſt, and our comming to Chriſt in this ſort ſheweth our election by God to eternall life. Fruits then are all, which what they are this day in many of us that profeſſe the Goſpell religiouſly, as men ſet here before the Majeſty of God, and the burning brightneſſe of his piercing eyes, let us all conſider in the ſecret ſoules and conſciences of us.

Divers ſorts of commers to Chriſt.

Lam.3.40. 2 Cor.13.

The degrees of our eſtate to be obſerved of us.

May that fearfull, ſtrange and monſtrous pride in apparell that this day appeareth and eateth up this Land, teſtifie unto the ſoule of any man or woman delighted with it, and in it, that they are come to Chriſt? Did ever any in the world prove his election by this fruit? wee know no, we thinke no, even as we ſit now, and yet we feare not. Herod was royally roabed, and dreadfully periſhed. The rich Glutton with his coſtly purple and fine linnen, was a caſt-away. And had not vanity of apparell, ſaith Gregory, been a grievous ſinne, Nunquam ſermo Dei tam vigilanter exprimeret, quòd Dives, qui torquebatur apud inferos, byſſo & purpura indutus fuiſſet: Never would the Word of God ſo carefully note, that this rich man, tormented in hell, was in his life time clothed with purple and fine linnen. So ſaith he elſe where, if pride in apparell were not moſt ſinful, never would Chriſt ſo have praiſed Iohns meanneſſe and plainneſſe in apparell, or the Apoſtle have exhorted women to beware of broydered hair, &c. By the Prophet Sophony the Lord ſaith, He will viſit all thoſe that go in ſtrange apparell; meaning the Courtiers, as the marginal note ſaith, which imitated other Nations in their apparell. If the Lord threatneth puniſhment, judge in a feeling heart how he liketh it. S. Ierom noteth an example of his puniſhment, in a Noble woman in thoſe dayes, who decking and painting up a young maid that was her Neece, with jewels in her haire, and ſuch like trimmings, by and by had both her hands withered, and ſhortly after dyed, concluding upon it: Sic gemmas & precioſiſſima ornamenta Chriſtus defendit; So doth Chriſt defend precious ſtones and gay clothes. God forbid al hands in theſe daies that are buſied in ſuch dreſſing of haire, and hanging on of ornaments above that which is fit, ſhould taſte of ſuch judgement: yet feare, beloved, and think of this example in the middeſt of your deckings: For God may ſhew his wrath, if it pleaſe him, in a moment. Cyprian ſaith profitably, tormenta paucorũ exempla ſunt omniũ; the puniſhment of one is an example for all: and with the wiſe it is ſo. Apparell, ſaith ſaith the Wiſe-man, ſheweth what manner of perſon one is, as doth alſo geſture and laughter. Then vaine apparell ſaith we are vaine, proud apparell, proud, wanton apparell, wanton, &c. So that where we might haply ſeeme at leaſt to be good, vertuous and honeſt, if our apparell were modeſt, though indeed we were ſtarke nought; by this meanes it commeth to paſſe, that we cannot ſo much as ſeeme to be good, or be once but imagined to bee vertuous. For thy apparell, ſaith the Wiſe-man, which is ſubject to all mens eyes, publiſheth, as with a trumpet, that thou art as it is, prodigall as it is, proud as it is, wanton and gariſh as it is, vaine as it is; and in a word, ſtarke nought as it is. And what a trumpet is this to beare about one, if we conſider it? Surely, if it be a ſhame to weare a paper on my hat at Weſtminſter-hall, to declare what I have done, it is as reprochfull to weare a vaine garment on my back, to pull all mens eyes upon me to reade in Capitall letters what a perſon I am. O that the God of heaven would ſo change the hearts of men and women by his holy Spirit, that theſe back-papers, (I meane apparell in exceſſe) might be as odious in our eyes and hearts, as thoſe hat-papers be at Weſtminſter: without doubt, beloved, they tell as foule tales of us in their kinde, as thoſe doe. I could finde in my heart to ſpend all the time againſt this ſin, if I knew I ſhould profit: but other things alſo being to be conſidered, I will end this matter with that pretty ſpeech of Philip of Macedon, who having appointed one to be a Judge, and hearing after that he uſed to dye or colour his beard and haire, ſtraightway diſplaced him, with this ſpeech, That he which was not faithfull in his haire, but uſed forgery & falſhood in it, to change it from his truth, was no way to be judged as a man that would be truſty in greater matters. A moſt notable hatred in a Heathen man of that which Chriſtians dote in, and will not be perſwaded of. If this argument ſhould bee urged in our dayes, howſoever men eſcape, many women would be concluded worthy little truſt. God work with us, and ſo I leave it.

Eccleſ. 19.

A vaine garment is like Weſtminſter papers.

Note this well.

May that inward root from whence this outward fruit moſt commonly floweth; to wit, an high ſtomack and proud minde, prove unto any mans conſcience that he is come to Chriſt, and ſo conſequently an elect. No beloved, and therefore the Prophet David being deſirous to approve himſelfe unto the Lord as one of his, before all things purgeth himſelfe from this, and ſaith: Lord I am not high minded, I have no proud lookes: I do not exerciſe my ſelfe in matters that are too high for me, &c. Making it as we all ſee, a filthy blot in any man that will belong to God, to be thus.

Oh pride of minde! what hurt haſt thou done, and daily yet doeſt to men and women overcarried with thee? VVhat down-fals and break-necks haſt thou brought to many? Adam and Eve, with all the world in them, overthrowne moſt fearefully by pride of minde. Abſolon a Kings ſonne by birth, and for perſonage ſo goodly a man, that the Scripture ſaith, there was not a blemiſh in him from the top of his head to the ſole of his foot, yet ſo over-caried with inward conceit of himſelfe, that the earth refuſed any longer to beare him, the heavens abhorred utterly to receive him, and ſo he was hanged betwixt heaven and earth by the haire of his head, for a ſpectacle of Gods wrath towards a lofty ſtomack, while the world endureth. Corah and his company over-caried with pride of minde againſt thoſe whom God had exalted over them, dreadfully periſhed, and cut of the bowels of the earth, into which they ſunk, preach to all men this day to beware of pride, and of high ſtomacks, diſliking their owne places, coveting greater, envying of them that have them, and ſo in ſpite, as malecontents, oppoſing themſelves againſt them. Miriam, otherwiſe a good woman, had a little ſpice of this inward pride, and it made her prattle againſt her own brother. VVhich little buſie-brain againſt a ſuperiour even in ſo good a woman, God could not, nor would not ſuffer, but by no leſſe buffet than a loathſom leproſie, beat it, and chaſtiſed it in her. The great King Nebuchadnezzar ſwelled in his minde, when he ſaid, Is not this great Babel that I have built by the might of my power, & for the honor of my Majeſty? And how did God endure it? Surely ſaith the text, while the word was in his mouth, a voice came from heaven, & ſaid, his kingdom was departed from him, & he ſhould live with the beaſts of the field, and eat graſſe with Oxen, till this pride were abated in him, &c. Reade the place at large. Remember Haman, how the pride of his mind brake his neck. Read the pride of Tyrus, in the Prophet Ezekiel, and O London, take heed betimes. This is an arrow that flyeth by day, which, who ſo eſcapeth, is graciouſly bleſſed. Why, but are all proud that meddle with high matters? God forbid: for ſome mens callings and gifts warrant, what other mens deny them. And it is not medling, but buſie medling above a calling, that noteth pride. Otherwiſe I have ever liked wel of Ammonius ſpeech, a ſcholer of Origens, which he made to Evagrius, ſhunning to be a Biſhop, when hee was called to it. At tu multò gravius inquit peccaſti, quia linguam tibi ipſi excidiſti, nec conferre eam ad Dei gloriam pia prædicatione Evangelii illuſtrandã audes: But thou haſt ſinned much more grievouſly in cutting out thine own tongue, & not daring to uſe it, to the ſetting out of Gods glory by holy preaching. Et ne tibi arrogare videaris, gratia Dei non uteris. And leſt thou ſhouldſt ſeem to think wel of thy ſelf, thou wilt not uſe the gifts given thee of God. A golden ſpeech, beloved, for many in theſe dayes to think of, noting a golden meane betwixt arrogancy and negligence. Yea, rubbing their conſciences, that whileſt they would ſeeme to think reverently of the Miniſtery, defraud

Many an hollow heart to the preſent ſtate, ſaying as Eſau did, the dayes of mourning will ſhortly come, for my Father Iſaac, and then will I kill my brother Iacob, declare this comming. Nay, will haſtening this day of mourning, which the Lord knoweth is like to bee a day of blackneſſe and darkneſſe to this land indeed, and I warrant them, to themſelves which wiſh it, as heavy as to any, though now they dream of a dry ſummer, through the falſe and ſubtill perſwaſions of hiſſing ſerpents in holes and corners, and by a judgement of God upon their underſtanding, may I ſay the haſtenings of this day by conſpiracies and treaſons, treacheries and practices, abhorred of all true Chriſtians, prove unto any mans ſoule this comming that we ſpeake of?

Let the judgements of God anſwer for me, who hath ever yet wounded in wrath the hairy ſcalp of ſuch curſed caitifes, and being immutable in his juſtice, ſhall ſtill finde out ſuch wickedneſſe, and give them their portion of ſhame and confuſion in this world, with endleſſe woe in the world to come. Which Lord we beſeech thee, in mercy towards us and this Land, ſtill doe: and with hands and hearts lifted up to heaven, we thanke thy Majeſty for thy great goodneſſe in this behalfe, craving in the precious blood of Jeſus Chriſt, that the ſoule of our Soveraigne may ſtill be bound in the bundle of life with thee her gracious God, and her and our enemies, for thy Goſpels ſake, be evermore caſt out, as out of the middle of a ſling. Amen, Amen.

Contention and diviſion amongſt brethren.

May that moſt fearefull diviſion, bitterneſſe and gaule both in word and writing that hath now too long ſo ſpotted this famous Church of England, and many worthy men in it, prove unto any guilty cauſer of the ſame, his comming to Chriſt? Surely it doth not: Surely it cannot. And the God of might and power perſwade it to us.

What am I beloved, that after ſo many worthy inſtruments in Gods Church, which both in this place and elſewhere, have touched this griefe, I ſhould aſſay to coole and delay the heate of it? Surely I am no body, and therefore better for me to doe as I have hitherto done, ſit ſtill in ſilence, and wiſh that my head were full of water, and mine eyes a fountaine of teares, that I might weep day and night for this fault amongſt us, than to ſay any thing of it. Yet ſince God is ſtrong in weakneſſe, and hath a bleſſing for every mans ſpeech, ſeaſoned with his truth, according to his pleaſure, I joyne my heart, and tongue, and ſoule, to theirs that have herein perſwaded, and with all the power of my ſpirit I beſeech you brethren, with them, high and low, whatſoever you are, as the Apoſtle did the Philippians: If there be any conſolation in Chriſt, any comfort of love, any fellowſhip of the Spirit, any compaſſion and mercy, fulfill we the Apoſtles joy, being like minded, having the ſame love, being of one accord, and of one judgement, nothing being done through contention or vain glory, but that in meekneſſe of minde we may every man eſteem others better than our ſelves, &c. Think we of the words of our Saviour Chriſt, never to be forgotten of a Chriſtian man, that Hereby we are to be diſcerned to be his diſciples, if we love one another. Hereby, I ſay, hereby, If we love one another. Loſe this badge, and loſe our comfort, weare it, & ſhew it, and as the Lord is God, we are his choſen. God is love, and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him. An unſpeakable comfort to the man that hath love. God is not contention, malice and wrath, and therefore he that dwelleth in theſe, dwelleth not in God, nor God in him. As unſpeakable a terror where love is lacking if it were thought of. Bleſſed are the peace-makers, for they ſhall be called the children of God Curſed then are the peace-breakers, and bate-makers, for they are not the Children of God. What ſaith the Apoſtle to the Epheſians? So ſay I: There is one body, one ſpirit, one hope of our calling, one Lord, one Faith, one Baptiſme, one God and Father of all, which is above all, and through all, and in us all. For his blood that dyed for us, let all theſe ones, make us one, endeavouring to our dying day, to keepe that unity of the ſpirit in the bond of peace, which there the Apoſtle inferreth. And I beſeech you mark what vertues in that place are noted, as neceſſary to this vertue, if ever we wiſh it.

Meekneſſe, moderating anger, and deſire of revenge.
Long ſuffering, to endure infirmities in brethren,
And a ſupportation one of another through love, to meet with ſummum jus, when we are wronged.

Theſe are the vertues that preſerve concord, and are as chaines and bracelets of gold to the profeſſors of them. Againe, what ſtrength and power to perſwade every good minde, is in the ſimilitude of members which the holy Ghoſt uſeth, you have often heard, and therefore I ſpare to ſtand upon it. Only let me remember you what Xenophon ſpeaketh with good conſideration, to wit, that we have oculos, manus, pedes, binos, ut conjuncti ſe adjuvent, non impediant. Eyes, hands, and feet, two of each, that joyning & joyned together, one may be an help to the other. Sic decet fratres ἀλλήλοις χεῖρας, καὶ ὄμματα, καὶ πόδας εἶναι: So becommeth it brethren to have hands, eyes, and feet, one for another. lent him his legs, the lame man guided the blinde man, and ſo lent him his eyes. But againſt a brother we ſhould neither have hands, eyes, feet, pen, paper, inke, tongue, heart, word, thought, nor any thing, if all were as it ſhould be. O fearefull ſentence! Beloved, if it were felt with trembling heart to fall into the offence of God: Why takeſt thou my words in thy mouth, &c. that is, what haſt thou to doe with me, or I to doe with thee, as long as thou giveſt thy mouth to evill, and with thy tongue forgeſt deceit, as long as thou ſitteſt and ſpeakeſt againſt thy brother, and ſlandereſt thy mothers ſon? When brethren therefore ſpeake one againſt another, they are not reformed as they ſhould be, and the Lord will neither allow them to ſpeake in his name, nor take them as beleevers in the ſame, if they continue: But will reprove them, as the Text ſaith, and ſetting before them theſe miſdemeanours, will teare them in pieces, and no man ſhall deliver them. How fearefull againe is that of Solomon, that ſix things the Lord hateth, and the ſeventh his ſoule abhorreth. What is that ſeventh? even he that raiſeth up contention amongſt brethren. This man or woman, this perſon, rich or poore, the Lord hateth, the Lord loatheth, and the very ſoule of the Lord abhorreth. If any man tell me, I loſe my labour in perſwading peace, as long as men keep the minds they have, that they muſt have this and that in the State altered, or they will have no peace. To this man I ſay as Auguſtine ſaid, Rectè dicitur, &c. It is truly ſaid that the congealed ſnow cannot be hot. For as long as it is ſnow, it cannot be hot. But that ſnow may be diſſolved, and then that water that before was cold ſnow, may be heat, & become hot water: So, men that wiſh ſome things, and want, and by reaſon of that want ſtill blow the coale of this grievous diſſention amongſt us, though while they retaine ſuch judgement reſolutely, there be ſmall hope of peace, yet may they by Gods gracious working, ſee either ſome fault in matter wiſhed, or in manner uſed to attaine their wiſh, and ſo become otherwiſe inclined to peace than erſt they were. God is able, and God is good, and therefore wiſhing but what God willeth, and my perſwaſion being but the Lords meſſage delivered to me in his word, I will not deſpaire what ſo many good Chriſtians joyne with me in begging at Gods hands. I hope that of Solomon ſhall ſinke deep in us, that It is a mans honor to ceaſe from ſtrife, but every foole will be medling: whom the holy Ghoſt cenſureth to be fooles, they are like to prove no leſſe, whatſoever they think of themſelves. Have ſalt in your ſelves, ſaith the holy Ghoſt, by and by joyning, and peace one with another. For, Sal ſine pace non eſt virtutis donum, ſed damnationis argumentum: Salt without peace is not a vertue, but an argument rather of damnation, ſaid he truly that ſaid it. Let us conſider one another, ſaith the Apoſtle, to provoke unto love & to good works, not forſaking the fellowſhip that we have among our ſelves, as the maner of ſome is, but let us exhort one another, & that ſo much the more becauſe the day draweth neare. I will conclude with Auſten, and ſo trouble you no more in this matter: Si vultis vivere, &c. If you will live according to the holy Spirit, then imbrace love, make much of truth, and deſire unity, that you may come to eternity. God in his ſweet mercy give us unity.

* May reverence to ſuperiours as hollow as ever was Iudas his to his maſter, prove unto our ſoules that we are come to Chriſt by the Fathers giving? No, no, neither cap nor kiſſe, nor crouching courteſie without faithfull honor within, can ever be teſtimony of true piety. And if ſeeming to reverence them both by geſture and title, as Iudas did, cannot make mee better than a Iudas, except there be truth within me, how much leſſe may open, wayward, and wilfull withſtanding, malicious and ſpitefull denying both of title and geſture, yeeld my ſoule comfort in the day of feeling what all ſin meriteth at the hands of God? I reade quoted out of Chryſoſtome, a complaint which may fitly be thought of in our dayes; Vt diabolus, ita inquit, etiam, quilibet facit hæreticus vehementiſſimus in tempore perſecutionis. Loquens cum pontifice, nec eum vocat pontificem, nec Archiepiſcopum, nec religioſiſſimum, &c. As the devill, ſo ſaith he, doth every earneſt and vehement heretick, when once he is touched or troubled for his fault. Speaking with the Biſhop, he neither calleth him Biſhop nor Archbiſhop, nor moſt religious, nor holy: But what? Common names he giveth unto him, as, your reverence, your wiſdome, your prudence, your juſtice, denying his authority. This then did the devill in God. Which, whether ſome come very neere unto in our dayes, or rather be not all-out ſo good as this, I appeale to your knowledge, and ſo no more. Certainly beloved, it is worthy marking, and may make us wiſe, ſeeing Satan to run over his old leſſons againe to ſuch as will learne them at his hand. Another man ſaith thus: Sicut rem ipſam, ita & in ſcribendo morem obſervare noſtrarum partium ducimus eſſe. As we obſerve the matter of mens writings, ſo is it our part to obſerve the manner alſo. And what hath been the maner of reverencing men with titles in old time: Surely not ſparingly, not grudgingly, but fully, largely, and heartily. Ignatius, who lived in the Apoſtles time, writing but to a Deacon uſeth all theſe titles, Honorato à Deo, exoptatiſſimo, ornatiſſimo, Chriſto ſpirituq; pleno, germano filio in fide & charitate, Diacono Chriſti, famulo Dei; To the honored of God, to the moſt wiſhed, moſt excellent, full of Chriſt and the holy Ghoſt, his true ſon in faith and love, the Deacon of Chriſt, the ſervant of God. And what was the cuſtome then thinke we to men of higher place? I could eaſily ſhew it, if it were my purpoſe. Quod ait Paulus, Apoſtolus Ieſu Chriſti, tale mihi videtur quaſi dixiſſet præfect' Prætorio Auguſti Cæſaris, magiſter exercit' Tiberii Imperatoris;

Epiſt. 10. ad Hierom.

Ex Annalibus prædict. loco prædict.

That Paul intitleth himſelfe an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, ſaith Hierom, it ſeemeth to me as much as if he ſhould have writ, the chiefe ruler of Auguſtus Cæſars palace, or the maſter of the hoſt of Tiberius the Emperour. Meaning, he thought the one as great and honourable as the other, and as lawfull for Miniſters to have titles of honour, to worke reverence and ſubmiſſion to their places, as for others. Which he inſinuateth after, when he ſaith, he intituled himſelfe thus highly, Vt lecturos nominis autoritate deterreret; That he might feare the readers with the authority of his name.

Wherefore beloved, let us never envy any man, nor for malice deny any man, what his place yeeldeth unto him. Neither let us give it with hollow heart. For ſurely ſuch a heart towards men in place over us, yeeldeth no comfortable teſtimony unto our conſciences that we are come unto Chriſt, if we examine it. The Lord hath ſaid, meaſure unto all men good meaſure, heaped up and preſſed downe. And what wee give wee ſhall receive againe in his promiſe. If wee grudge other men what is due to their places, ſome ſhall riſe up and requite us in our places; for God is juſt, and God is true, who hath vowed, that as we meaſure to others, we ſhall receive againe good and bad.

Neither may then, beloved, pride outward, or pride inward, pride of body, or pride of minde, aſſure your hearts that we are come to Chriſt. No more can a falſe faith to the ſtate wee live in, nor that lamentable diviſion amongſt us, as it is maintained this day, nor yet a hollow heart to ſuperiours by grieving at their geſture or title due to them, doe it.

Dan. 5.

What ſhould I ſay of one thing moe, and ſo paſſe away from this examination, and that is a luſting, longing, coveting minde, to have the ſpoile of Church and Church living, ordained at the firſt, and to this day continued, to the maintenance of learning and knowledge amongſt us, may that prove unto him that hath it, that he is the childe of God, and come unto Chriſt, by the Fathers giving? Then would not God have viſited with ſo ſtrange a ſight the ſonne of that notable Church-robber Belſhazzar, making even then, and at the ſame houre, the fingers of a mans hand write upon the wall of the palace where the King ſate, that God had numbred his Kingdome, and finiſhed it, weighed him in the ballance, & found him too light, divided the Kingdome, and given it to the Medes and Perſians, even then I ſay, and at the ſame houre, when he was drinking with his Princes, wives and concubines, in the veſſels of gold and ſilver, which were taken from the houſe of God. Hath God no more hands in heaven or earth, at his commandement, to write wrath againſt ſuch in our dayes as itch to have not only the veſſels of gold and ſilver, if any poore ones be, but land and living, ſtone and timber, lead and iron, and whatſoever remaineth at this day, a comfort to poore ſtudents, that have ſpent their friends many a pound, and an incouragement to learning, that was ever yet accounted a bleſſing in a Kingdome? Beloved, hee hath hands thouſands and ten thouſands thouſands, if once hee beginne. And if lacke of living make lacke of learning, as all wiſe men know, it will in time; and lacke of learning cauſe Gods people to wander upon the mountaines as ſheep without an able ſhepheard: by a due conſequence, ſurely he that had an aking heart to ſee ſuch a ſight in the Goſpell, will as verily as he is God, make their hearts ake one day, that are, or ſhall bee ſinfull cauſers of the ſame. If he ſmote with ſo dreadfull a judgement Ananias and Saphira his wife, to with-hold part of that Church-maintenance which by themſelves was given, will he endure for ever them that take what they never gave? No, no, and that ſhall they know when peradventure it will be too late to be ſorry for it. Did theſe men ſee what my ſelf have ſeen and divers yet living with me, that can witneſſe the ſame as well as I, what twitching torments of a wounded conſcience, what helliſh gripes of deſpairing feare never to ſee the face of God, but to periſh for ever with reprobates and caſtawayes, ſo we have had, for detaining, or retaining but a ſmall portion of ſuch maintenance, as now is thought the beſt cheat that can be caught, haply it would, nay, aſſuredly it would (except hell and death had already taken poſſeſſion) abate the luſt, and aſſwage the longing that they have to devoure the incouragements of learning, that yet remaine unſpoiled in this land. But what they have not ſeene in others they may feele in themſelves too ſoon and ſharp, if nothing will perſwade them. Thou art dead, O Shunamite, that intreatedſt thy huſband to build for the Prophet a chamber, and to furniſh it, but thy memory is bleſſed with God and man, and a witneſſe ſhalt thou be in the day of judgement, againſt pullers downe of the houſes built by men and women of devotion and piety, for the Prophets and Children of the Prophets, to attaine to learning in, till they were able to ſerve abroad. But I have elſewhere at large laid downe this fearefull ſinne, and therefore I will referre any thither that pleaſe to conſider further of it.

Feare this judgment you Church-robbers.

Preface to my Book upon the Commandements. Other ſinnes among us.

Since then none of theſe fruits, amongſt us this day, doe prove unto our conſciences that we are come to Chriſt, I truſt you thinke adultery and whoredome, ſwearing and forſwearing, drunkenneſſe and riot, oppreſſion and cruelty, fraud and deceit in buying and ſelling, and ſuch like, can much leſſe doe it. And theſe are the workes that moſt we ſhew forth. How then doe we ſtand concerning our election, which is knowne by comming to Chriſt, and our comming to Chriſt, by faith, and faith by fruits? Certainly as yet, ſuch men as theſe have but cold comfort.

What

What then? ſhall we ſay all ſuch as are ſpotted with theſe vices, are by and by reprobates? God forbid. For my text doth not ſay, All that the Father giveth mee, is come unto mee, but ſhall come unto mee, (to wit) in time. Therefore what I have ſaid doth not determine of the Lords ſecret, but denyeth unto us any comfort and knowledge of the ſame, as yet by ſuch fruits as theſe are. Which is cauſe enough to make us looke about us, and beware. For what true comfort may all the world yeeld mee, if I finde no ſteps of my election to life in mee. Yet ſince the Text is as it is, that they ſhall come, not that they are come, ſee the ſweetneſſe of it, and taſte it, and take it with you. It ſheweth thus much to us, that there is yet mercy with God, and time to amend. Though hitherto upon ſuch fruits as theſe, neither you, nor I, nor any fleſh living, can ground any good eſtate like to enſue us in the world to come but even that flat contrary; yet wee may come to day, all in time, by true repentance, and ſhewing forth hereafter fruits of a true and living faith: that faith ſhall ſhew our comming to Chriſt; and that comming the Fathers giving, and ſo hereafter we have comfort of that which, as yet, by the true ſequell of this Text we have not had.

Yet there is time to repentance.

A fit opportunity were here then to perſwade amendment to all eſtates, if the time were not too farre ſpent. As yet turne and live; as yet turne and ſhew that you were the Lords from everlaſting, though ſtraying and ſtarting aſide for a time, and not throughly called. As yet brethren give diligence to make your calling and election ſure by good fruits, even ſuch as the Apoſtle there nameth; For if you doe theſe things (ſaith he) you ſhall never fall. There being by this meanes an entrance miniſtred unto you abundantly unto the everlaſting kingdome of our Lord and Saviour Ieſus Chriſt. This is comfortable that we may yet come, and let us not neglect it. So ceaſe I further to move you in this matter, hoping no man to day, hearing Gods voyce, will harden his heart, and perſwading himſelfe, either that he is come when indeed hee is not, or preſuming that hee may come when he will, though he doe deferre it, which indeed he cannot, before ever hee doe come, periſh and be damned.

2 Pet. 1. 10, 11.

Laſtly, by this manner of ſpeech [ſhall come] certainty of comming is noted firſt or laſt, though no time limited, a great comfort againe to Fathers for their unreformed children, to Paſtors for their unreformed ſheep, and to all men for their unruly friends whom they wiſh well unto, and yet cannot prevaile by perſwaſion withall. Feare not, if they bee Gods, firſt or laſt, good counſell ſhall be followed, and they ſhall come, as this Scripture ſaith. Till which time endure their delay with hope; and though they offend greatly by provoking God ſo long, yet yeeld you God honour by beleeving his Word, and expecting their calling, according to the promiſe of the ſame, in comfortable patience.

A comfort againſt deſpiſers of reformation

3. Part.

THe entertainment that ſuch as come to Chriſt, ſhall finde with him, is laid downe in theſe words: [Non ejicio, I caſt not away.] The words are plaine, and therefore let us but conſider the uſe of them, and ſo haſte to an end.

1. Firſt then, they containe a ſingular comfort againſt the wringing thought of our unworthineſſe, being in ſenſe, as if the Lord Ieſus ſhould ſay: feare not though baſe, though ſinfull, poore and of no account in the eye, either of thy ſelfe, or others: for, if thou commeſt to mee, thou art welcome notwithſtanding theſe, and I never caſt away him that commeth. True beloved, true, and moſt true, bleſſed bee his Majeſty for ſuch goodneſſe. Publicans and ſinners, poore Fiſhermen and deſpiſed Gentiles hee hath entertained with all mercy and favour, as wee know. Come unto me all ye that travell and are heavy laden, carryeth with it no exception of poverty or baſeneſſe, but reacheth out comfort to all commers, be they never ſo meane in the eyes of men; Ego reficiam vos, I will refreſh you. At what time ſoever a ſinner repenteth himſelfe from the bottome of his heart, I will put all his wickedneſs out of my remembrance, ſaith the Lord. Hath it any exception of unworthineſſe againſt any true repenter? If thy ſinnes were as red as ſcarlet, I will make them as white as ſnow, noteth it any caſting away of any that is truely ſorrowfull? No, no. And therefore this ſpeech is true, He that commeth to me I caſt not away. David ſo dead by adultery and murther, hee caſt not away, when repentance cryed heartily, Lord forgive. Paul a moſt fierce Saul perſecuting the Saints of God, was not caſt away when he came. Peter with perjury and ſinfull denyall was yet received when he came. Mary with her ſeven devils, was not caſt away. He that ſorrowfully ſaid, Lord I beleeve (to wit, as I am able) helpe my unbeliefe, found his ſweet comfort notwithſtanding imperfection. In a word, He that commeth unto mee, I caſt not away, have all true commers to Chriſt found ſince the world was, and ſhall doe till it end againe, heaven and earth paſſing, but not a jot of this Word of God failing in truth and ſweetneſſe promiſed.

The firſt Vſe. Comfort againſt unworthineſſe.

Pſa. 51.

2. Another ſweet uſe of theſe words is this, Comfort againſt contempt in the world, and diſdaine of proud ones: Thou commeſt to their houſes, tables and companies, being poore and and ſimple, but a true fearer of God and his Lawes, and what entertainment haſt thou? Surely this, thou art caſt out and contemned. For either they cannot bee merry whileſt thou art in place, or the pride of their places ſeeme nothing ſutable to ſo ſilly a gueſt? Farewell they, and behold thy comfort here, Jeſus Chriſt caſteth thee not away if thou come to him, and therefore bleſſe him, love him, and ſtill more and more in all thy occaſions reſort to him, leaving thoſe proud Peacocks to the will of him that hateth them and their ſinfull contempt of their brethren, and his moſt deare ſervants.

The third Vſe. A patterne for Governours.

3. A third Uſe is this, to Magiſtrates and Rulers, Judges and Governours, unto whom come thouſands, with ſorrow in their hearts, and little money peradventure in their purſes: O caſt them not away as neare as you can, without your comfort. Their ſpirits are troubled, their injuries be great, their skill but ſmall to move your affectiõs by any orderly tale. But this Scripture is written, and let it move you, and move you greatly, that your Lord and Maſter caſteth none away that come to him: Hee in nature, and you in office, bee gods of comfort to poore commers; the fewer you caſt away, the liker to him, and if you caſt none away, then likeſt of all: and what better patterne of liked life than Chriſt our Lord? O happy man that followeth him, and riding on horſe-backe, caſteth a comfortable eye downe to him that walketh a foot by his ſide telling his caſe, as panting and breathing, and feare of ſome greater man to come and carry you from him, will give him leave. Yea, ô happy man I ſay againe; for in earth ſuch an one ſhall be bleſſed, praiſed, and prayed for, and in heaven no more caſt away, than he hath caſt others, but received and comforted as he hath done others.

Be mercifull, as your heavenly Father is mercifull.

The fourth Vſe To prove the certainty of our ſalvation.

4. Fourthly, it moſt notably implyeth the certainty and aſſurance of our ſalvation. For, if the conſtancy of Chriſts love to all that come unto him, bee ſuch, that hee never caſteth any of them away, judge in your owne ſelfe, if once you finde the aſſurance of your comming, whether your ſafety bee not ſealed in the word of Gods truth, that you can no more periſh than hee be untrue. Lay this Text then to many Scriptures moe that moſt comfortably deliver this Doctrine to us. To the firſt Pſalme, which ſaith, the man that is once come to Chriſt by a true beliefe in his name and life, as God enableth, according to ſuch faith, is like a tree planted by the water ſide, whoſe leafe ſhall never fade nor fall away, for want of moyſture, never, never. To the two and thirtieth of Ieremy, where promiſe is made, that the covenant with ſuch as are come unto him ſhall bee everlaſting, that he will never turne away from them to doe them good, but will put his feare in their hearts, that they ſhall not depart from him. Which place Auguſtine often urgeth, and ſetteth it as a wall of braſſe againſt doubt herein by any man. To the teſtimonie in Matthew againe, where it is ſaid, They ſhould deceive the very Elect (if it were poſſible;) if it were poſſible, againe I ſay, and ever remember it. To the tenth of John, where our Saviour ſaith, I will give my ſheepe (that is, ſuch as our Text to day calleth commers to him) eternall life, and they ſhall never periſh, neither ſhall any pluck them out of my hands. With a number ſuch places moe, all proving and preaching this truth of God unto us, that once finde in our ſelves a true comming to Jeſus Chriſt by faith and obedience, the two heads of all Religion, and conclude a comfort more ſweet than tongue can tell: our ſalvation is ſure when this life is ended; for this Text is plaine, with all elſe now named; He that commeth to me, I never caſt away. Shaken wee may bee, and dangerouſly tempted, as God ſhall thinke good, but periſh wee cannot, if theſe Scriptures bee true. Peter is a patterne what may befall us, and Peter is a proofe of Gods goodneſſe towards us: of whom Tertullian ſaith thus; Fidei robur concuſſum fuit, ſed non excuſſum; mota fuit fides, ſed non amota; cœpit areſcere, ſed non exaruit; ore Deum negavit, ſed corde tenuit: The ſtrength of his faith was ſhaken, but not ſhivered in pieces; moved it was, but not removed; it began to drie, but it withered not quite; with his mouth he denyed God, but his heart did not fully and finally let him goe. Thus farre may we fall, (which yet God forbid) and by the mercy that raiſed him, riſe againe Folia dejicit Spiritus tentatoris, vivit tamen radix: Well may the tempter caſt downe our leaves that declared us to live, and yet ſhall the roote remaine alive, though it bee not ſeene, ſaith Theophylact.

Ioh. 10. 28.

Note.

Foully fell David we all know, and felt a fearfull change in his heart, when he cryed, O Lord, let me feele the comfort of thy Spirit againe; yet finally forſaken he never was, nor caſt away.

The ſtory of Maſter Glover.

Notable is the ſtory of Maſter Robert Glover, in the Acts and Monuments of our Church, to ſhew how ſhrewdly a Child of God may be ſhaken and humbled, and yet all well in time again. M. Glover, to my remembrance having received ſentence to be burned for his faith, was in the priſon, after, ſo bereft of all ſweet comfort and feeling of the Spirit in his ſoule, and inwards, that he ſeemed rather to himſelfe, as it were forſaken, than otherwiſe, of God and his grace. Divers godly brethren, to whom hee made great lamentation for this his dulneſſe, comforted him with Gods promiſes, aſſuring him in the truth thereof, that it would be otherwiſe with him in due time, though thus it pleaſed God to humble him for a while haply (as indeed it was) that it might be more ſweet whē it came. Say what they all could, he received no taſte of ſweetneſſe, but remained ſtill all dull and heavy, and dead in himſelfe. The time of his death came, he thus void of comfort, a dolefull and heavy caſe if we thinke of it. The Brethren applyed him

ſtill with their comfort, bad him not feare, for as ſure as the Lord lived, who never forſaketh his in their moſt need, the Spirit would come againe yet ere he dyed. And becauſe they were moſt ſure of it, grounding themſelves upon Gods promiſes, which never faile, therefore they entreated him, that when it came hee ſhould give them a ſigne, or by ſome meanes or other make them acquainted with it, both for their comfort preſent, and inſtruction ever in the like tryall; he promiſed that he would. And now ſee the wonderfull worke of God, being taken out of priſon, and upon his way to the place where he muſt die; ſuddenly in the way came ſuch a ſtreame of ſweetneſſe into his heart, and ſuch a power of the Spirit repleniſhed his ſoule, that he cryed with a loud voyce, He is come, he is come, he is come; to the unſpeakable comfort of the godly Brethren that had aſſured him thereof before, and the great wonder of them that knew not what he meant: never being ſo heavy in the time of his humbling, as now hee was joyfull after his lightning. Tryed therefore (I ſay) Gods children may bee, and ſeeme as forſaken, but yet in the end it is not ſo, my Text being true, as God is true: Hee that commeth to mee, I never caſt away. Stand we therefore in the truth of God with aſſured comfort of our happy end, when once we finde we are truly come to Jeſus Chriſt by the Fathers giving; For whom the Lord loveth, to the end he loveth, and Ieſus Chriſt is yeſterday, and to day, and the ſame for ever.

Iohn 13.1.

Heb.13.8.

To beleeve God is far from preſumption.

But, O preſumption, preſumption, crie ſome, that never knew or elſe would not have the people of God to know what true piety meaneth! Papiſts I meane, who in no caſe can abide this doctrine, being a cut-throat to their Purgatory, Maſſes and ſatisfactory workes, all flowing from a fearfull uncertainty what ſhal become of us, and deviſed by them, to comfort their fearfull thought withall. Alas beloved, is this preſumption to give credit to God when hee promiſeth; yea, againe and againe, and twenty times promiſeth? Make the caſe your owne, and ſuppoſe that your ſelves doe promiſe a man either payment or pleaſure, or ſome thing or other, and the party reſteth upon the truth of that word, aſſuring himſelfe it ſhall never faile, but is as ſealed with a thouſand ſeales: Doth this man offend in preſuming, or rather yeeld you the credit that is due unto you, you meaning with all truth the performance of your word? So is this caſe, yea, ſo much better as God exceedeth man in truth of meaning, and power to performe what he promiſeth. God ſaith, I will not caſt him away that commeth; or, I doe never caſt him away. If I beleeve this to be true, doe I preſume or performe my duty in giving credit to the Lord? Nay, is not the doubting of it a fearfull diſhonour of God, and detracting from his truth? Surely, if a man ſhould doubt one of your words, you will make it and take it a wrong, and ſhall it bee no wrong to doubt of God? much more. Therefore let theſe ſinfull men delight in their owne diſcomfort and the Lords diſgrace, till God open their eyes; let you and mee bee of Auguſtines judgement in this matter; Non eſt iſta ſuperbia elati, ſed confeſſio non ingrati; This is not any pride of one puffed up, but a confeſſion of one that is not unthankfull.

If any man thinke yet this doctrine of aſſurance will make men careleſſe how they live, I have anſwered before this Objection, and ſhewed, that it is never ſo in them that are truly religious and truly taught, becauſe they know God hath as well appointed the way, as the end; that is, holy life, as well as ſalvation in heaven: And, Pietas quæ finem novit, non eſt pietas; Piety that ceaſeth was never Piety.

Laſtly, theſe words teach us conſtancy in love and affection one towards another, as our Lord and Saviour is moſt conſtant towards all that come unto him. Wee are too fickle and tickle many of us, to day taking, and to morrow forſaking; to day loving, and to morrow loathing, without any cauſe in the world other than our owne naturall corruption, ſoon hot, ſoone cold. Such is not our God and Saviour wee here ſee, who never rejecteth whom once hee accepteth, never caſteth away who once come unto him. And what better patterne to frame our ſelves unto than ſuch an one? Such was not Ruth, who anſwered her mother in Law, that would have had her returne and ſaid; Intreat me not to leave thee, nor to depart from thee; For whither thou goeſt I will go, where thou dwelleſt I will dwell, thy people ſhall be my people, and thy God my God. Where thou dyeſt I will die, and there will I be buried. The Lord doe ſo to me and more alſo, if ought but death doe part thee and me. This was ſtedfaſtneſſe worthy praiſe, and an example for all to follow, that in this behalfe will be worthy of praiſe. Such againe was not Trajan the Emperour, of whom it is written, that when Sura Licinius, one whom he greatly truſted, was accuſed to him that he was not faithfull, but practiſed treachery againſt him; Trajan would not be induced to ſuſpect his faith, whom long he had loved and duly tryed, but in ſtead of that frowne with the appurtenances which the accuſers looked for, went to Sura his houſe unbidden, and told him he would ſup with him, called for Sura his Barber, and cauſed him to ſhave him, every way continuing his received liking of a faithfull falſly accuſed friend, to his great honour, Sura his great comfort, and the accuſers great griefe that ſaw it. This againe was conſtancy worthy praiſe in a noble Emperour. A glaſſe for all Noble-men and great men to looke in, that the like vertue may win the like praiſe, and their poore, faithfull, true friends and ſervants like comfort. The very ſame honour for conſtancy in his affection, got Alexander the Great, in his life, and keepeth it yet to this day in the monuments of learning, for giving no credit to ſuch as accuſed Conſtancy in God teacheth us to be conſtant one to another.

Ruth 1.16.

Yet ſaid he wel, Tua cautio, O princeps, noſtra cauſio eſt. Cic. pro Marcel.

Philip his Phyſitian, that he meant to poyſon him, being hyred ſo to doe by Darius. For the next phyſicke he had need of, he cauſed the ſame Philip to make him a potion, and taking the ſame with one hand, delivered Philip the Letter that accuſed him with the other, drinking off the potion without any ſtay or doubt, either then or ever afterwards. But what ſhould I trouble you with many of theſe examples, my Text is in ſtead of ten thouſand thouſands of them, Jeſus Chriſt our Saviour is conſtant, and loveth to the end, whom hee once loveth, caſting not away for malice of man or Devill, whom once he receiveth being come unto him. Thinke therefore of this, and let this reforme our wavering wils, our tottering love, and unſtable affections, together with that of Salomon, if you will; Omni tempore diligit qui amicus eſt: He loveth ever that is a true friend. And let this ſuffice. I might note a true comfort in this conſtancy of our Saviour againſt the bluſtering threats and thundering Excommunications of Pope and Papiſts, Sectaries and Anabaptiſts, who ſhall never bee able to hurt ſuch as have the true comfort of their comming to Chriſt, by a lively faith in their conſciences. But the time is paſt. The God of heaven give this which hath beene ſpoken his bleſſing, that it may be a ſavour of life unto us, and never a ſavour of death unto death, to the praiſe of his Name, and our eternall comfort, through Ieſus Chriſt our Lord, Amen, Amen.

2 KINGS CHAP. 5. VERS. 13,14,15,16.

13 But his Servants came, and ſpake unto him, and ſaid; Father, if the Prophet had commanded thee a great thing, wouldeſt thou not have done it? how much rather then, when he ſaid to thee, Waſh and be cleane?

14 Then went hee downe and waſhed himſelfe ſeven times in Iordan, according to the ſaying of the man of God: and his fleſh came againe, like unto the fleſh of a little childe, and he was cleane.

15 And hee returned againe to the man of God, hee, and all his company, and came and ſtood before him, and ſaid; Behold, now I know that there is no God in all the world, but in Iſrael: now therefore I pray thee take a reward of thy Servant.

16 But he ſaid, As the Lord liveth (before whom I ſtand) I will not receive it. And he would have conſtrained him to receive it, but he refuſed.

HAving elſe-where of late (Right Honourable) conſidered of this Chapter to this place, I have thought good to goe forward with thus much more of it at this time, hoping it ſhall not bee judged unfit for this place, and theſe dayes wherein wee live. The words read, as wee ſee, are parcell of the Story of Naaman the Syrian, a Story ſo well knowne unto us, that I ſhall not need to make any long rehearſall of it. In few words, for orders ſake, thus much. Naaman was a mighty man, and very honourable in the Court of the King of Syria, and even with the King himſelfe very highly eſteemed. The reaſon is alledged in the Story; namely, becauſe by his hand the Lord had delivered the Kingdome from great danger: thereby the Spirit of God teaching vs, that there is not in this world a more juſt cauſe of honourable regard, and moſt high account to be had and made of a man, not onely with people, but even with Prince, than faithfull love and fruitfull ſervice to King and Countrey: as the contrary is moſt worthy alſo of all hatred, ſhame, and confuſion. But amidſt all this honor (ſaith the Story) Naaman was a Leper, an ugly and grievous diſeaſe wee all know, even in a poore man, but in one of ſuch place farre more grievous. Wee learne and ſee by it how often God thinketh it good to ſeaſon the pleaſures and glory, that otherwiſe he vouchſafeth great men in this world, with ſome humblings and chaſtiſements, either maladies in body, or miſeries in minde, from which yet after triall and exerciſe of them to his pleaſure, he is able to releaſe them, as he did here Naaman, if it ſhall be good for them. The Story againe telleth us, there was dwelling with Naamans wife an Iſraelitiſh maid, taken by the Syrians as they ſcouted abroad, and placed with her. This maid ſeeing her Lord and Maſter his wofull eſtate, like an honeſt ſervant pitied it, and wiſhed that her Lord were with the Prophet in her Countrey, doubtleſſe he would heale him. The words of the maide were brought to Naamans hearing, he yeelded to the wiſh, and intended a journey to the Prophet, acquainteth the King his Maſter with his deſire, who not onely gave him leave, but writ alſo his Honorable Letters to the King of Iſrael in his behalfe: which Letters were wonderfully miſtaken when they were read, as if a quarrell by them ſhould be ſought againſt him, ſo that he rent his cloathes for griefe and anger at theſe Letters. The Prophet Eliſha hearing of this behaviour in the King, ſent word to him to ſend Naaman to him, and hee ſhould know that there was a Prophet in

Leproſie. Great men have their humblings.

Iſrael. Upon which meſſage Naaman came to him, and received this direction, that hee ſhould goe waſh ſeven times in Iordan, and he ſhould be whole. But ſo farre was he from joying to heare of health after this ſort, that he took it to be a meere mockery of him, and brake out into words, that hee looked the Prophet ſhould have come forth to him, and have laid his hands on him, prayed for him, and ſo have healed him: as for water and waſhing, Are not Abanah and Pharpar (ſaith he) rivers of Damaſcus, as good as the waters of Iſrael? &c. In which chafe and choler his ſervants ſpake unto him, as wee have now heard. Father (ſay they) if the Prophet had commanded thee a great thing, wouldeſt thou not have done it? how much more this that he ſaith, Waſh and be cleane? &c. This is the Story.

Now for the words read, if we marke them, they offer unto our conſideration foure things:

- First, the ſpeech of the Servants to their Lord.
- Secondly, his yeelding thereunto.
- Thirdly, the fruit of his obedience, Health.
- Laſtly, his thankefulneſſe when he was healed.

The ſpeech of the Servants againe, hath in it to be obſerved:

- The ground from whence it came.
- The manner of it.
- The matter of it.

- To whom he yeeldeth: even to his Servants.
- In what ſort: readily, without checke or ſnub.

The fruit or effect, being his Health; hath in it,

- How it was obtained, to wit, by waſhing in Iordan.
- How many times: ſeven times.

His thankfulneſſe (laſtly) hath in it,

- To whom, to wit, to { God. / The Prophet. }
- In what ſort, vehemently, not onely formally.

Concerning the firſt, the ſpeech of the Servants: and therein, firſt, the ground from whence it came. What was it, but a loving, a true, a dutifull, and an affectionate heart to the good of their Maſter. This made them ſpeake, this made them venture, this made them bold to perſwade with him as they did. A thing that ever God required in his Servants, and a thing that ever God hath honoured with his bleſſings upon it, and remembrances of it in his word, Epheſ. 6. Servants (ſaith the Lord) obey them that are your Maſters, with feare and trembling, that is, with careſull reverence in ſingleneſſe of your heart, as unto Chriſt. Not with eye-ſervice as men-pleaſers, but as ſervants of Chriſt, doing the will of God from the heart. With good will, ſerving the Lord, and not men, and know yee, that whatſoever good thing any man doth, that ſame ſhall hee receive of the Lord, whether he bee bond or free. With what remembrance is the ſervant of Abraham regiſtred in the book of God, for his faithfulnes and love to his Maſter, that having received in charge to go ſeek a fit match for his Maſters ſonne amongſt his owne kindred, from whom he was then farre ſeparate by the commandement of God, that willed him to remove as he did, the ſervant fell on his knees to the Lord for direction, every way in that buſineſſe to his Maſters good: would not eate nor drinke when he came to the place, till hee ſaw how he ſhould ſpeed, &c. How alſo is Iacob ſpoken of, as a true ſervant as ever man had? How Ioſeph? how many moe for their true hearts and faithfull ſervice to their Maſters? Therefore deare and precious (I ſay) was ever this diſpoſition in ſervants, that here we ſee in Naamans ſervants to day: Love to Maſter is love to God, ſervice to Maſter is ſervice to God, and ſo reputed, eſteemed, and bleſſed of God. Now if we ſhould aske by what meanes this love was wrought in the ſervants to their Maſter, certainly (with great probability we may ſay) it was by the honourable uſage of them by their Maſter: for the whole ſtory ſpeaketh of Naaman as a very honourable minded man to all ſorts. A remembrance that way againe to Maſters, to regard their poore ſervants with comfort and favour, as ſhall be fit, if they wil poſſeſſe their hearts as they own their bodies for their times. For this is it that pierceth with a ſugred ſweetnes, even to the reines of a man, and maketh him think no toile of body or braine too much for ſo good a Maſter. Example Ioſeph, who inflamed in heart with his Maſters moſt honourable favours to him, in putting him ſo in truſt, that hee knew not what he had under his hand, defied all wickedneſſe, temptations, and baits againſt him, whatſoever they might gaine him in the world. The contrary in a Maſter woundeth the heart and the very ſoule of a true ſervant when he ſeeth it. Example Iacob, who ſeeing the countenance of Laban changed upon him, brake into grief, bewailed it to his wives, and as utterly diſcouraged to ſerve any more, purpoſeth a departure, which to Labans great loſſe he performed. I know the Maſters Poeſie is, Deſerve and then deſire, and but good reaſon that deſert ſhould goe before deſire:

deſire: but then when deſert is, and deſire upon deſert to relieve lacke, let not the ſervant ſet downe his Poeſie againe, with mourning mind, Fidelis ſervus perpetuus Aſinus; a good ſervant and a perpetuall drudge. Ieſus the ſonne of Syrach was a wiſe man we all know, and amongſt many precepts he giveth this as one: Let thy ſoule love a good ſervant, defraud him not that beſtoweth himſelfe for thee, neither leave him ever a poore man. Neglect of this hath deprived men of ſuch as were worth gold, and furniſhed them with ſlippery ones in their places, of whom after triall, they were forced to ſay, ὦ φίλοι, οὐδεὶς φίλος, O friends, I find no friend: feeling the truth of this,

Guarded thou art with troopes of men,
But faith thou findeſt ſcarce in one.

The ſervants Poeſie. Chap 7. A note for all Maſters.

Ariſtotle.

Remember here Naaman furniſhed with faithfull ſervants towards him, becauſe he was moſt honourable towards them. Love in Maſter makes love in man, except in forme of man hee bee a Devill.

Having thus conſidered the ground of this ſpeech, let us next conſider the maner of it, which as wee ſee is modeſt, humble, reverent, with the title and tearme of Father, and no worſe. Thus ſpake men in thoſe daies, that taſted but of civility: If more we would ſee, more wee may ſee in the 23. of Geneſis, where the Sichemites ſpake to * Abraham, as to a Prince, Abraham to them againe with all reverence, Aaron ſpeaketh to Moſes his owne brother, with title of Lord; Let not my Lord bee angry, &c. Sauls ſervant that went with him to ſeeke the loſt Aſſes ſaith, Here dwelleth in this towne a Seer, an honourable man. And he that ſpake ſo of the Prophet, would have uſed no leſſe reverence to the Prophet we may well thinke. The Angel himſelfe to a man choſen to office, uſeth reverence and tearmes of honour, God ſave thee Gideon, thou valiant man. Thus (I ſay againe) ſpake men in thoſe daies, to men in authority. But alas, they change now: when wee rime in Verſe, raile in Proſe, and ſinne in both, againſt God and his choſen inſtruments here on earth, moſt fearefully. We ruffell with them as Corah and his company did with Moſes and Aaron, proudly and maliciouſly telling them that they take too much upon them, never remembring the dreadfull judgement that befell thoſe men for ſuch behaviour, nor that which is more, that it is ſaid expreſly in the Text, that it was done, in ſignum, for a ſigne, to wit, of that which ſhall befall firſt or laſt, one way or other, to all thoſe that ever ſhould do the like: For, ſequitur ſuperbos ultor à tergo Deus, The plague of God followeth the proud ſtomack even at the heeles. And moſt notable is it that Chryſoſtome hath to this purpoſe, when he ſaith; Eſto, multum ædifices, habeas eleemoſynas, jejunia, &c. Let it be that thou edifieſt much, haſt almeſ-deeds, faſtings, prayers, and all vertues, if thy heart be proud, malicious, envious againſt thy Superiours, and void of humility; certainly, all theſe are prophane, impure, and abominable in thee. The very ſame judgement had Auſten when he ſaid, If he were asked what was the chiefe thing in piety and religion, and what the ſecond, and what the third, he would anſwere to all, and that all in all were Humility, as the Rhetorician ſaid, pronunciation was in Eloquence. Looke wee then often, even with a religious eye, at this modeſty and reverence in Naamans ſervants, and bee ſure what the wiſedome of God hath not paſſed unnoted in them, hee will not paſſe over unbleſſed in us if wee have it. Hee that tuneth an Inſtrument, and will haſtily hoiſt a ſtring, may haply ſooner breake it than tune it, but by milde and gentle ſtraining hee may bring it to a pitch that ſhall fit his purpoſe. Thus of the manner alſo of their ſpeech.

A tearme given then and ſince to Magiſtrates and men in authority, to teach them with what affection they ſhould love their inferiours, even as children; and how inferiors ought to honor them, even as fathers. Gen. 41. 43. *Gen. 23. Num. 12. 11. How good men ſpeake to men of authority. 1 Sam. 9. 6. Iud. 6. 22. Num. 16. 10. Humility.

The third thing in their ſpeech is the matter of it, which as wee all ſee, is a plaine perſwaſion of their Lord and Maſter, to that thing that diſliked him, that he was offended with, and could not abide to heare of at the Prophets owne mouth. And why perſwade they thus? Surely, becauſe it tended to his good, therefore they adventure to ſpeake. Then theſe ſervants ſoothed not their Lord in his wrong humour, they played not as the reflection of the face doth in the glaſſe, ever performing that ſame geſture that we uſe and no other. In a word, they flattered not either for favour or feare, but with duty ſpake truely to their Maſters good, though his preſent humor carries him then to a contrary courſe. O glaſſe of glaſſes for all men to looke in with great profit, but eſpecially ſuch as in this place now behold and ſee it. For here, here are they, who if they were dealt withall truely and dutifully, would certainly avoid what many times they doe, with great hurt, either to themſelves or others. And whereas the common ſaying feareth many that wiſh the beſt; to wit, Veritas odium parit, obſequium amicos: Truth gets hatred, and flattery friends: without doubt it is not ſo ever, but quite contrary with grave, wiſe, and good men. My warrant is not only Experience, which yet is a ſure teacher, but the expreſſe word of God, that ſaith; He that rebuketh a man ſhall find more favour at the laſt, than he that flattereth with his tongue. The venome of flattery, and the bane that is brought by ſmoothing tongues, no words can utter, no thoughts of heart abhorre ſufficiently. What monſters of men were thoſe ſervants of Abſolon? who to content their Maſters wicked humor, ſlew the Kings ſon, and their Maſters brother in the midſt of the banquet that was made for ſuch a purpoſe. What a wound to the Kingdome gave thoſe flattering young Counſellors, when with their ſmoothing the King in his vaine youth, and croſſing the advice of the old and prudent Counſellors, at one blow they cut from the kingdome of twelve tribes, ten? What an ugly vice in Vriah the Prieſt, was it to follow the Kings humor, and make an Altar, expreſly againſt the word and will of God? Many ſuch filthy flatterers with their harms, could I remember if needfull it were, theſe not ſufficing. Not without cauſe therefore ſaid Antiſthenes once, that it was better to fall in κόρακας, quam in κόλακας, among ravens, than among flatterers: for ravens feed but upon the dead, flatterers upon the living: Ravens eate the body, flatterers devoure the mind, and what vertue ſoever might be in the ſame. Who haſtned as it were, and even pulled out of Gods hand that fearefull plague and judgement upon Herod, to bee ſmitten with the Angel of God ſuddenly, and eaten with lice, but thoſe ſmiling ſmoothers that cried, The voice of God, and not of man. This filthy flattery maketh a Welch Proverb that we have in Wales true, that It is hard to know three things, an Oke, a Day, and a Man: an oke for his privy wind-ſhakes that may be within, ſeem it never ſo faire without: a Day for his variableneſſe of weather, and accidents that fall therein: and a man for his hollow heart when his words are ſofter than Oyle, and moſt comfortable. But let this ſin goe to hell, whither it will carry all that uſe it, without repentance: and let us mark the vertue of theſe ſervants of Naaman, that were ſo far from it. They are dead, & yet live for dealing plainly with duty for their Maſters good, and hating to ſooth him to his harm, & live they ſhall with God aſſuredly that ever uſe it.

The calling of the bidder.

Miniſters words to bee regarded for their calling.

The reaſon of their perſwaſion was an argument drawne from the greater to the leſſe: If the Prophet (ſay they) had commanded thee a great thing, wouldeſt thou not have done it? then much more willingly ſhould this ſmall thing be performed. The grounds of their Antecedent are two: The calling of the bidder, a Prophet (therefore they ſay, If the Prophet, with an Emphaſis in the title and name) and the end of the thing bidden, to attainment of health, and deliverance from ſo grievous a diſeaſe. Either of which, but much more both together, were a ſufficient reaſon to make a man doe a great thing, if it had beene commanded. Being as much in effect and ſenſe, as if they ſhould have ſaid: Sir, his calling firſt is reverent and high, not to be deſpiſed or lightly regarded; Hee is a Prophet, the Miniſter of God, by whom God hath ſhewed his power greatly, as wee have heard, and therefore his words muſt bee of weight, and his direction followed, though hee had injoyned a greater matter. Secondly, what hee willeth tendeth to your health, and to no worſe effect: for hee ſaith, Waſh and be cleane. Now, for a mans health very great things are to bee endured, ſpecially if his griefe bee great. Therefore, as well for his calling that willeth, as the fruit of the thing willed, this counſell of the Prophet would willingly and readily bee imbraced and followed. This is the perſwaſion in ſubſtance, and the grounds they build upon in the ſame. A very plaine, a very true, and a very profitable perſwaſion in whole and in part. Apply it to our ſelves, and it may thus availe us.

Application.

Doe Naamans ſervants ſeem to regard the calling of the Prophet, and to think his words may not be deſpiſed without great folly? Alas, what knew they concerning Gods Prophets and Miniſters, to that which we know this day and this houre? We know the Lord now ſpeaketh not, nor buildeth his Church in this world, by his owne voice in his own perſon, but, He hath given ſome prophets, ſome apoſtles, ſome evangeliſts, ſome paſtors & teachers, for the repairing of the ſaints, for the work of the Miniſtery, & for the edification of the body of Chriſt, till we all meet together in the unity of faith unto a perfect man, &c. And by theſe he teacheth, by theſe he convinceth, by theſe he correcteth & inſtructeth unto righteouſnes. To theſe we know he hath ſaid, Go into all the world and teach, and I will be with you. We know he hath ſaid, Hee that heareth you, heareth me, and he that deſpiſeth you, deſpiſeth me, even me my ſelfe, and mine owne perſon. Non rejecerunt te, ſed rejecerunt me, (ſaid God to Samuel) They have not caſt thee away, but have caſt me away. And it is true in the contempt of any mans miniſtery duly and truely uſed. None of theſe things (as we know them) knew Naamans ſervants, and yet they reverenced, they regarded, and perſwaded their Lord and Maſter to regard, and feared a contempt of ſuch a mans words. What Judges in the dreadfull and judging day of God ſhall they then be againſt us, that knowing what wee know, and convinced in our conſciences with the truth of that wee heare, yet fearefully deſpiſe both ſpeech and ſpeaker, both calling and counſell: and not onely ſo our ſelves, but either by example, or by perſwaſion, or by both, endeavour to effect the ſame in others? A word is enough to men wiſe and learned. God will not endure diſdaine and ſcorne for ever. His owne mouth hath ſaid, he endureth it when his meſſengers endure it. His owne hand will plague it therefore, if he be God, unleſſe we leave it. Cyprian ſaid well, and to this end moſt truely, Qui non credit Chriſto Sacerdotem agenti, credet tandem vindicanti: He that beleeveth not Chriſt when he doth the office of a Miniſter, ſhall beleeve him to his woe, when he doth the office of a Judge. How doth Chriſt the office of a Miniſter, but in, and by thoſe, that bee our Miniſters? beleeve not them then, beleeve not Chriſt, and ſo receive judgement for contempt of Chriſt.

Secondly, was the good of the body (the releaſe from a fleſhly leproſie,) ſuch a matter in theſe ſervants eyes, that for it even great things were to bee obeyed and done? What thinke

we then of good for body and ſoule, of deliverance from ſpirituall leproſie of ſoule, that infecteth to death eternall, both of body and ſoule? ſhould not great things bee endured for that? ſhould not hard things be obeyed and followed for that? Such is the fruit of our miniſtery, and ſuch is the effect of our perſwaſions if they be received. Hoc fac & vive: This doe and thou ſhalt live. In Chriſt and by Chriſt we doe it, when we beleeve and practiſe as we are taught, and God enableth. And thus of the matter of the ſervants ſpeech.

The end of our counſell and preaching farre better than the Prophets now to Naaman.

The ſecond generall head was the obedience of Naaman to the counſell: wherein wee may obſerve, firſt, whom hee yeeldeth unto and followeth: Surely his owne ſervants, men for place ſo far inferiour to him, as ſervants to ſuch noble and honourable maſters be yet their counſell he imbraceth, and their advice, though contrary to his liking, he will not reject. How true then do we ſee it to be, that grave and wiſe men doe not regard ſo much who ſpeaketh, as what is ſpoken? knowing that Sæpe etiam eſt boliter valde opportuna locutus: The poore gardiner many times ſpeaketh greatly to purpoſe. Sæpe ſub ſordido palliolo latet ſapientia: Often under a poore cloake lieth wiſedome ſhrowded and hidden. Dangerous therefore it is, and prejudiciall to good diſcretion, to tie our ſelves to titles and places of men that ſhould counſell us, as willing to regard nothing, except it proceed from ſome man of note, graced with ſome worldly place and title of dignity in the world: for Naaman wee ſee was healed, and received a great good by yeelding to his poore ſervants, when they ſpeake well and to good effect. And we know God himſelfe tieth not his wiſedome ever to men of greateſt note for worldly place, but hath often choſen the fooliſh things of the world to confirme the wiſe, and the weake things of the world to confound the mighty things. And vile things of the world, and things which are deſpiſed, hath God choſen, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are, that no fleſh ſhould rejoice in his preſence. Optimus ille quidem, qui paret recta monenti: The beſt man therefore is he, that imbraceth good counſell, be he never ſo meane an inſtrument from whom it commeth.

Wiſe men regard not ever who ſpeaketh, but what is ſpoken. Dangerous to pinne our ſelves to titles of men 1. Cor. 1.

Next we obſerve how readily and willingly Naaman doth it, making no reply to the contrary, giving them no checke, no ſnub, no rebuke for intermedling with his matters. Certainly, a great vertue and a very honourable mind in him, to the checke of all thoſe that rate and revile, beate downe and diſgrace at the firſt, ſuch as perhaps after they follow, though not ſeeming ſo to doe. Surely, he ſpake it moderately that ſpake it, and it is moſt worthy marking; Si merito reprehenderit quis, ſcito quia profuit, ſi immerito, ſcito quia prodeſſe voluit: If a man rebuke a man, and croſſe his mind with ſome perſwaſion, if there bee cauſe of that perſwaſion, then hath hee profited thee; if there be no cauſe, yet was his heart and mind to profit thee; and that is to be regarded and accepted without any unkind checke ever.

3 And his fleſh came againe like the fleſh of a young child, and he was cleane.] This is the fruit that followed his obedience, he was healed. But you will ſay, did the water of Iordan heale him? No, no more than the clay or ſpittle that our Saviour uſed, gave ſight. But there then that, and now here this, was the meanes that it pleaſed God to uſe, he himſelfe both there and here, healing by his divine power and might. If we ask againe, why ſeven times he waſhed, and was not healed with once or twice waſhing? The anſwer may be this, that as well at once as after ſeven times waſhing God could have healed him, if it had pleaſed him, and without any waſhing at all if he would: for neither the waſhing nor the number availeth any thing to his health: but the one uſed, becauſe ſo it pleaſed God, who uſeth outward things as he pleaſeth, and leaveth them alſo when hee will, and the number of times uſed onely for exerciſe of his faith and obedience. As hee brought the children of Iſrael to the land of Canaan after many yeeres triall, which hee could have given farre ſooner if hee would. Hee could by and by have releaſed Ioſeph from his wrongful impriſonment if he would, yet he let him alone a long time, and all to ſchoole him. David hee could have brought to the kingdome, with halfe the difficulty that he did, if he would, and have delivered alſo Daniel and the three children, before ever they had come into ſuch danger: but thus hee thought good to exerciſe their faith, patience and hope, that much more they might ſhine, having thus beene tried. And this is a note for all weary ſuiters in this place, to take with them. If it pleaſed God he could effect your deſires, and diſpatch you away in a day, but then ſhould not you know what perhaps thus you learne, neither inward faith receive ſuch fruitfull exerciſe, as thus it doth, looking to God, hoping in God, and reſting upon God, to receive from him what ſhall be beſt, and in ſuch time and ſpace as ſhall be beſt. Yet may I not ſay that your profiting any way by your delayes, may bee a juſt excuſe to them, that without any need are cauſes of the ſame. For ſurely the Lord would have all honeſt ſuits with convenient ſpeed ever diſpatched: and that made Moſes firſt ſit himſelfe from morning to night, and after to chuſe others his coadjutors in that buſineſſe, that men might more quickly and eaſily bee relieved. And thus much briefly of Naamans healing.

The fruit of Naamans obedience. God healed, not the water.

Weary ſuiters comfort.

The fourth and laſt thing is his thankfulneſſe when he was healed, ſet downe in words and in deeds, to God, and to the Prophet, and that not formally, but vehemently performed. His thankfulnes to God in words, that he knew now there was no God in all the world, but in Iſrael: In deeds, that he would thēceforth offer neither burnt ſacrifice, nor offring unto any other god, ſave to the Lord.

Naamans thankfulneſſe In words: In deeds.

Both words and deeds, a duty ſweet, performed as it ſhould bee in any man. For what may the Lord more juſtly require for his mercies and benefits than a thankfull heart? Performe this and performe but duty, yet performe this and performe what God eſteemeth highly, and what godly men have ever performed zealouſly. Iacob the great Patriarch, when he conſidered what he had beene, and what he was, and by whoſe meanes he was what he was, how brake out the flame of ſuch ſweet feeling into praiſe and prayer, ſaying: O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Iſaac, &c. I am not worthy of the leaſt of all thy mercies, and of all the truth which thou haſt ſhewed unto thy ſervant; for with my ſtaffe came I over this Iordan, and now have I gotten two bands, &c. God make them that have gotten two bands with Iacob, beginning but with their ſtaffe, as thankfull to the giver, as Iacob was.

Gen. 32. 10.

What felt David when hee cried, Quid retribuam? What ſhall I give, what ſhall I give to the Lord for all his benefits beſtowed upon me? When againe hee cried, O my ſoule praiſe the Lord, and all that is within me praiſe his holy name: O my ſoule praiſe the Lord, and forget not, forget not, forget not his benefits, which gave thee pardon for thy ſinnes, &c. that is, which hath done this, and done that, and done a thouſand things for thee. When againe hee cried, O Solomon, (my ſonne) know the God of thy father: that is, that preſerved thy father, exalted thy father, ſet up thy father, ſo greatly, ſo graciouſly, ſo mercifully, and ſo bountifully, as ever man was: Know him (I ſay my ſonne) and ſerve him with a perfect heart and a willing mind, &c. What felt the bleſſed Virgin Mary, when ſhe cried, My ſoule doth magnifie the Lord, &c. With thouſands moe I might name, ever feeling, and ever thankfull for mercies received. The contrary, to wit, a dull and dead heart in this behalfe, is as odious, on the other ſide, and as damnable as this is ſweet and acceptable. Witneſſe the Lord Jeſus, one for all, and once for all, when he ſaid, Were there not ten clenſed? where are then the other nine? Behold, there is not found that returneth to give thanks but this one. As if hee ſhould have ſaid, O ſinne of ſinnes, ugly and monſtrous, ſo many clenſed, and ſo few thankfull.

1 Chron. 28.

Luke 17.

One writeth a Commentary upon the Booke of Wiſedome, and there in the end telleth many ſtories, moralizing upon them: amongſt which this is one: That a certaine woman named Nepheſtes, being with child, went into the Temple of the gods to aske what it might be that ſhee went withall: unto which deſire of hers, one of the gods anſwered; Fœtus tuus filius eſt, & dabo pulchritudinem: Thy child is a ſonne, and I will give him beauty. Another, Fœtus tuus filius eſt, & dabo fortitudinem: Thy child is a ſonne, and I will give it ſtrength. The third, Fœtus tuus filius eſt, & dabo divitias: Thy child is a ſonne, and I will give him riches. Three great gifts, beauty, fortitude, and riches: yet (ſaith the ſtory) the mother made a tuſh at all theſe, becauſe her heart wiſhed ſomewhat elſe, that was not named, to wit, favour of great perſonages, and long life. Which when the gods ſaw, to reward unthankfullneſſe with a condigne puniſhment, they changed their gifts, and hee that ſaid hee would give beauty, gave the child when it was borne, the head of an Ape: he that ſaid, hee would give ſtrength, gave it for hands Gooſe feet, and for armes, Gooſe legs: the third that ſaid he would give riches, Dedit excoriatum, gave it ſo bare that it had not ſo much as any skinne upon it.

Holcot. in Sap. A ſtory of an unthankfull woman.

Thus was unthankfulneſſe puniſhed: and bee it ſtory or fable, or whatſoever, the drift of it is Gods truth, as true as God, that unthankfulneſſe is odious to the Lord. Naaman therefore a bleſſed man, that had ſuch a feeling heart of Gods goodneſſe towards him. But was hee onely thankfull? No (I ſay) but with an edge he was thankfull, and that alſo is to be noted. His words have an emphaſis in them, and a vehemency: No God, no God, no God, but the God of Iſrael: I will never ſacrifice to any elſe, never, never. Yea, God bee mercifull unto mee, when I ſhall but bow downe in the houſe of Rimmon, by reaſon of the King my maſter leaning upon my ſhoulder, God (I ſay) be merciful unto me, & forgive, but even thus much declining from this my God, that hath thus healed me &c. All which words wee ſee have heate in them, and proceed from a heart that is throughly touched. Away then (ſaith this example) with all formall and frozen thanks, ſuch as commeth not from the heart, and therefore hath ſcarce power to come out of the mouth. but halfe cleaveth in the teeth: Such never God loved, ſuch never Gods children uſed or liked. Mad Machiavel talketh in this, as in other duties of Religion, of a ſeeming, and not a being: but as good a Polititian as he, and farre better, ſaith; O dogma, ad principis pernitiem pariter & ſubditorum! O rule tending to the ſubverſion both of Prince and people! Whatſoever men ſay, the truth of God ſaith, thankfulneſſe to God is to bee performed, not in ſhew, but in truth: not for forme, but with feeling, as here did Naaman. For what is that fire that the Lord Jeſus baptizeth withall, is it colder than water? Why came the holy Ghoſt upon the Apoſtles like tongues of fire? Surely theſe places tell us, that heate in heart, and heate in tongue, is whereſoever Gods Spirit ruleth: and if where there is ſome warmth, that is, a luke-warmeneſſe, yet there the Lord threatneth deſtruction and confuſion, ſaying; Hee will vomit ſuch out of his mouth: how much more where there is none at all? no not even ſo much as a luke-warmeneſſe, but onely a ſeeming, to footle the world withall, and no more. Farre therefore from all Gods children be this wicked paradox, and in ſtead thereof this example of Naaman thus vehemently feeling, and speaking, together with that most certaine and sure truth, that Religiosa pietas solum immobile fundamentum; Religious piety, not seeming piety, is the onely immoveable foundation ever to any man. Thus was he thankfull towards God. Lastly, is to be considered his thankfulnesse also towards the Prophet, together with the earnestnesse thereof againe, and so to end.

Naaman with an edge thankfull, and ſo ought we.

His thankfulnesse to the Prophet is set downe in these words, I pray thee take a reward of thy servant; testifying thereby, that his heart felt with a sweet taste the benefit done unto him by his Ministery: a thing which likewise God ever required, and men of vertue have ever performed, as might by sundry Scriptures be shewed, if it were needfull. But alas, the dayes and times wherein we live, be as farre from sweet conceits towards men, by whom we have beene pleasured, as ever any dayes since the world began. The Galathians, when Saint Paul had taught them the word of God, opened their understanding, and brought them to the faith, thought the very eyes in their heads not too much to bestow on him. Wee in stead of giving eyes, could finde in our heart to take the eyes of them that have begotten us unto Christ, and are the Ministers by whom either first we beleeved, or at least were greatly encreased and profited in beliefe. God turne our hearts, and lay not to our charge in his judging day what the true teachers of Gods eternall testimonies finde at our hands in these dayes. But doe wee deale thus onely with Ministers? No, even the civill Magistrate, whose cares and toyles, no love, no life, no death can ever requite, drinketh of the same cup, and receiveth the same measure at our hands as the Ministers doe; for wee raile, wee rime, wee gird, we glance, wee tell old wives tales of them also.

Our ungratefull dayes. Gal.4.15.

Plutarch reporteth of some Grecians in the life of Flaminius, that Philip being overcome, and liberty proclaimed unto him by Flaminius, they cryed with such a vehemency σωτὴρ, σωτὴρ, Saviour, Saviour, that the very fowles in the ayre fell downe dead with the sound of the crie, and they so pressed to see the face of him that was so good unto them, that time it was for Flaminius to make away, lest the vehemency of the people might have over-run and crushed both him and others. Here was love and thankfulnesse we see most vehement. God doth know, and our soules and consciences testifie unto us this day, how farre we exceed these Grecians in freedome and mercies bestowed upon us, not by a Romane or heathen, but by a most Christian Queene and gracious governour over us (his hand and power that hitherto hath done it, long mercifully preserve her to us.) Where be our cries with these Grecians, σωτὴρ σωτὴρ, Saviour, Saviour? (Woe is me to speake it) some of us crie, and too many of us crie in stead of this, No Church, no Sacraments, no Ministers, no discipline at all, and therefore we must leave all open assemblies in this land, and combine our selves together to erect a forme according to our wils, in woods, in fields, in holes and corners where we can: Yea, with more woe I speake it, some feare not to write, Pharaoh of Ægypt gave the Israelites leave to worship God truly, but our Magistrates, If they should give us leave, yet could we not be suffered for such and such. Making an If, after these infinite mercies powred upon us by God, in the gracious government we live under, and casting downe the governours in merit towards us, beneath Pharaoh of Ægypt. O sinfull If, O damnable and undutifull If! If this be our thankfulnesse towards men, from whom wee have received health, and health not of body, as here Naaman did, but of soule and body infinite and unknowne wayes, without doubt we be no Naamans, a man may sweare wee bee no Naamans, nor Grecians that so felt the friendship of Flaminius, nor men in this behalfe of civill vertue: God make us in the end good subjects.

Note this story

The pamphlet upon Mat.23.

But from whence might this great unthankfulnesse both to Magistrate and Minister arise and flow in these men? Surely the very fountaine is this (as I thinke) that they may not be suffered by either of them to alter and change the Lawes they like not of at their pleasures, not considering or regarding, as may be thought, with that stayednesse of head, and trembling of heart that were to be wished, what either the wisdome of God hath set downe in his word, in conscience to be followed, or what wisdome of men in government and policy expert, have delivered, in discretion to be regarded. For the Word of God, mee thinke the place in the Proverbs, in stead of many moe, should greatly move us, where the Spirit of God saith thus; My son, feare the Lord and the King, and meddle not with them that are seditious; for their destruction shall arise suddenly, and who knoweth the ruine of them both? That are seditious, saith the English, but that are Changers or Variers, saith the Hebrew gnim shonim. And that we might understand what Variers and Changers are meant, Tremelius and Junius saith thus; Cum variis, &c. With Variers, that is, Variers and breakers of the Lawes of God, and of their owne Princes. And finally, by their undutifull and disobedient life, making default of reverence to God and Prince. Cum mutantibus, say others, scilicet leges, &c. With Changers, to wit, of lawes, customes, good rites, and state of a Kingdome; With these my sonne, meddle not, but feare the Lord, and the King: For the destruction of such men shall be sudden, and who knoweth the ruin of them both? For the writings of men, let Augustine both for learning, vertue and experience, weigh something with us, who setting downe that changes sometimes may bee either by adding or detracting, yet setteth this downe as a most tryed truth, that when a change is made, Quæ adjuvat utilitate, perturbat turbant novitate. What it profiteth by his goodneſſe, it troubleth with his uewneſſe. Worthy is the place adviſed reading, and religious marking, if we regard any mens judgements but our owne. Others have joyned with this judgement of Auguſtine, fitly and fully, if need were to ſhew many; Tutiſſime agunt qui præſentibus moribus legibuſque, etiamſi deteriores ſint, &c. They deale moſt ſafely that varying as little as may be from preſent laws and manners in uſe, governe the common wealth thereby, although they be ſomewhat worſe. Poſitas ſemel leges conſtanter ſervate, nec vllam earum mutate, &c. Lawes once eſtabliſhed keepe conſtantly, neither change any of them. For things which remaine in their ſtate and the ſame, although they bee worſe, yet are more profitable to the common-wealth, than thoſe which by innovation are brought in better. Non convaleſcit planta quæ ſæpius transfertur : The plant that is often removed doth not proſper. Sperne circa te novatores, qui ut aliquid videantur afferre ſui, etiam recta commutant. Deſpiſe about thee innovators, who, that they may ſeeme to bring ſomething of their owne, change even right things. Many ſuch things out of wiſe mens writings might be alledged. By which all, as by theſe now named, my conſcience profiteth but onely thus. Not to thinke that what man doth, may never bee changed or bettered, for I have approved Auguſtines judgement before to the contrary, but to learne as much reverence towards things eſtabliſhed by grave and godly advice, as poſſibly there may appeare cauſe in them: to hate raſh buſineſſe, and buſie raſhneſſe, and if things muſt and ought to be changed indeed, then to doe it, if I were a doer, or to ſeeke it, if I be a ſeeker, as that wiſe Orator ſaid, Quam minimo ſonitu: with as little noyſe as may be. Thus in mine opinion might we ſomewhat leſſen the cauſe, and drie up the fountaine, from whence ſpringeth ingratitude now named towards Magiſtrates and Miniſters, and make us crie, as thankfully as ever the Grecians did, of whom I have ſpoken, or as Naaman the Aſſyrian doth whom now we intreate of. God guide us and direct us in his mercy.

Cicero ad Attic. lib. Epiſt. 9.

The heate I ſaid of Naamans thankfulneſſe, was to be obſerved, which Gods wiſedome hath not concealed, but purpoſely noted in this (He would have compelled him) It affordeth us this doctrine, that it is not enough when we have received a benefit from men, to utter a few formall thankes, or to conceive a few fine phraſes, but both man joyeth in, and God himſelfe requireth a heate, a zeale, an earneſt, faithfull, and feeling thankſgiving after God the giver, to man the meanes of his mercy towards us. Naaman had it here in the Text, and God will not conceale it, but utter it for our knowledge. The Leper clenſed in the Goſpell, returned backe, fell downe on his face at JESUS feete, and with a loud voyce gave him thanks: all words and geſtures of heate and heartineſſe in his duty. The blind man when he had received ſight, Followed Ieſus, and praiſed him: followed him (ſaith the ſtorie) which was heat, when a frozen zeale would have ſlipt away after a few formall words. What hearty heat was in Mary for good received, when ſhe lay at his feete, and with teares that came from a raviſhed heart waſhed them, and wiped them with the haires of her head. Was this an ordinary thankfulneſſe, or a heate in her, honoured by God himſelfe, and in us aſſured ever of bleſſing, if we have it? Thankfull therefore wee ought to be not onely to God but to men, for ſo was Naaman, and that fervently, not falſly, for ſo was Naaman.

Luke 16.17.

Why the Prophet would not receive this offered gift at Naamans hands, two cauſes may bee conjectured. One, that he might breed in Naaman a conceit of difference in him, and all true Prophets, from falſe diſſemblers, whereof then were many, with whom all was fiſh that came to net. Another, that he might hereby occaſion Naaman to thinke of God, as the onely giver, worker, and effecter of his health, and not of any vertue in him (the Prophet) thereunto, which haply he might have done, if his gift had beene received. This teacheth us a Doctrine of care to preſerve our honeſt eſtimation in the world with all men, as we may well, and not to robbe GOD of his glory by ignorance in men to diſcerne aright: but the time is gone. The God of mercie and power give his word a bleſſing, make it a ſavour of life unto life to us, and let it never be a ſavour of death unto death: Encreaſe our knowledge, but encreaſe our obedience alſo, according to our knowledge, that we may not onely know what to do, but do it every day, and every way more and more, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord, who with the Father and the holy Ghoſt, be bleſſed, praiſed and honoured, now and for evermore. Amen.

Why the Prophet refuſed his gift.

A care of our name.

Not to robbe God of glory.

2 SAM. 10. VERSE 1,2,3,4.

1. After this, the King of the children of Ammon dyed, and Hanun his ſonne raigned in his ſtead.
2. Then ſaid David, I will ſhew kindneſſe unto Hanun the ſonne of Naaſh, as his Father ſhewed kindneſſe unto me. And David ſent his ſervants to comfort him for his Father. So Davids ſervants came into the Land of the children of Ammon.
3. And the Princes of the children of Ammon ſaid unto Hanun their Lord: Thinkeſt thou that David doth honor thy Father, that he hath ſent comforters unto thee? Hath not David rather ſent his ſervants unto thee, to ſearch the Citie, and to ſpie it out, and to overthrow it?
4. Wherefore Hanun tooke Davids ſervants, and ſhaved off the halfe of their beards, and cut off their garments in the middle, even to their buttockes, and ſent them away, &c.

WEE are met here (Right worſhipfull and beloved in the Lord, all,) as you well know, to celebrate in a lawfull and laudable courſe of humanity, the Funerall of our deare Friend and Worſhipfull Brother, Maſter T. L. Eſquire: a Gentleman ſo well knowne unto every man here, that any ſpeech of mine concerning him ſhall not need. My ſelfe, I thinke, of all here knew him leaſt, and therefore not ſo fit to ſpeake of him moſt. His birth and diſcent by Father and Mother, his Kindred and Friends by either ſide, his Aliances by Mariage, with ſuch like, they are things knowne even to the very younglings here. Which skill, not onely concerning him, but of all others of any note in this Countrey, when I ſpeake of, Lord how it ſtriketh my heart within, to thinke and conſider, not onely how little skill, but how little will alſo is in many of us to bee acquainted with better matter. For you know it, as well as I, and with griefe to, I aſſure my ſelfe, that too many amongſt us able very perfectly to diſcourſe of theſe periſhing Pedegrees, which wiſe men have thought things little belonging to us, if they might have the whole Countrie for their paines, are not able able to tell the diſcent of either Patriark, Prophet, Apoſtle, or any man of note in the Scripture, much leſſe can they utter the holy and comfortable points of ſalvation, belonging neceſſarily unto them. No, he that beateth his braines day and night to bring himſelfe inſerted into ſuch a Gentlemans houſe, never laboureth ſo earneſtly to underſtand the arguments that may aſſure him of his ingrafting into Chriſt, and of his name noted in the line of life. God for his mercy ſake amend it amongſt us, that the one being done moderately and modeſtly, the other may not bee left undone, wickedly and dangerouſly.

The actions alſo of the life of this Gentleman have beene ſtill before your eyes, (being moſt remaining at home, and little delighted to travell abroad,) ſo that every man may make his beſt profit of them towards his owne reformation, without any ſpeech of mine: wherein if I offend any, let them remember with me, I pray them, what is written of that wiſe and eloquent Pericles in Thucydides, and haply it will excuſe me. He being appointed to make ſome remembrance of thoſe that were dead in the honorable ſervice of their Country, was very unwilling to doe it, becauſe, ſaith he, ſo hardly the Auditors in ſuch a caſe can be contented with that which is ſpoken of the dead: ſeeming to thinke, that to ſpeake ſomething, belongeth to the order of kindneſſe, and is neceſſary.

Lib. 2. hiſt.

For if the Speaker take his courſe to praiſe the dead, the Friends thinke all too little that is ſpoken, and that ſtill is omitted ſomewhat which ought of right to have beene mentioned. Yea, they thinke it hard, In uno viro multas virtutes periclitari, ut perinde ac ipſe dixerit ſive bene, ſive male, ita etiã ei fides habeatur, that is, in one man ſo many vertues, (as they imagine their friends had) to be hazarded, that according as he ſhall have will and skill to lay them downe, ſo ſhall their friend be thought of, and no otherwiſe. On the other ſide, if he be a foe that heareth, then thinketh he every thing too much that is ſpoken: Envie repining againſt the praiſe, ſcorcheth him ſhrewdly alſo with the ſlander of flattery that performes the office.

If a man ſhould diſpraiſe, though never ſo truly, every one crieth out, that it is inhumanity, (for, de mortuis, nil niſi bonum, of the dead ſpeake nothing but good) and the friends of the dead eſpecially and greatly are offended. Silence therefore avoideth both extremities.

Laſtly, concerning his death and end amongſt us, it was ſo quicke with him, that his beſt friends, I thinke, ſaw it not ſo neare, till it was even paſt and finiſhed. Whereby wee may all note and profitably obſerve, our fraile and tranſitory eſtate in this deceiving world, preparing for it in our good life, both by yeelding teſtimony of our true faith, which may comfort the living when we are gone, and by ſetling of our eſtates for worldly things, as this Gentleman partly did. If any defect were for matter of devotion, as I hope he repoſed a confidence in others, ſo truſt I the ſame will religiouſly be anſwered, to the comfort of his Friends, of his Servants, of the poore, and to the doing of good divers wayes: remembring what the Spirit of truth ſaith:

2 Cor. 9. He that ſoweth ſparingly, ſhall reape ſparingly, but he that ſoweth plentiouſly, ſhall reape plentiouſly. And that the Lord loveth a cheerefull giver.

Wherefore, omitting any further ſpeech of theſe matters, with thankes to God, for releaſing him out of this ſinfull world, let us endeavour to profit our ſelves by this Scripture now read unto us.

It containeth as we all ſee, theſe three points or principall heads in it:

First, The Embaſſage ſent by David to the yong King of the Ammonites.
Secondly, The diſhonorable abuſing of the Embaſſadors when they came.
Thirdly, The revenge and puniſhment thereof, when it was knowne.

The Embaſſage againe offereth two points.

Namely, 1. The time when it was ſent. 2. The Occaſion why it was ſent.

CCerning the firſt, the Time, we ſee it here to have beene, when the old King Naaſh the Father was dead: dead I ſay, and note it againe, that it may profit us to ſee how no man eſcapeth firſt or laſt, this tale to be told of him, Mortuus eſt, he is dead: no, not Kings, Princes, Peeres and Potentates of this world, be they never ſo great, may avoid it, but die they muſt, as the King of Ammon. All men have one entrance into life, and alike going out, ſaith the Booke of Wiſdome, and there is no King, but it is even with him in this reſpect, as with other men. Many have the yeares beene of ſome men, as we reade in the Scripture, but yet they dyed: Adam lived nine hundred yeeres and thirtie, and dyed: Sheth his ſonne, nine hundred and twelve, and then hee dyed: Methuſela nine hundred ſixty and nine, and then dyed. Yea, this is repeated of them all, ſeverally in that place, that they dyed: purpoſely to worke in all mortall men a due and true conſideration of this decreed end, we muſt away. Omnibus ſtatutum eſt ſemel mori: It is appoin- ted unto all men that they muſt once dye, and after that commeth the judgement. Neither (ſaith the Preacher) doth man know his time, but as the fiſhes are taken in the net, and as the birds are caught in the ſnare, ſo are the children of men in the evill time, when it falleth upon them ſuddenly. Riches or poverty, beauty, or wiſdome, friends or felicities never ſo many in this world, as I have ſaid before, will not prevaile to avert this houre, when God hath appointed it to take hold, but wee muſt then be gone. Eccleſ. 9. 12.

Often I aſſure my ſelfe, you have heard of Xerxes weeping, when he beheld his huge Army, to thinke in what a ſhort time ſo many men, and a number of ſuch Worthies, by death, ſhould be taken away, although they lived their full courſe. Cyrus and Alexander, and all the great ones before them, or ſince, whom the world hath gazed upon in their time, for their ſeverall and ſingular vertues and gifts, this pale and pittileſſe companion Death hath caught them, and caried them from honors and pleaſures, from triumphs and victories, and from friends and deare ones, to the place appointed after this life, and we muſt follow. Dum propagare volunt fines, perdunt propagatos, & imperia relinquunt hoſtibus, ſaid one of them: that is, whileſt they covet to enlarge their territories and poſſeſſions, they loſe what they had gotten, and leave their Empires to their enemies. Even as we reade of Michael Balbus, in the ſtory of Zonaras, a tale both worthy hearing and remembring whileſt we live. This Michael Balbus was ſervant to Leo Armenius, Emperour of the Eaſt, a very unfaithfull and bad ſubject, affecting his Lords place, and not ſparing by undutifull intendments to ſeeke the ſame. The thing is ſuſpected of the Emperour, he convented and convicted upon his owne confeſſion, his judgement given, and the execution appointed, at which the Emperour himſelfe will be: But behold, and thinke of it when you ſee me not. The time fell out to be the preparation to the feaſt of the Nativity of Chriſt, and the Empreſſe hearing of it, commeth to the Emperour, partly intreating him, and partly even preſſing him with urging ſpeeches, that ſo high a Feaſt ought not to bee diſhonoured by any ſuch execution, and therefore prayed that it might bee deferred till the Feaſt was paſt. With much adoe ſhe obtaineth her deſire, and the priſoner is returned to the Goale againe, but with this dolefull divination uttered by the Emperour, that he feared her requeſt would work the woe both of himſelfe and her. That night the Emperour is ſlaine, and the next day the priſoner proclaimed Emperour, who badly requited the Empreſſe alſo, even as her husband feared and had told before. Marke this Hiſtory. Zonar. Annal. tom 3. p. 105. a.

Here is a patterne of moſt ſtrange mutability, and of a falſe World never to be truſted, never to be loved, never to be thought upon, but with an eye to the end, and a religious conſideration what quickly may fall out. Was ever your Welſh proverbe more truly verified than in this ſtory? Po gaſſagan ddyn, neſſa at ydda: He whom a man moſt hateth doth often enjoy what hee leaveth behinde him. Let theſe things then have their uſe in life, as we ſee the doctrine in our judgements. More proofe of our aſſurance to dye is needleſſe; theſe, with this dead corpſe before our eyes are ſufficient remembrances. The uſe is all, which now let us thinke of.

First then, this remembrance that we muſt thus die, yeeldeth our minds a true comfort againſt the feare of death, for why ſhould we feare, what is not to be avoided? or why ſhould wee mourne immoderately for any, when nothing is happened, but what muſt happen to all? When Demonax the Philoſopher ſaw one wayling diſorderly for the death of his friend, hee wiſhed him in that great company to looke about him, if he could finde one who hath never by death loſt any of his deare ones, which when he did, and failed to ſee any, with the community of the caſe he was ſoundly comforted, and ſtayed his courſe which before was reproved. Die we muſt, and die we muſt all without exception, Futurum eſt, debitum eſt, reddendum eſt: It will come, it is a debt, it muſt be paid, therefore let us all be of good cheere, and without any faithleſſe feare expect comfortably what is decreed, deſiring God in our daily petitions to remember us with mercy when we are at the point, and to give us a joyful and comfortable houre of it. Mori nemo timet, niſi qui non ſperat vivere poſt mortem: To dye none feareth, but ſuch an one as hopeth not to live after death, ſaith S. Chryſoſtome. Swans ſing, as we reade of them, and ſhall we inſtructed in the Booke of God, weep immoderately? God forbid. The remembrance of death what uſe it hath in the Chriſtian conſcience.

This decreed death of ours againe aſſureth us of an end one day of all miſery, of all ſorrowes and griefes, croſſes and cruelties whatſoever, within us, or without us, privily or openly, inflicted upon us, or intended towards us, which are ſo many, ſaith S. Ierome; Vt non tam plangendus ſit, qui hac luce caruerit, quam gratificandum ei quod de tantis malis evaſerit: That he that dyeth, is not ſo much to be mourned for, becauſe he is deprived of this life, as to bee rejoyced for that he is delivered from ſuch a ſea of evils. O ignaros malorum ſuorum, &c. ſaith another, O how utterly ignorant are men of the evils incident unto their lives, who thinke not of death as of the beſt invention of nature, ſince it excludeth miſery, bringeth felicity, preventeth the perils of youth, endeth the toiles of age, and deſerveth better of none, than of thoſe, to whom it commeth uncalled for, &c. A ſecond uſe.

Thirdly, this doctrine may profitably remember us never to fall into love over-deeply with this flattering world, for wee muſt leave it, and God knoweth how ſoone, but rather even to A third uſe.

day before to morrow, to ſettle our eſtates, if we may, and to be in a readineſſe for our worldly wills, ſo that neither feare, nor diſtraction any way may diſturbe our mindes, when the parting houre ſhall require in us far other meditations more fit for the time, and more profitable for our ſoules. Surely, ſurely, we are too much glued to this earthly habitation, many of us: and in mans eyes, who reacheth but to our actions, and by our outward ſhew giveth a gueſſe at our inward diſpoſition, we may be thought either never, or very ſlightly to remember death, and that we have no abiding City here. For we care and we carke, we hale and we pull, we toyle and we moyle, and I would God we did not moſt ſinfully ſeeke to enlarge our houſes by damnable meanes, as though we ſaid in our hearts, It is good to be here, and to build, not three Tabernacles, but many, not for Chriſt, nor Moſes, nor Elias, but for this childe and that, this friend and that, in ſuch ſort, that no man can ſee any remembrance of death in us, or that this world is vain. I ſpeake not againſt lawfull proviſion for our ſeverall charges, which the Scripture alloweth, but againſt that intolerable greedineſſe, that ſheweth too much love of this preſent world, and too little feeling and thought of the joyes of heaven, prepared for all that love the Lords appearing, or yet of the ſins of this life, that faſten upon us, whileſt we remaine in it.

Similitudes ſhewing the danger of the love of this world, and of proſperity and eaſe in it.

VVould God I could by any plainneſſe of teaching prevaile with us better to thinke of this point. Conſider with your ſelves (beloved) this ſimilitude in reaſon: The naturall heate that is within us, you ſee, if the ayre be cold about us, is kept in and encreaſed: but if the ayre bee warme and faire, it evaporateth out, the pores being opened, and becommeth leſſe. Verily ſo is it with this world and ſpirituall matters: the ſowrer we find it, the more encreaſeth our feeling of God, if we belong to God, and the more we wiſh to be with God, & out of this world. But if we bathe in pleaſures and earthly delights, living at reſt in our poſſeſſions, and having nothing to vexe us: O how this Sun-ſhine without, diminiſheth our heat within towards God, and how bitter is the remembrance of death to ſuch an one, if we beleeve wiſe Syrach. Therefore dangerous it is to be glued too faſt to this wretched world, and to live in the love of it, as ſome doe. Thinke with your ſelves againe of that ſtory of David, who could not goe when he was fully furniſhed with Sauls Armour about him, but prayed that it might be taken away againe, and he left to his poore ſling, and his five ſtones, which when it was ſo, hee comfortably and couragiouſly marched on, and ſlew that Defier of God and his people, the great Goliah. Surely it is a patterne of the point we ſpeake of. For whileſt we are armed with Sauls Armour, that is, whileſt we are clogged and laden with the weight of this world, not upon our ſhoulders, as that was, but in our hearts and mindes within us, we cannot ſtirre, we cannot doe any commendable thing; but if this weight be taken from us, through either a want, or a grace to governe wealth, that it worke not too much inward, we move, and we goe; yea, we run as did David, to the face of our foe, and prevaile with honour in all good endeavours. Then love not this world I wiſh againe.

Chap. 41.

You ſee by experience againe, the man that ſwimmeth in the river before you, as long as he is able to hold up his head, and to keep it above the water, he is in no danger, but ſafely ſwimmeth, and commeth to land with good contentment; but if once his head for want of ſtrength begin to dive, then ſhaketh he the hearts of all that behold him, and himſelfe may know hee is neere his death. So is it with this wretched world, and ſwimmers in it, of all degrees, if the Lord give us ſtrength to keep up our heads, that is, to love God, to love Religion and vertue above the world, and before it, and all the pleaſures of it, there is no danger; but after a time of ſwimming in it up and downe, we ſhall arrive in a moſt firme place with happy ſafety. But if once we dive, and the head goe under water, that is, if once the world get the victory, and our hearts goe under it in a ſinfull love and liking of it, then take heed, and beware drowning: for aſſuredly there is danger, and our friends may juſtly cry out to ſee us, Alas he periſheth. Love not this world then I ſay, and wiſh againe the third time.

It is written of Plato, and I may profitably now remember it, and both you and I thinke of it whileſt we live, that being ſpoken unto by the Cyrenenſes, and very earneſtly entreated, that he would preſcribe and lay downe ſome good and wholeſome lawes for them; made anſwer, that their proſperity was too great to yeeld obedience unto any lawes, were they never ſo good: And therefore he would waſt no labour ſo unfruitfully, but leave them to the ſwinge of their owne devices, which only he knew would content them, till further fitneſſe for ſuch a good as they deſired. O beloved, what a judgement is this in a wiſe and learned Philoſopher, of the poyſon of this world, and ſhall we love it? Shall we make it our god, and thinke we can never have enough of it? Nay, ſhall we hazard our owne ſalvation to come by it, and to bee enriched with it? Shall Plato know it an enemy to the obedience due to man, and we take it a friend, and a furtherer of obedience due to God? O happy then were rich men, for who ſhould be ſo forward as they? But it is too well ſeene to be far otherwiſe, and therefore love not the world, if you taſte but as much of truth as Plato did.

What do you remember you have heard of Cræſus, that great rich King of Lydia, even ſo rich, that the ſaying is, As rich as Cræſus. Is it not written of him, that he ſhewed to Solon the wiſe, his his huge heapes of gold and treasure, his wonderfull possessions and pleasures, even able to amaze any man, and then asked Solon whom he judged, of any that he knew, to be the happiest man? thinking he would have named him, after the sight of such earthly glory: But Solon, quite contrary to his expectation, named another. Yea, being asked againe whom he judged second, named also another poore man, and vouchsafed to Crœsus neither the first, nor second place, yeelding for reason, that his last end might alter all that felicity, and before the same it is ill judging. Which censure of Solons, so wise and so true, Ovid the Poet afterward in his time remembred, and composed in verse after this manner: Ante obitum nemo.

Vltima semper
Expectanda dies homini, dicíq; beatus
Ante obitum nemo, supremaq; funera debet.

The last day is ever to be expected, and happy can no man bee said to bee, before death have shewed how he departed.

See now the proofe. There falleth out war betwixt Cyrus and Crœsus. in which Crœsus is taken, his people overthrowne, his Countrey subdued, his riches wherein he so gloried taken from him, and himselfe appointed to be burned in contempt, to the honour of the Conquerour that had so subdued him. Which dolefull day when it was come upon him, and he set upon the pile of wood ready for execution, Cyrus himselfe with thousands more beholding the spectacle, then he remembred what Solon had said, that before a mans end there can be no sound judgement of his happinesse, and cryed with a wofull shrike, O Solon, Solon, Solon, and there stayed, plunged in the depth of his lamentable fall, and not able to goe any further. Cyrus hearing him, with all speed sent unto him to know what he meant thereby, to whom by his Messenger hee sent the whole story, as I have told it before, of his dealings with Solon, and Solons answer to him: which story so pierced the heart of Cyrus, with a due consideration of mans uncertaine estate in any glory of this world, and consequently even of his owne, who was then Conquerour over this wofull King, that to his great praise he stayed the course, and saved Crœsus to live with him in some honourable place, but yet a captive.

Shall not now this story profit us, to a stay of our love and liking of this tottering world? but will we day and night, with all courses either good or bad, seeke to win that which is so soone lost, and for which, even sooner peradventure, we may fall into greater misery, than without it we should have done? Nay, shall not this story rather make us cast away from us all immoderate care of it, and pray with heart and soule, to the God that giveth it, for a life in his feare, and a death in his favour? I trust it shall, and wish that it may even with all mine affections, as one that desireth your good even from my heart rootes, and never tooke pleasure to speake unto you since I came amongst you, but in hope to prevaile with you to that end. O vile world, why should it so bewitch us, to make our selves spectacles to many an eye, for our greedy and intolerable hunting and haling to obtaine it? Shall not our Saviours speech strike to the hearts of us with some remembrance, What will the whole world profit us, if we lose our soules? Shall not the rich Cormorant sometimes be thought of, that cryeth in hell even at this day, for one drop of water to coole his tongue, and it is not given him? God of his mercy give a working power to his blessed Word, that it may doe us good. And thinke you beloved, of that wise Oratours speech of Athens, that it was a City, Ad peregrinandum in ea jucunda, ad inhabitandum non tuta, To sojourne in for a time very pleasant, but to dwell and abide in not safe. Verily so is it with this flattering world, a place to be used for a time without offence, but not to bee loved and joyed in, as the thing wee chiefly desire, without an offence, purchasing eternall woe.

Such fraud and such falshood, such glosing and flattery, by faire speaking and hollow meaning, such deceiving and sinning, and such occasions to sinne, as hee that findeth no griefe at them, may bee thought to have little joy to see God pleased and served; and little to taste of that comfort which the Apostle had, when he joyed that he had finished his course, and drew neare to his end, or of that blessing pronounced upon the dead that are departed this world, and at rest from these evils.

Why should we not thinke, even with good fruit from it, of that tale that in Damascene is told of the rich mans three friends, his Goods, his Friends, and his Vertues: his Goods afford him a sheet and a few ceremonies, and so leave him; his Friends accompany him to the grave, and there forsake him; but his Vertues and good actions follow him, and never depart from him. This, this friend, should be highly regarded, and those others, especially the world, lesse trusted in and loved; for they will forsake us, and we must forgoe them. Yea, the fresher and fuller our leaves are growne out, the nearer is their fall even in all true experience, and therefore reckon of a change.

Wise, out of question, was the action of Epaminondas that Theban Captaine, and grave was his conſideration, of whom, to my remembrance, it is thus written, that having gotten a glorious conqueſt, and an honourable victory over his enemies, to his great renowne; the next day after, when a man would have thought his praiſes ſhould have caried him almoſt in the ayre above ground, he, clothed moſt poorely and baſely, went up and downe very heavily and ſadly, to the great wonder of all that ſaw him. But when one asked him the reaſon of it, hee more like a Chriſtian than a Heathen, anſwered, that he chaſtiſed by ſo doing the exceſſe of his glory the day before: As if he ſhould have ſaid, I know a full ſea muſt ebbe againe, and great proſperity is very neare to change, therefore I will reckon of it before it come, and not ſo bee caried away with the one, but that truly it may appeare I prepare for the other, and eſteem of the world and all the glory of it, as of a moſt tranſitory and uncertaine thing, not to bee loved and delighted in, above that which is fit, for it will away. Good Lord where is this feeling now adayes in many of us, that know more than ever Epaminondas did? He loathed it, we love it; he flyes it, we ſeeke it; he acknowledgeth it a deceiving vanity, and we repute it our greateſt felicity. This is not well, and if thus we continue, Heathens and Pagans ſhall riſe in judgement and condemne us at the laſt day we ſee moſt plainly. Better a thouſand times is the choiſe of the bleſſed Apoſtle, when he ſaith: I take pleaſure in infirmities, in reproaches, in neceſſities, in perſecutions, and in anguiſh for Chriſt his ſake, for when I am weake, then am I ſtrong. O marke this reaſon, and meditate of it at your better leiſure, even a long time, concluding upon it in your ſecret aſſurance, that if weakneſſe make us ſtrong, that is, if ſuch wants as theſe worke heavenly ſweetneſſe leading to God, then plenty of pleaſures being loved and joyed in above that which is fit, worketh earthly dulneſſe, that tendeth to hell. Therefore there is no cauſe that we ſhould ſo covet, what ſo cruelly hurteth.

2 Cor. 12. 10.

Theſe are the uſes to a Chriſtian conſcience of this doctrine of death, and departing hence, noted unto you by occaſion of the time, when this Embaſſage was ſent by David to the King of Ammon, namely, when the tydings came that his father was dead. Many other uſes may bee made of it, but at this time I goe no further in them.

The occaſion of the Embaſſage.

The ſecond thing to be conſidered in this Embaſſage after the time thus noted, is the occaſion of it, which in the Text is mentioned to have been a kindneſſe received of Naaſh, the father, in his life time. What it was, certainly cannot be underſtood, but ſaint Ierome thinketh it was ſome honorable and kinde uſage of David, when hee fled from the rage and cruelty of Saul. Whatſoever it was, moſt evidently and plainly it layeth before our eyes, what a mighty motive, kinde and courteous dealing of one of us towards another is, to procure good will, not onely to our ſelves whileſt we be alive, but alſo to our friends and poſterity remaining behinde us when we be dead. A thing worthy noting of all ſuch as care to have their judgements inſtructed, and their lives directed by the word of God, the true rule of right in all things.

The mighty force of kindneſſe.

Pleaſeth it you therefore for the effecting of further feeling hereof, to remember what you reade in the ſecond booke of Samuel, and the ninth Chapter, how David, not forgetting the kindneſſe of Ionathan, Sauls ſon, ſhewed to him in former times, maketh open enquiry whether any of Sauls houſe were yet left, to whom he might ſhew mercy for Ionathans ſake, and when he had intelligence given him of Mephiboſheth, Ionathans ſon, how honourably ſpeaketh he, and how Princely dealeth he with him, even with joy in his heart, that he had that occaſion to remember the ſweet kindneſſe that he found at his Fathers hands, and in ſome ſort to requite it to his childe, the Father being dead. Truly it is a glaſſe to ſee plainly in, the bleſſing of God upon kindneſſe uſed of man to man. For I doe not conſider it as an action barely of David, but I caſt mine eyes upon God, working in the heart and minde of David, ſuch due regard and remembrance of a kinde man, as in his mercy, which in him is the ſame for ever, he will worke for others alſo, that give themſelves for his ſake to ſuch cariage and uſage of their neighbours. The like example againe the holy Ghoſt noteth in the ſame man in the firſt of Kings, and the ſecond Chapter. Where David giving Solomon his ſon divers things in charge, eſpecially requireth him, even upon his death-bed, not to forget the kindneſs which Barzillai had ſhewed him in times paſt, but to remember it, and to requite it, with ſhewing kindneſſe unto his children againe, and placing them among ſuch as ſhould eat at his owne table. What is this, but even the Lords performance of his ſweet promiſe? I will ſhew mercy unto thouſands of them that love me, and keep my Commandements. For it is his commandement that wee ſhould bee kinde and courteous one to another, loving our neighbour even as our ſelfe, putting on tender mercy and meekneſſe, humbleneſſe of minde and long-ſuffering: Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrell to another, even as Jeſus Chriſt hath forgiven and daily doth forgive us. And he that keepeth this Commandement as neare as God ſhall ſtrengthen him, even the mouth of God, which never deceived, hath promiſed him, that unto a thouſand generations his poſterity after him ſhall feele and finde the bleſſing of it. Which if it worke not within us ſome good effect to this purpoſe hereafter, aſſuredly the Lord in wrath hath yet ſeared up our hearts, that we ſhould not feele, and ſo become gainers of ſo great a good: which is fearefull to thinke of. What is that in the Wiſdome of Solomon laid downe for a certainty, that mercy and truth eſtabliſh the throne? Surely, Beloved, if kindneſſe eſtabliſh Kingdomes, it will never overthrow private houſes: No, no, it will have as ſure a bleſſing to meaner men, as to Princes. Barzillai his kindneſſe, as you ſaw before, eſtabliſhed his houſe, and brought that honour to his children, that all the living he had for them could never doe. True therefore even by the rule of truth is that ſaying of Seneca, Melius beneficiis imperium cuſtoditur, quam armis: A Kingdome is more ſurely ſetled with benefits, and kinde favours, than with armes. Hee in Saluſt knew the ſame, and therefore ſaith the like, that Non exercitus neque theſauri præſidia regni ſunt, ſed amici: Not an hoaſt of men, neither any treaſures of gold and ſilver, may bee ſaid to bee the ſafety of a Kingdome, but friends. And how ſhould friends bee had but by good and kinde and loving uſage? Cyrus againe in Xenophon: It is not this golden Scepter that keepeth the Kingdome, but ſtore of friends; they are the true and ſure Scepter for Princes. And not thinke we for private men alſo? Yes, yes, beloved, take friends from any man, and quickly ſhall his weakneſſe appeare, bee his heapes never ſo huge, and his minde never ſo proud: therefore wiſe is the man that by good offices getteth friends.

that

Dionyſius Halicarnaſæus, amongſt others, writeth the ſtory how faithfully and faſtly, how honeſtly and honourably, Servius Tullius ſtood for the ſons or Nephewes of Tarquinius, when they ſhould have been wronged, in remembrance of kindneſſe ſhewed by their father or grandfather unto him in former times.

The Story is very notable to this end which I ſpeake of, and aſſuredly would move you greatly if you reade it at large; Magna neceſſitas (inquit) me, Quirites, coegit horum infantium curam ſuſcipere: Tarquinius enim eorum Avus me orbum, & patria pulſum accepit & educavit, non deteriore conditione quam proprios ſuos liberos tractans, &c. Quis igitur me in Deos pium, aut in homines juſtum judicabit, ſi deſeram & prodam pupillos hos, &c. Certe neq; fidem meam prodam neq; hos pueros à cæteris omnibus deſtitutos deſeram, nec eos, quantum in me erit, in iſta ſolitudine relinquam, &c. There is, ſaith he, great cauſe, O noble Romanes, wherefore I ſhould take upon me the care of theſe children, for when I was deſtitute of comfort and baniſhed out of my countrey, Tarquinius their Grandfather tooke me in and brought me up, uſing me no worſe than his owne children, &c. Who therefore may judge me either religious towards God, or juſt towards men, if I ſhould leave and forſake theſe friendleſſe youths? Surely, I will never betray my faith towards God, nor give over my beſt care for them, being given over of too many already: but as far as ever any power ſhall lie in me, I will comfort them and care for them; I will ſave and defend them, as becommeth a man mindfull of kindneſſe, ſhewed and received from their friends, when I had as much need of them as they have at this time need of me, &c. Much more hath the ſtory to this end.

Rom. ant. lib. 4. pag. 113.

The force of kinde uſage.

Now, as you ſee by all this, the bleſſing with God, and the effect with men, of kindneſſe and loving cariage of our ſelves one towards another, that it worketh friends to us and our houſes both alive and dead: So may you ſee the contrary, if you reade ſtories.

The fearefull judgements of God upon unkinde dealings.

What a bitter heart was in Haman towards all the Jewes, and particularly towards Mordecai, becauſe he would not honour him in that ſort that he wiſhed, you remember, and every man may reade in the booke of Heſter. Alſo what plots and practices the ſame Haman laid and deviſed to overthrow them all, and eſpecially him whom he moſt hated, the ſtory telleth us. But what was the end of all? truly ſuch an end, as ſhould make us all whileſt we live to beware of rancour and malice, of hatred and enmity, and of ſuch courſes as they will leade us unto. For Haman when he was in his higheſt ruffe, and thought himſelfe moſt ſure to effect his wicked purpoſe, by the mighty finger of God, who abhorreth ſuch gaule, fell in diſgrace with the King, was hanged himſelfe upon the Jebbet prepared for his reputed enemy, his ten ſonnes not long after alſo hanged, his houſe overthrowne, and all his glory laid in the duſt. The people, on the contrary ſide, whom he ſo hated, were preſerved and favoured. Mordecai his enemy, whom he ſo unjuſtly abhorred and ſought to deſtroy, was exalted to honour, and he himſelfe faine to leade his horſe by the bridle, whileſt the Kings favour was ſhewed towards him, and proclaimed unto all the people.

O wonderfull work of God, and example, as I ſaid, never to be forgotten, ſhewing and declaring the end of malice and ſuch ſinfull courſes, as in theſe dayes too many take liking of. Surely, the Lord is the ſame ſtill, loveth kindneſſe of man unto man, and abhorreth the contrary as much as ever he did. Wherefore, this unchangeable God ſhall manifeſt himſelfe in his good time, againſt our grudges and gaule, with ſevere juſtice, if we take no warning: and by his divine power, overthrow both us and our houſes, and our malice and our plots, that the children yet unborne ſhall talke of our tragedies: And for honour wee ſhall reape ignominy, whileſt either tongue can ſpeake in Wales, or pen write.

Adde unto this, the ſtory of Hamilcar, Hannibals father, and remember what a vehemency of hatred was in him towards the Romanes, (notwithſtanding every too much bee a fault) remember what he ſaid of his ſonnes, that he nouriſhed them up, even ſo many whelps, to bee inſtruments of his malice againſt the Romanes, and ſee the end, whether ſuch extremity proſpered or no, even againſt an enemy: Surely no, but Hamilcar himſelfe was overthrowne, Hannibals valianteſt ſonne became his owne executioner, and with woe and confuſion to his friends and his houſe; ſuch venome and poyſon had his end: another good example to beware of endleſſe, rooted, and ſetled malice. For if betwixt martiall enemies, the Lord croſſe all cruell and outragious attempts, will he ever winke at variance bitter and ſinfull, betwixt neighbours, kinsfolkes, brethren, and ſuch as he hath called to roomes of authority, to governe others both by word and example of love, peace, unity, and amity, and all wiſe and godly cariage of themſelves? No, no, beloved, aſſure your ſelves: but he that ſcourged that, hee will whip this, with far greater wrath, as not only ſinfull and wicked, but as brutiſh, beaſtly, and unnaturall.

Zonaras.

What ſhould I ſay? I would not weary you, and yet can I not leave out the example of Mauritius Cappadox the Emperour, whoſe behaviour at firſt, being full of this kindneſſe and love, and ſweetneſſe, which I thus commend and wiſh unto us all, the bleſſing of it was a glorious, flouriſhing, and renowned government; but when proſperity and fulneſſe wrought a change in him, from gentleneſſe to pride, from kindneſſe to roughneſſe; Et factus eſt iracundior, & ſuſpicax, & magis contempſit ſuos, &c. And became more angry and ſuſpitious, and contemned his friends; then ſee a change that a wiſe man will lay to his heart, every thing went backward, his glory abated, his Councels erred, his attempts failed; and up riſe his Garriſons againſt him, and proclaime his ſervant Phocas to be Emperour, who purſueth him cruelly, hee being ſicke and driven to flye, overtaketh him at Chalcedon, with his wife and his children, and taketh firſt his two yongeſt ſonnes, and killeth them before his face, then his three daughters, then his deare wife, and laſtly himſelfe, when hee had firſt beheld all this woe with his owne eyes. His children, ſaith the ſtory, he beheld to die with ſilence, but when he ſaw his wives turne come, then he ſhrieked out in the anguiſh of his heart, but yet with faith in God, Iuſtus es Domine, & rectum eſt judicium tuum: O Lord, O Lord, juſt art thou, and juſt is thy judgement. Even acknowledging in himſelfe, the reward due unto unkinde courſes, that hee had yeelded towards his friends, as the ſtory more fully layeth down. And ſhall it not move us? Doe I ſpeak to men of no underſtanding, of no feeling, of no regard, when Scriptures, ſtories Eccleſiaſticall and prophane, reaſon, nature, experience, and all kindes of proofe by ſound and ſure learning, concurre to a concluſion no leſſe weighty than true, moſt deeply to be thought of.

Indulgentia fortunæ mores fabri ſunt aſperiores.

O beloved, you muſt thinke I know your ſufficiency every way, and the extraordinary graces wherewith very many of you are endued: and therefore cannot doubt, but even very comfortably conceive hope, that unkindneſſe ſhall die more and more amongſt us; and all teſtimonies of love and good liking, of friendſhip and good agreement, breake forth and ſhew themſelves, to the praiſe of you, the rejoycing of your friends, the ſpiting of your foes; and which is above all, and before all to be regarded and thought upon, to the high contentment of God Almighty, and the eternall ſalvation of your owne ſoules. Which that it may, I lift my hands and heart to heaven, where he hath his chaire that moveth mindes: and ſo I leave this ſecond note.

Cathedram in cœlo habet, qui corda movet.

Now this occaſion againe (beloved) of Davids Embaſſage, being, as you have heard, a kindneſſe received in former times, of this yong King his father, which David had not forgotten, as it hath ſhewed the reward both with God and man of courteous and loving dealing one of us towards another: ſo doth it moſt plainly lay down a very ſweet gratitude ingrafted and rooted in the minde of David towards ſuch as had done him good: which is alſo of us at this time moſt worthy to be obſerved. And that I may doe it plainly and briefly, I ſhall pray you in order to weigh with your ſelves theſe points.

Gratitude.

The degrees of gratitude. Firſt, hee remembreth.

Firſt, he remembreth a good turne, contrary to that common ſaying, and too common a practice: Nihil citius ſeneſcit quam gratia: Nothing ſo ſoone waxeth old, as doth the remembrance of a benefit. Well were it with the world, if the remembrance of wrongs would as ſoon dye as will the favours that have beene beſtowed, although moſt gladly embraced when they were beſtowed.

In honour he remembreth.

Secondly, conſider when he remembreth a benefit. Surely even in his greateſt honour and heighth of proſperity: contrary againe to that old proverb, and too old proofe; Honos mutat mores: Honour changes manners. The Butler when he is releaſed, forgot Ioſeph you know: and nine of the ten lepers are ſwallowed up with the joy of their eſtate, and never returne to give thankes to the giver. Thouſands of examples have ſtories, and thouſand thouſands hath our daily experience of this thing, if I purpoſed not only to point at that which might be proſecuted with much proofe, and moſt large diſcourſe.

He ſeeketh to requite.

Thirdly, what he remembreth, he doth not barely remember, but wiſheth, yea, endeavoureth to requite: and this is honourable, To remember a good turne is no charge, and therefore many can be content to ſay they doe it, but to requite it as occaſion ſerveth with mutuall regard and condigne recompence, becauſe haply it caryeth ſome charge with it, too many forget, or forbeare beare to doe it. But David in this place doth both, and therefore even by the wisdome of God is propoſed as an example worthy following, God loving ever a thankfull man. The example in Daniel is very fearfull, of a man unthankfull to his God. The great King of Babylon Nebuchadnezzar, who walking in his royall Palace of Babel, ſpake and ſaid; Is not this great Babel, that I have built for the houſe of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Majeſty? not once making mention of God, as the giver or fountaine of any of this honor. And now ſee the judgement of God upon his ingratitude; while the word, ſaith the ſtory, was in his mouth, even while the word was in his mouth, (and marke the ſpeed of Gods wrath,) a voyce came downe from heaven, ſaying; O King Nebuchadnezzar to thee be it ſpoken, thy Kingdome is departed from thee, and they ſhall drive thee frõ men, and thy dwelling ſhall be with the beaſts of the field; they ſhall make thee to eate graſſe as the Oxen, and ſeven times ſhall paſſe over thee, untill thou knoweſt that the moſt high beareth rule over the kingdomes of men, and giveth it unto whomſoever he will. And the very ſame houre was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar, and he was driven from men, and did eate graſſe as the Oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of Heaven, till his haires were grown as Eagles feathers, and his nailes like birds clawes. Is not this, as I ſaid, a fearfull example, and may juſtly admoniſh us, what an odious thing an unkind heart towards our God that hath given us all that we have, is. Surely, he abhorreth even in like ſort unthankfulneſſe amongſt our ſelves, making mention of it in his holy Word as a thing moſt ugly in his ſight. Salomon in his Preacher hath this place if you remember; There was a little City and few men in it, and a great King came againſt it, and compaſſed it about, and builded Forts againſt it, and there was found therein a poore and wiſe man who delivered the City by his wiſdome: (now mark I pray you) But no man remembred this poore man. As if he ſhould have ſaid, moſt horrible was their ingratitude; for he that hath deſerved well ought not to be forgotten, but with all mutuall love and offices of kindneſſe, remembred and regarded. S. Paul reckoning up what vices ſhould raigne in men in theſe latter dayes, amongſt a ſort of vile corruptions, nameth this, as vile as the vileſt, They ſhall be unthankefull. Salomon againe with a Proverbe never to be forgotten, admoniſheth us of this ſinne, ſaying; He that rendreth evill for good, the plague of God ſhall never depart from his houſe. Experience of it you have in Saul, an unthankfull man to David who was ſo true to him, and how proſpered he? Did not the wrath of God purſue him till his houſe was utterly overthrowne? Nabal an unkind churle, and was it not his death? Abſolon an unthankfull wretch, and was it not his confuſion? This example we have in hand of this young King, ſo diſhonourably uſing the meſſengers of David ſent unto him in all good will, was it not the ſubverſion of him and his whole kingdome? What ſhould moe examples be heaped up? We ſee a truth if we be the Lords, even in theſe ſufficiently, and we will I truſt beware ſo damnable a ſinne without any further ſpeech. Let us not be like the thirſty horſe, that maketh ſo ſtrongly towards the water, as his rider can ſcarcely ſtay him; but when he hath ſatisfied himſelfe, and his turne is ſerved, then turnes he his heeles upon it, and maketh as faſt from it againe: Or like the vapours raiſed up by the Sunne, which thicken up a Cloud to obſcure the Sunne. Remember the thankfull fields, who reſtore to their owner much more gaine than they received of him; and remember Seneca's reaſon, with which I will end, why no law of man was laid downe againſt unthankfulneſſe; even becauſe the ſinne is greater than that man ſufficiently can puniſh it, but muſt leave it to God who will fully doe it.

Vnthankfulneſſe. Dan.4.26,&c.

Eccleſ.9.15.

2 Tim.3.2. Pro.17.13.

1 Sam.25.

Fourthly, the father being dead, David will bee thankfull to his childe: A very notable thing in him, and farre from the courſe of theſe our dayes, wherein it is reckoned even an advantage that many are glad of, if they be dead to whom they thought they ſtood in reaſon indebted any way, becauſe then they are free they thinke; and for any friends they leave behinde them, they ſhall never trouble our mindes, although wee ſaw them apparently want. Surely, this was not Davids nature we all ſee, who is as careful to be kind to the poſterity of his friend, as to his friend himſelfe; making as we have ſeene before, even open proclamation, that hee might know if any were remaining, to whom for the deads ſake he might bee kind. Lord what an honour is this to him, and how will it adorne any man that will follow it, and bee juſtly reported of for it? I ſay no more, but I know what I thinke, and that God that giveth me both heart and thoughts, is able, if it bee his bleſſed pleaſure, to make you all ſhine with the vertues commended thus in his holy Word, even according to my wiſh: for which I ſhall as truly joy, as any that ever ſpake unto you.

Requitall to the poſterity.

But wherein may you ſay is David thus thankfull? Wee heare but of a meſſage ſent unto the young King, and as for gifts, and Princely rich requitals, wee heare nothing. Beloved, even this is another thing that I note in David, that where honours and livings were wanting there he was thankfull in that ſort: the examples before I have laid downe, and here, where ſufficiently theſe things were already, with kinde comforts and loving ſpeeches, fit for the time and occaſion of mourning, he ſheweth his remembrance of a dead friend, and aſſureth his love to be further uſed as ſhall bee fit; which in a Prince to a Prince is as much as needeth, and fully as honourable, (if not much more,) as gold or gifts whatſoever. Yet there is no queſtion but but theſe Embaſſadors carryed what was alſo fit of ſuch like teſtimonies of Princely favour, albeit the ſtory ſpeaketh not of them. Thus ſtandeth the caſe even amongſt us many times, that many need not to come to us, either for gold or ſilver, for meate or drinke, or for ſuch like favours; but yet our comfort ſometimes and friendly advice, our good face and loving affection to bee ſhewed and teſtified as occaſion ſerveth, would bee welcome and greatly eſteemed. And ſhall we not doe it? Fie of that covered kindneſſe, that neither by deed nor word can bee diſcerned. And if by word we doe it, and doe it unfainedly, where there is no further want or need of us, ſurely it is ſufficient, and it will bee eſpyed, and God will give it a bleſſing both to our praiſe and profit.

David rejoyceth not at any mans fall.

This kindneſſe againe of David, in ſending to comfort him after the death of his Father, evidently ſheweth that David rejoyced not at it, but was rather ſorry as became him. And ſurely, ſo ought it to bee in all men; a feeling in one of anothers loſſe, and a mutuall mourning: And to rejoyce at any mans fall, is both impious and unhoneſt: Yea, dangerous too peradventure, the Lord often puniſhing ſuch wicked joy, with juſt and great griefe to themſelves.

A good childe grieveth at the loſſe of his father.

And may wee not alſo, with ſome ſhew, conceive by this meſſage of comfort ſent unto the ſonne, that hee tooke heavily his Fathers death; and cared not even for a Kingdome left unto him, as he did for his father? For my part I thinke hee did; and whether hee did or no, both you and I know he ſhould; for fathers be fathers, and no ſmall loſſe when they goe, leave they never ſo much behind them. Yet we know what we read:

Filius ante diem patrios inquirit in annos, &c.

All one in effect with that Sonnet of our Country-man, the Earle ſometimes of Surrey, as I remember:

Their children ſometimes doe wiſh them in grave,
That they may poſſeſſe the riches they have.

But thus much ſhall ſuffice of this firſt part, to wit, the Embaſſage ſent by David to Hanun the young King, to comfort him for the death of his Father: And now let us conſider the ſecond part, which is, the injury and wrong done to the Embaſſadors.

The ſecond part.

The ſpeeches of make-bates.

WHerein conſider we firſt what they ſay, and next what they doe. Their ſayings are laid downe in theſe words; And the Princes of the children of Ammon ſaid unto Hanun their Lord, Thinkeſt thou that David doth honor thy father, that he hath ſent comforters unto thee? Hath not David rather ſent his ſervants unto thee to ſearch the City, and to ſpie it out, and to overthrow it? Where you ſee they accuſe David of treachery and cruelty coloured over with a ſhew of love, and in a deed with dealing and meaning moſt worthy a Prince. But was it ſo? wee all know and ſee here by the Text that it was a moſt monſtrous wrong offered to ſo honourable and Princely a minde: Therefore by it and in it wee plainly ſee the moſt poyſonfull practice of all times, and never of any more than of our time, to overthrow the loving purpoſes and Chriſtian kinde courſes, intended and meant by many a man towards his kinſman, alliances, neighbours and friends; even vile and villanous ſlanders, by ſurmiſe and ſuſpition, or by envy and malice, that things well done are not well meant, but tend rather to drifts both odious and ignominious.

An old practice of Satan to deprave good meaning.

First then I pray you marke the practice, and after that the perſons. In the practice ſee the antiquity and the villany. The antiquity appeareth in the Word of God, the moſt ancient witneſſe: In very Paradiſe the Devill in the Serpent tooke this courſe, to calumniate the commandement of God laid downe to our Parents for their good, and perſwaded them it was done not in love, as indeed it was, but rather in envy to any further honour of theirs, which needs muſt grow to them, if they eate of that fruit, by becomming knowers of good and evill, even like unto GOD. In the Story of David wee reade, that when Abner his great adverſary, and chiefe Captaine fore the houſe of Saul, came unto David to ſubmit himſelfe unto him, and to be reconciled, Ioab, Davids chiefe Captaine, envying at ſuch unity and onement (as ever good onements have bad enemies, and they many times of ones owne houſe) ſaid unto David, that well he might know Abner came to mocke him, and to abuſe him, to know his out-going, and his in-going, and to eſpie all that he did. A moſt falſe ſlander of a malicious make-bate: for Abner came in all good meaning, and his comming was profitable for David and his whole Kingdome. Such another practice is mentioned of Ziba, in the 16. Chapter, againſt Mephiboſheth Sauls ſonne, whom David had honoured in thankfulneſſe towards dead Ionathan, Davids deareſt friend, as you have heard: For when David fled from the rage of Abſolon his ſonne,

2 Sam. 3. 25.

Mephiboſheth

Mephibosheth staying at home for want of his horse, being a lame man, his servant abusing him, that was sent for his horse: the wicked servant told the King, his Master staid at home, looking for a day to have the Kingdome againe, than the which suggestion nothing could bee more false and injurious, as afterward David himselfe found. But in the meane time he was so abused by crediting such a lie, and such a Lout, that hee in his heart condemned as true a friend as any he had alive to his power; and gave away his living to this mate his servant, that thus abused both the King and his Master. Therefore note I pray you, both the course and the poyson of it. Many other examples to the same purpose hath the Scripture, but I feare to weary you. Remember therefore I pray you, that rule in the Law of God; Non eris susurro, &c. Thou shalt not walke about with tales among thy people; Meaning, out of all question, such tales and reports as tended either to breake or hinder that unity and love, that concord and amity, that ought to be ever amongst friends, amongst neighbours, and especially amongst Governours of others, and chiefe heads of a Countrey. Remember againe, and even earnestly note it, what that wise Salomon said in his time, that there are six things which the Lord doth hate, and a seaventh which his very soule abhorreth; and what is that? Surely, a man that raiseth up contention among brethren. O speech of power, if the Lord have any portion in us! For shall the Lord hate such an one, and we love him? Nay, shall even his inward soule loath and abhorre him, and we like him, nourish him, and bee ruled more by him than by any others? How may wee looke then to be loved ever of God, if our course be so crosse, and our selves so farre differing from his holy disposition? But I say no more, and the lesse I say, the more I trust you consider what I might say, according to that wisdome that I have ever known in you, and regarded you for with all due respect. We read it of Princes, but it is as true of more private men, Periculum eis est non tantum ab hostibus, sed à suis; they are not more in danger of their foes, than many time of such as they repute for their friends. Diocleſian said, many a good Prince, Incautũ & imprudentem vendi à suis, is sold ere ever he espie it, even of his own. I would God it were not so with the good subject also through too much credulity. Iustus Lipsius speaketh of certain Cubicularii consiliarii, chamber-Counsellors, from whom springeth many times much evill, but wise men will take heed of them, and with due discretion consider the drift of their darts, & the sin of their charms. Had some of them dyed in their mothers wombes, it had beene good for them and many mo. This is not chambering and wantonnesse, as the Apostle speaketh, but this is chambering wickednesse, as all the whole Scripture teacheth, to overthrow love, to undermine peace, to crosse kindnesse, and to subvert unity in a country amongst neare ones and deare ones, to the offence of God, the scandall of the world, and the grievous harme of many a man. Quintus Curtius talketh of certain Ignea ingenia, novandis quam gerendis rebus aptiora, Fiery wits, more fit farre to innovate and change well established things, than to governe and order with commendation any thing. To pray therefore, saith a wise writer, every man hath need. First, (if the Lord may bee so pleased) that he may see himselfe what is ever good to be embraced and followed: but if not so, then that advice may be given him never but sound and honest. Thirdly, that hee may have grace willingly to follow it; and lastly, that God would in mercy prosper it unto good. In this sort, beloved, pray I for you all, even from my heart roots, that so favoured of God, you may abhorre all make-bates, with false surmises perverting good meanings, as here these Counsellors in my Text did; and increasing in love and all firme friendship one towards another, you may worthily be praised for your peace, where love hath lamented for some quarrels.

Pro.6.16.

Now having considered this venomous practice, to set Princes at variance by wicked misconstruing a good meaning, let us also consider the persons themselves that thus perswaded; and you see in the Text they were men of account, even Hanuns Princes, that is, his Nobility and Lords, his better and higher sort of assistants: Yet foully deceived, and happy had their King been and his whole kingdome, if hee had never credited them; yea, themselves had beene happy, if they had either slept, or wanted tongues to suggest so great an untruth, by a false suspition and a most vile surmise. For the King & themselves, and the whole kingdome smarted for it; and shall it not teach us? nay, shall it not move us, even as men are moved when all their inwards are touched? We know where we live, and what use there may be of this example if we duly regard it. If Princes may thus erre, that is, noble and honourable Counsellors for their place, men learned and wise in many matters, experienced and practised in the greatest affaires; ô how may pesants in comparison of such, and thrice base companions erre much more? If such perswaders may thus subvert a King & his kingdom, how many Caitives not to be spoken of, when men of any quality are named, subvert men, and houses more easily be subverted, if they be beleeved and hearkned unto? Therfore if I may depart with any hope that you love me for all the faithfull affection of my soule towards you, let this Text be a Scripture not forgotten of you, and this example, both for the matter, and the quality of the persons perswaders in it, profit you in your practice, when God hath severed me from you, that shall ever pray for you, and by love live among you, till I cease to live. You know I forbeare to be more particular than I judge is fit.

The persons that thus slandered.

But to draw to an end of this my tedious troubling of you, what might we imagine should bee bee any cause to move these ill Counsellors thus, either to thinke or report of David, that hee should not send this message to Hanun their Lord for any love to his Father, but in a bad intendment towards him his son? And will you have me conjecture? for certainly, I cannot say, because the Text saith nothing. Haply one cause was their owne bad mindes, easily suspecting others, to be what themselves knew themselves to be. So it is written of Caligula, that being a loose and licentious man himself, he resolutely deemed not any to be better. An other cause peradventure, (and marke it well) was an inveterate, old, and grounded dislike, conceived of the Israelites in these Ammonites, which kinde of ancient enmity, how it worketh to a flame upon the least blowing, the world hath too often most wofull experience of.

What might be causes of this lewd accusation.
A bad minde.

An old malice.

Now that the Ammonites did so groundedly hate the people of Israel, me thinks may be seen in that spitefull demand made by Naash, the father of this young King, of the right eyes of the men of Iabes Gilead, to be given unto him for peace.

It is better fishing in troubled waters.

If this were a cause working in them to this bad effect, then see we by a wofull president before our eyes, how dangerous a thing old hatred, and a setled dislike of any countrey, family, or person is; and how quickly it may draw us to a course that shall overthrow us, as here it did. Thirdly, the waters peradventure were too stil for some good fishers to get any store in, & therfore they wish them a little more troubled, that their game and gaine might be the greater. This I tell you in the world worketh but too much, & could we as well take heed of it in the Country, as we can imagine it to be some cause here in the Court, haply contentions would be fewer, and the portions of our friends, when God calleth us, greater. I know whom I speake to, and if a word to the wise may be enough, it is my comfort that but halfe a word is enough to you. If the Apostle in his zeale to the Galathians, wished them cut off that troubled them, I may in my true heart to you, and my faithfull love to this Countrey, wish them further off, and soone discried, that live by troubling any waters amongst us.

Suspition.

Lastly, it might bee that these Counsellors here by nature were suspitious, and then who knoweth not what wry and wrong courses a suspicious head wil lead a man into. Abrahams suspition of the place to bee worse than it was, made him hazard the reputation of his wife, and himselfe to say amisse. The suspition of the Children of Israel that their brethren built that Altar to a worse end than they did, made them intend war against them, and amisse to think of them, till truth appeared. Eli the Priest by suspition judged the mother or Samuel to be overgone with drinke, when vehemently she prayed in her soule to God. What a cursed conceit had the Philistims of David, when they would not suffer him to goe to battel with them, and all by suspition; yea, most vile suspition, thinking if he went with them, he would be an adversary to them, and go about to get his Masters favour with their heads: The King of Israel you remember rent his cloathes, and conceived that the King of Aram sought a quarrell against him, when there was no such matter, but a loving letter in Naamans behalfe, that by his good favour he might be helped for his Leprosie by the Prophet in his Country; for so had the maid spoken before of the Prophet. This was suspition. But what should I heap up mo examples: Suspitio calumniam parit, Suspition ever breeds slander; it is a rule recorded in all learning. And, Suspitio grave est hominibus malum; Suspition is a grievous evill among men. Quanti non dederunt locũ errori, & dederunt suspitioni; Who ever hath not made a place for error, if he made a place for suspition, saith Saint Ambrose? For, Sicut difficile aliquẽ suspicatur malum qui bonus est, sic difficile aliquem suspicatur bonum, qui ipse malus est: As hardly hee judgeth any man to be evill that himselfe is good, so as hardly judgeth he any man to be good that himselfe is nought, saith S. Chrysostome. Therefore, Innocentiam præstare possum, quid vero homines de me loquantur non possum; Innocency, by Gods assistance I may obtaine, but to rule mens tongues what they shall say of mee, lyeth not in mee, nor in any man, saith Erasmus very well: For, Suspitiones suas quisque fere cognitiones putat: Every man thinketh his suspitions to be almost perfect and exact knowledges, saith Saint Austen. Well, what suspition is, I trust you see both by all this, and especially by this example in my text, of these Counsellors, following of it against the upright & princely dealing and meaning of David, till it had wrought the ruine, not only of themselves and their houses, but of the whole kingdome: And follow it who list, he shall tell me in the end S. Austen saith true, that Suspitio amicitiæ venenum, Suspition is the poyson and bane of all friendship and love, of all concord & peace, either publikely in the countrey, or privately in a mans owne house, and as I said before, Grande hominibus malum, A most great and grievous evill among men.

Thus have I guessed at some causes that might move these Counsellors thus crookedly to conceive, and thus badly to report of Davids so loving an Embassage to the King their Master: Whether they were causes or no, I know not, because as I said, the Text expresly noteth none; but most assured I am, and even but too well assured, that in the world among men they be causes, both of like thinking and speaking, where like honesty and truth is of all good meaning. And therefore I trust this dayes labour shall make us all more carefull hereafter to avoid it; which is the thing I wish and pray for.

The time is gone, the weather extreame, and I may not too much wrong this kinde

attention and moſt loving patience of yours; therefore in this part I will leave theſe notes unamplified.

Firſt, how things beſt ſpoken and beſt meant may bee miſtaken and wreſted to a contrary ſenſe.

Secondly, what ſmall ſparks may cauſe a very great and fearfull fire; as here it was.

Thirdly, how mutable, ſlippery, and uncertaine the peace of this world is; falling away when a man thinketh it faſt, and leaſt doubteth a change, as here it did betwixt the Ammonites and the Iſraelites.

Laſtly, how dangerous any dealing is with men not grounded in the feare of God, and knowledge of true religion; for they make no conſcience to ſuſpect without cauſe, nor to report without truth: They cateh before they have cauſe, and think themſelves wronged when no ſuch thing is meant; they beleeve bad men to a bad end, againſt true friends, till they have wrought their friends trouble, and their owne overthrow, as here it was.

And what they did to theſe Embaſſadours, I meane the villany of their fact, in ſhaving halfe their beards, and cutting off their garments by their hips, that their nakedneſſe might appeare, together with the third and laſt part of my diviſion; to wit, the revenge that followed, both to the raiſers and beleevers of this ſlander againſt David, even a bloody warre, and a fearfull overthrow of them and their Countrey, that ſtill it may be true, Malum conſilium conſultori peſſimum; Evill counſell in the end is worſt for him that gave it; I wholly omit till ſome other occaſion: praying you even with that heart that ever loved you, and with a minde in all vehemency of affection glued to you, that what I have ſaid may not bee ſpoken in vaine. You know my deſire and the wiſh of my ſoule, you know what is wanting ſhould never be wanting, you know, that I ſhall not more aſſuredly give account of my ſpeaking this day, at the laſt judgement, than you ſhall of your hearing before the juſt Judge of the quick and dead. And therefore in all theſe reſpects, and whatſoever elſe the like, thinke of me, nay, thinke of your ſelves, and of your houſes, of your bodies, and of our ſoules. The remembrance of death is a matter of much uſe to a godly minde, as hath beene ſhewed: kindneſſe is comfortable whileſt we live, and kindneſſe is profitable when we are dead; for it getteth friends to thoſe whom we leave behind us, as you have ſeene, more than can any heaps that we have gathered together, and moſt truſt in. Thankfulneſſe is a vertue that man honoureth, and God with heavenly bleſſings richly rewardeth in his good time. The very thankfulneſſe of David in this place, remembring a favour ſhewed him, and ſeeking to requite it, had this mercy with God, that hee looked upon his innocency, and joyned with his people and power to ſubdue their adverſaries. The contrary is odious, and abhorred of bruit beaſts. So is injurious ſuſpecting without cauſe, and falſe reporting, grounded upon ſuch ſuſpition: Evill actions following upon both, as here they did, brought a fearfull over throw, as ſtill they ſhall.

Other particulars mentioned in this diſcourſe, I leave to your own rehearſals, as I do this our brother dead before us, to his God and ours, who as he hath cut off his threed, ſo ſhall he ours, and bring all together at his appointed time, to receive the reward of our here living, either to weale or wo, that ſhall endure for ever. The Lord till then give us the uſe of his Word, and the powerfull fruit of it in our actions, to all Chriſtian reformation, and amendment of life amongſt us. The Lord lengthen the time of this happy government wee live under, and cut in ſunder the cords of diſlike amongſt all men, ſo that kindneſſe and amity ſpreading and growing, it may be ſaid of us as well as of others, Behold how good and joyfull a thing it is brethren to dwell together in unity. Never man ſhall wiſh it more unto you, neither any more good than my ſelfe, though God may give you thouſands more able to doe you good than my ſelfe. But I have ſaid enough, and I goe no further. To this Lord and God thus able to profit you and comfort me, and in the end to ſave both you and me from the merit of our ſins, and to give us a place of everlaſting and unſpeakable comfort with him in his Kingdome, bee all honour, power, glory and dominion, both now and evermore. Amen, Amen.
